To the most High and Mighty Monarch, ELIZABETH, (my dread Sovereign) by the Grace of God, Queen of England France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c.

AL my labour whatsoeuer, in translating another mans work, I present here unto your Highness, and consecrate to the happy and immortal memory of your most sacred Majesty. An attempt (I confess) in regard of mine own imperfections, venturous and overbold; as the first enterprise, right hard and exposed to perill. Yet, most Worthy and Powerfull Empress; Who is there so unsufficient, that by the favourable aspect of your countenance, may not be graced and enabled? What so difficult and dangerous, which under the fortunate auspices of your Majesty, cannot be effected with ease and pass in safety?

Accept then, most gracious Lady, the first fruits of a few years study, for the benefit enjoyed of life and liberty. An offering, as well in that respect, as of myself the meanest of many thousands, under all proportion; but considering either the argument or the first Author, not much unfitting. He, in penning the History of the greatest State in his time, for exquisite eloquence had not his equall; no more than your Highness in glorious government at this day any second: Such are the incomparable perfections resplendent in your Royall person; the wonder of the world.

Vouchsafe also, of your accustomed clemency shewed to aliens, of your fervent zeal to learning and good letters, wherein (among other rare virtues and singular gifts seated in your Heroick mind) no Prince cometh near unto your Excellency, to reach forth your gracious hand to T. Livius: who having arrived long since and conversed as a meer stranger in this your famous Island, and now for love thereof learned in some sort the language, humbly craveth your Majesties favour to be ranged with other free denizens of that kind: so long to live under your Princely protection, as he shall duly keep his own allegiance, and acquaint your liege subjects with religious devotion after his manner, with wisdom, policy, virtues, valour, loyalty, and not other wise.

And the Almighty guard your Majesty alwaies with his holy Angels, prolong your life among us in perfect health, adorn your noble heart with divine graces, maintain your Regall estate in all honour: bless the rest of your daies (and infinite may they be) with sweet repose and firm peace, to the joy of your true-hearted and loving people; and finally, accomplish all your desires, for present prosperity and future felicity.

Your sacred Majesties most humble and obedient subject, Philemon Holland.

TO THE READER.

This is that Axiome received from Philosophy, Thū ē ὁ αἴματις ἄλλου ἀπὸ τοῦ αἵματος. The corruption of blood is the generation of another. Thus out of the ashes and ruins of Troy sprung the City of Rome: and by the woful fall of that one state, arose not only the most glorious empire of the Romans, but also the best writer of their history, Titus Livius. For whereas after the fatal destruction of Troy, two principal men of name remained alive, Aeneas and Antenor: the one with his fleet arriving in that coast of Italy where Tybre runneth, built Latium, and became the first father of the Romans, according to Virgil in the first Æneid:

— genus unde Latinum, Albanique patres, alta mœnia Romæ:

— from whence are Latines come,
The noble Albanes eke, and walls of stately Rome.

Antenor entered the Venice gulf, & founded the City of Padua, the native place of Livy their historiographer, as the same Poet writeth a little after:

Hic tandem ille urbem Paduæ I sedesque locavit Troverorum, &c.

Yet here the City Padua built he: therein to plant
His Trojanes, left when Troy was lost, who resting seat did want.

And I wot not well, whether they were more beholden to that fortune of theirs, (whereof so much they boasted) for Aeneas the author of their beginning and admirable greatnes: than for this writer Livy, who commended their deeds to everlasting fame. For from their very first rising [even with Aeneas] unto their sensible declining and decay, were not 1200 years compleat: but since Livy enchronicled their acts, sixteen hundred are come and gone: yet continue they as fresh this day as at the first, and spread stil far and neer into all parts of the world: So much more durable and permanent are the memorialls recorded by learned Historians, than either any Monarchy be ienever so great, or all those wondrous Pyramides and Obeliskes, reared by most magnificent Kings, and mighty Emperors, to immortalize their name and memory. This T. Livius then, was born at Padua, in the year 694 after the foundation of Rome, when L. Afranius and Q. Cæcilius Metellus Celer were Consuls. He flourished ished all the time of Augustus Caesar, and died in the fourth year of Tiberius. By which account, he lived full LXXVI. years: as appeareth by an ancient Epitaph upon his tomb at Padua, (where it is thought he died) with the pourtraict of his visage: whereof the one is reprinted here, and the other immediately before the beginning of the History.

TITE LIVI OF PADVA.

Who wrote long since with peer-less pen,
The acts of Romans, match-less men,

To the Reader.

Other evidences there be concerning the same, which needless it were to call to witness: for no Epitaph nor inscription either enchased in stone or cut in brass, is there left, better than the monuments of his own writings (if they had come entire to our hands) and the testimony of good and approved authors. For during the time of Augustus, he wrote the worthy deeds of the Romans, and continued the narration thereof from the very foundation of the City of Rome unto the one and twentieth year of his Empire. A story of 750 years, and a peece of work for the artificiall frame and elegant setting out, comparable to the best in that kind. My purpose is not here, to enter into a large field and Rhetorical discourse of his praises in regard of any gifts of fortune wherewith he was plentifully enriched: namely, the place of his nativity, a City more ancient by 400 years than Rome; flourishing in martiall puissance, able to set out and maintain 100000 fighting men for the wars; in stately port at home, having a nobility of 400 in number; in gorgeous and costly buildings; in traffique and frequent affluence of Marchants thither; as also, that Venice was a Colony deducted and drawn from thence; and, which is not the least, how at this day the famous Vniversity there, affordeth excellent Professors in all kind of learning: nor his happines and felicity to live and die with the glory and beauty of Rome, and not to behold with his eyes those daies of her declining state & deformity, which in great wisdom he foresaw in his spirit, and denounced accordingly: ne yet the special favour wherein he stood with his Prince Augustus, and Livia the Emperess: much less then mean I to set forth the singular qualities and perfections of his mind, and namely his rare and passing eloquence, which my pen is more able now to describe and amplify to the worthiness thereof, than it was to imitate and expresse the same in translating of his story. Moreover, if I should set into his commendation, besides that I must needs come far short of his merit, the thing it self would but renew the just grief, that all learned men have taken for the piteous maim and defect of that notable peece of work & uniform compulsion which he left unto posterity. For having digested the whole history into an hundred and two and forty books, as Petrarch was of opinion, and as Sigonius therein well collecteth: like as also it is evident by the Breviaries of L. Florus the Epitomist, wherof we have 140, with an evident flaw and default of twain, to wit, the 126 and 137: see the partiall injury of the time, the crooked and malignant destiny of the man! Books of far less moment and importance, yea, & those of greater antiquity, have been spared & remain safe: but of that work of his, one fourth part hath not escaped the envy of fortune: and that which now is extant, hath been delivered unto us either by fragments of old copies unperfect, or by the over-curious meddling of some busy Aristarches of late daies depraved, who with their correcting have corrupted; and in stead of reforming words, have deformed the natural sense and primitive construction. Where, by the way, I must advertise the Reader of that which Petru Crinitus hath observed, even against the common opinion proved by those who otherwise are well learned, namely that our Author dispensed not this history into Decades: that is to say, suted and sorted them not into several Tomes and Sections of ten books a peece. For Priscian and other old Grammarians, when they cite any testimony out of Livy, quote the book, and make no mention at all of any Decade; and with him the above-named Petrarch, Florus, and Politiano do agree. Now in these 35 books, so few as they be, preserved as another Palladium out of a generall skare-fire, we may conceive the rare and wonderfull eloquence of our writer in the whole; for the farther he proceedeth into a world, as it were, of matter, the more copious still he floweth; and with such variety, as that he never iterateth one thing twice; but at every change of new affairs, returneth alwaies fresh and gay, furnished with new devices, inventions, and phrases; much like a second Anteu, gathering greater strength and more forces still at every turn; or after the manner of a little hill, which issuing from a small source, is maintained with fresh springs and new riverets; and hasting toward the vast Ocean, carrieth a deeper channell and broader stream. For the form of his stile, I refer the readers to the sound and staid judgment rather of Quintilian, who compareth him with Herodotus, Thucydides, and the best Greeks; than to the fantastick conceits of some Criticks of our time, who seeking nodum in scirpo, have dreamed of I wot not what Patavinity in him. What should I speak of that Patheticall spirit of his in moving affections? But, that which most of all commendeth an history, which being lux veritatis, ought especially to deliver with sincerity the whole truth and nothing but the truth, without respect of face or person; to keep only to the substance and train of the subject argument; the due and orderly regard of the important circumstances thereto belonging, without inserting extravagant and impertinent by-matters, much less than fabulous tales; therein he hath the prick and price above all others. For, neither forbeareth he to reprove (as occasion is offered) the Romans, in whose favour he might be thought to have written; nor doubteth to praise the good parts and the valiant exploits of their mortall enemies. The Gauls he may seem to gall more bitterly upon a sinister affection, glancing at them, as he doth, in many places for their greedy desire of gold and idle sloath, as not able to endure any long travell, and heat least of all; yet so, as the French, now living, seem not much offended therewith; for above other Nations they have given him most friendly entertainment, and twice enfranchised him among them. I am not unwilling to touch by the way this principall point and vertue of an Historiographer, I mean the delivery of a simple truth in his narrations; for that I have observed in him throughout, that he hath been most modest in reporting from others by hearsay any thing that foundeth on an untruth; so little deserveth he to be noted with the infamous brand of liew. The wary circumspection of his in that behalf which I dare be bold to recommend unto the Reader, I proposed unto my self in making him English; endeavouring by conference especially of the select copies in Latine, yet not rejecting other translations (such as

• I had some little skill in) to come as near as possibly I could, to the true meaning of the Author; making this account, that if I could approve my diligence that way to men of reason and understanding, all other my wants and defects might sooner be passed by and pardoned. A desire I had to perform, in some sort, that which is profitable to the most, namely, an english History of that C.W. which of all others (if I have any judgment) affordeth most plenteous examples of devout zeal in their kind, of wisdom, policy, justice, valour, and all vertues whatsoever. According to this purpose and intent of mine I framed my pen, not to any affected phrase, but a mean and popular stile. Wherein, if I have called again into use some old words, let it be attributed to the love of my country language: if the sentence be not so concise, couched and knit together, as the originall, loath I was to be obscure and dark; have I not englished every word aptly? Each Nation hath severall manners, yea, and terms appropriate by themselves; have I varied in some places from the French or Italian? Censured I look to be, and haply reproved; but like as Alcibiades said to one, mirator in se deservis, i.e. Strike hardly (Euribiades) so you bear me speak; even so I say, Find fault and spare not; but withall, read the originall better before ye give sentence. And howsoever I have faulted otherwise by oversight, let against it my affection and desire to do some good, while I live to my sweet native country; add thereto the long travell that I have taken to tellise the same; and if that will not bring down the ballance, let the profit and delight both, which you shall find in the argument and discourse of the history, counterpoise and overweigh my wants, more or less. And thus I recommend unto my countrymen Livy in english habit; Livy (I say) who, whether he were more honored while he lived, than beloved at this day of forraign nations, I cannot easily determine; for like as then (by the testimony of S. Hieron, and Pliny in his Epistles) there repaired many great and noble personages from the farthest parts of Spain and France, only to see his face, for the admiration they conceived of him by the fame of his incomparable eloquence; even so of late time his spirit (which yet liveth in his writings) hath made a voyage by Florence into the same France and Spain; and hath passed as far as into Arabia one way, and Almain another. In which distant and remote parts he hath found such kind entertainment, not only in Courts of Emperors and Kings, in palaces of Princes and great Potentates; but also with the people in generall; that they seem to strive no less (who may endow him with most ample franchises and free bourgeoisie) than those seven cities in old time who every one challenged to themselves the birth of the Poet Homer. Since then, he hath thus long been desirous to cross the seas into this noble Island, not as a traveller to sojourn for a time in the Court only or the Universties, but to remain here still both in City and country, and thereto hath learned our language indifferently; let it now appear that this nation of ours (like to reap as great fruit and benefit by his acquaintance as any other) is ready to receive and embrace him as friendly as the rest.

TITUS LIVIUS
OF PADUA, FROM THE FOUNDATION OF THE CITY OF ROME.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the First Book,

- A  He coming of Eneas into Italy, and his after there: the reign of Ancianus in Alba: of Sylvius Eneas, and so forth of other Sylvii, Kings thereof, are contained in the first Book. The daughter of Numitor with child by Mars, Romulus and Remus are born, Amulius killed, The City of Rome built by Romulus. The Senate by him chosen. He made war with the Sabines. He presented unto Jupiter Feretrius the royal spoils of their King, whom he slew with his own hands. He divided the people into Centuries, vanquished the Fidenates and Veientians, and was canonized a god. Numa Pompilius taught the rites and ceremonies of sacrifice and divine service, erected a Temple to Janus, and was the first that shut the doors thereof, after he had made peace with all the Nations thereabout: and gaining that he had secret company and conference by night with the goddess Egeria, won the stout and fierce hearts of the people to Religion. Tullus Hostilius warred upon the Albans, whereupon ensued the combat of the three brethren, twins on both sides, Horatius was acquit for killing his sister. The execution of Metius Suffetius. Alba rased and destroyed. The Albans made free denizens of Rome, and there dwelt. War denounced against the Sabines. Finally, Tullus was consumed with lightning. Ancus Martius renewed the ceremonies by Numa first ordained. He to the Latines, being conquered and made Citizens of Rome, he assigned the mount Aventine to inhabit. He won again by force a town of the Latines called Politorium, which the old Latines had surprised and possessed themselves of and utterly destroyed. He made the Sublician or wooden bridge over Tybris, and adjourned to the City the hill Janiculum. He enlarged the bounds of the Empire, built Ostia, and reigned three and thirty years. In the time of his reign, Lucumo the son of Demaratus a Corinthian, removed from Tarquins, a City of Tuscany, and came to Rome: and there entering into amity with Ancus, began to bear the name of Tarquinius, and so to be called: and after the death of Ancus took the Kingdom upon him. He increased the number of the Senators by one hundred, subdued the Latines, appointed the Circus or Theatre, set forth the public games and places: and being warred upon by the Sabines, he augmented the centuries of the horsemen. And for to make proof and triall of Accius Navius the Angur his cunning, he demaied of him, as they say, whether that which he conceived in his mind were possible to be effected: and when he made answer that it was, he commanded him to cut a whetstone in two with a razor, which out of hand was by Accius done. Moreover, he won the field of the Sabines, and defeated themselves the City about made the walled city: and when he had reigned eight and thirty years, was murdered by the son of Ancus. There succeeded after him Servius Tullius, the son of a Captive, and the Lady of Corniculum, who being a child, and lying foundled in the cradle, had a flaming fire (as the report goeth) burning about his head. He discomfited the Veientians and Tuscanes in battell. He was the first that numbered the people of Rome, valued their goods, and instituted the Lustrum every five years, in which were reputed to have been numbered eighty thousand Citizens. He described the Classes and Centuries: set out further the bounds of the Pomarine, without and within the City walls: and put to the City the hills Quirinalis, Viminalis, and Esquilinus. He together with the Latines founded the Temple of Diana in mount Aventine, and when he had reigned four and thirty years, he was, with the privacy, and by the counsel of his daughter Tullia, murdered by L. Tarquinius, the son of Priscus. After him L. Tarquinius Superbus usurped the Kingdom, without the election, either of the Senators or the people. On which day Tullia (most wicked and cursed wretch that she was) caused her Coach to be driven over the Corps of her father, lying dead on the ground. He had about him a troop of armed men for the guard of his person. By a fable while he put to death Turnus Herdonius. He hid war with the Volscians, and of their spoils edified a Temple to Jupiter on the hill Capitol, where the god Terminus and goddess Juventas, agreed not to be displaced, whose altars could not be stirred nor removed, as the others. the fraudulent practise of his son Sex. Tarquinius he brought the Gabians to his obedience. Unto his other two sons being gone to Delphi, and consulting there the Oracle, whether of them should be King of Rome, answer was made, That he should reign who first kissed his mother: which answer they interpreting wrong, Junius Brutus, who accompanied them in their voyages, made as though he caught a fall, and kissed the ground, the mother indeed of all: which proved true on his part, as it fell out in the end. For when as Tarquinius Superbus by his proud tyrannicall demeanour, had incurred the hatred of all men: he as left upon the forcible outrage and villany done by Sex. Tarquinius (his son) in the night season upon the body of Lucretia: who sending for her sister Tricipitinus, and her husband Collatinus, brought them earnestly not to see her death unrevenged, and so with a knife killed her self: he, I say, by the means of Brutus, especially was driven and expelled out of Rome, when he had reigned five and twenty years. Then were the Consuls first created, Lu. Jun. Brutus, and Lu. Tarquinius Collatinus.

WHether in writing the acts and affairs of the people of Rome, from the first foundation of the City, I shall perform a work of importance and worth my travail, neither wot I well, nor if I will, dare I avouch: seeing it is a thing both old and usual, that new Writers alwayes perfwade themselves, either in matter to deliver more truth and certainty, or in manner of curious penning thereof, to outgo the rudenesse of elder time. Howsoever it fall out, this yet will do me good, that even I also, to the utmost of my power, have endeavoured to eternize the worthy deeds of that people which is the soveraign of the whole world. And if, among so many Writers, my fame chance to be obscure, yet may I comfort my selfe in this, That they who shall darken and shadow the fame, are men so highly reputed and renowned. Besides, the thing it self is of infinite toyle and labour, as counting and comprizing from above 700 years past, and which arising from small beginning hath proceeded and grown to great, as now the bignesse thereof is combrous to it self: and I doubt not, but the Readers for the most part will take but small delight and pleasure, either in those far-fetched Originals, or in the times next ensuing, for haste they make to their novelties of later daies, wherein the puffance of that so mighty people hath wrought long since their own downfall and overthrow. But I contrariwise will seek even this for guerdon of my pains, namely, to turn away from beholding these calamities, which this our Age for many years hath seen, so long at least: whilst I call to remembrance, and wholly employ my spirits in considering those ancient monuments of old time, exempt from care and trouble, which were able, if not to with draw my mind as I write from the truth, yet to make it pensive and heavy. As for in such things as are reported, either before, or at the Foundation of the City, more beautified and set out with Poets Fables, than grounded upon pure and faithfull Records, I mean neither to aver nor disprove. This leave and privilege hath antiquity, by interlarding the acts of gods and men together, to make the first rising of Cities more sacred and venerable. And if it may be lawfull for any people under heaven to consecrate and ascribe unto the gods their Original, surely, such is the renowned martiall prowess of the Romans, that all nations of the world may as well abide them to report Mars above the rest, to be the prime father both of themselves and of their first founder, as they can be content to live in subjection under them. But these and such like matters, howsoever they shall hereafter be censured or esteemed, I will not greatly weigh and regard. This would I have every man rather to think upon in good earnest, and consider with me what their life, and what their carriage was, by what men and means, both in war and peace, their dominion was achieved and enlarged. Afterward as their discipline began by little and little to shrink, let him mark how at the very first their behavior and manners sunk withall: and how still they fell more and more to decay and ruin yea, and began soon after to tumble down right even until these our daies, wherein we can neither endure our own foires, nor selves for the cure. For this is it that is so good and profitable in an history, when a man may see and behold, as in a conspicuous monument and lightfull memoriall the lively examples of all foires, set up in open view for his instruction, whereout he may chuse for himself and his Country what to follow, as also learn how to eschew a foul enterprise, and avoid a shamefull end. But unless he be deceived with the affectionate love of mine own commended work, never was there Common-weal, either more mighty, more holy and devout, better ordered of good prebidents, or into which covetousnesse and encrease more lately crept, or wherein poverty and frugality were so greatly or so long time honoured, in somuch as the more they wanted, the lesse they desired. Now of late daies wealth hath brought in avarice, abundant pleasures have kindled a desire by riot, lust, and loose life, to destroy and bring all to naught. But these complaints, which will be nothing pleasant, no not when perhaps they shall be needfull, banish we must (howsoever we do) at our first entrance of so weighty a matter: when as we rather should begin (if as the Poets use it, or were our manner also) with good prefaces and lucky and happy pre-earings, with vows and prayers to gods and goddesses, to vouchsafe their furtherance and happy successe to the enterprise of so great a Work.

The

The First Book OF TITUS LIVIUS.

AFT of all, this is generally held for certain, That the Greeks, after the winning of Troy, dealt cruelly with all the Trojans, save only Aeneas and Antenor: to whom, as well in regard of the bond of mutual entertainment, as also for that they ever perfwaded peace and the rendring again of Helen, they wholly forbore to shew any rigour at all, as by martiall right of war they might have done: And how Antenor afterwards, accompanied with a number of Henetiens, who driven by civill discord out of Papilagonia, and having lost at Troy their King Pylmenes, were to seek both a resting place, and a Captain in the Adriatick sea: and after they had expelled the Eugeniens that inhabited between the sea and the Alps, those Henetiens together with the Trojans, kept those parts and there remained. The place where first they landed, called Troy, whereof the Territory and Seigniory thereabout was also named Troy, and the whole people in general called Henetiens. Moreover, how Aeneas upon like misfortune, having fled his country, yet aspiring by the fatal direction of the detinies to greater affairs, came first into Macedony: and after into Sicily, seeking an abiding place: and sailing with a fleet from Sicily arrived at length, and landed in the countrey of Laurentum: which place likewise was termed Troy. Where the Trojans being set a shore, having after their long wandering nothing in a manner left them but ships and armour, as they foraged and drave booties out of the Countrey, King Latinus with the Aborigines, who at that time inhabited those parts, ran forth in warlike manner out of town and countrey, to withstand the violent invasion of these strangers. But what beell thereupon is, two manner of waies reported. Some say, that Latinus being in a battell vanquished, first made peace with Aeneas, and after that allied himself to him by marriage. Others affirm, that as both armies stood ranged in battell array, before the trumpets sounded the battell, Latinus came forth into the Vanguard, and called out the Generall of the strangers to parle: demanding who they were, from whence they came, by what chance they departed from their own home, and to what end they entred the Laurentine borders? After that he heard the company were Trojans, the Captain Aeneas, son of Venus and Anchises, and that upon the burning of their City, they having forgone their countrey, sought some place to abide and build them a City in: wondered much, not only at the nobleness of the people and their leader, but also at their courageous hearts, resolved either for war or peace: whereupon, by giving his right hand he plight his troth, and faithfully promised them friendship and amity. So the two Generals made a League, and each host saluted other. And Aeneas was by Latinus entertained and lodged in the Court, where Latinus solemnly in presence of his familiar household gods, by giving his daughter in marriage to Aeneas, joyned private alliance to the former publick confederacy. Which thing truly put the Trojans in good hope and full assurance to end one day their wandering and flitting to and fro, and to settle themselves in one certain place of abode. Hereupon, a Town they built, which Aeneas of his wives name called Lavinium. Within a while, by this new marriage, he had issue a son: whom the parents named Ascanius. But after all this, were both Trojans and Aborigines warrd upon. For Turnus King of the Rutilians, unto whom Lavinia, before Aeneas his coming, had been espoused, taking it to heart that a stranger was preferred before him, made war both upon Aeneas and Latinus: but neither Army departed from the battell with joy and well appaid. For the Rutians iwere vanquished: the Aborigines and Trojans with indeed the field, but lost their Captain Latinus. Then Turnus and the Rutilians mistrusting their own strength, fled for succour to the puissant and mighty Tuiscans, and to their King Mecentius, who keeping his Royall Court at Cere, a town in those daies of great wealth, nor well pleased even from the first beginning, with the foundation of a new City, and supposing the Trojans power was already much more encreased than might well stand with the safety of the borderers, joynd full willingly his forces with the Rutilians, Aeneas to win the hearts of the Aborigines against so dreadful and dangerous war, to the end they all should not only live under one government, but also be all of one name, called both Nations Latines. And from that time forth were the Aborigines no more faithful in the valiant and faithfull hearts of these two States, growing up daily more and more in mutual amity, albeit Hetruria was so mighty, that the name thereof was renowned not only throughout the inland parts, but the sea coasts also, even from one end of Italy to the other, from the the Alpes to the narrow seas of Sicily; yet whereas he might well have resisted the force of his enemies, and maintained a defensive year within his walls, he brought his Army forth into the open field. This was the second battle that the Latines fought, and the last that ever Aeneas, whilst he was man, achieved. And howsoever by right he ought to be named the first inter upon the river Nimicus, and Jupiter Indigement him call. Now was not Aeneas, Eneas his son, times yet for age to sway the Scepter, Howbeit the Royall Crown remained whole and safe for him, until he came to fourteen years of age. So long continued the state of the Latines, and the Kingdom by grandire and father descended, unto the child's behoof, under the government only of a woman, as Prote-dressed: of so virtuous disposition and princely carriage was Dame Lavinia, Doubtfull much I find (for who can certainly avouch a thing to long ago?) whether this was that Aeneas, or one elder than he, who had to his mother Creusa, which Them flourished, and who fled with his father from the flames, and whom being named also Lavinia the honour and family of the Julii do fetch their name and pedigree. That same Aeneas, wheresoever, or of whomsoever he was born, (but Aeneas his son of a truth he was) when Lavinia grew exceeding populous, left that City now flourishing and wealthy (as the world went then) unto his mother or stepmother, I wot not whether. He himself built another out of the ground under the mountain Alba, which of the signification thereof, reaching out in length on the side of the hill, was named Long Alba. Between the building of Lachnum and Long Alba, which became an under-town or Colony drawn out of the other, and peopled from thence, were almost thirty years. But so mighty grew they, especially after the discomfiture of the Tuicans, that neither upon the death of Eneas, nor during the time of a woman's government, nor all the while that the young Prince learned to be a King, durst either Messapus, or the Tuicans, or any other of the borderers once stir or rise in arms. But peace was concluded upon these termes. That the river Alba, which now they call Tiberis, should divide the Tuicans from the Latines, and limit to either of them their own bounds. After this reigned Sylvius, the son of Aeneas, born by chance within the forests: who begat Eneas Sylvius, and he had issue Lavinia Sylvius, by whom were certain Colonies or petty Townships creeded, and the inhabitants named Prisci Latini. And from thenceforth all the Kings of Alba continued the surname of Sylvius. This Lavinia begat Alba of Alba came Atrius, Atrius begat Cepis, and of Cepis descended Capatius: whose son Tiberinus in ferrying over the river Alba was drowned, and by his name renowned that river unto all posterity. Next unto him reigned Ascrippa his son, and after him succeeded Romulus Sylvius in his fathers Kingdom, who being stricken dead with a thunderbolt, left the Crown to Ascanius. This Ascanius was buried in that hill, which now is part of the City of Rome, and beareth his name. Then reigned Procas, who had two sons, Numitor and Amulius. And unto Numitor, because he was the elder, he bequeathed by his last will and testament the ancient Kingdom of the Sylvians line. Howbeit, might prevailed more than either the will of the father, or the reverend regard of elder brother. For Amulius having driven out Numitor, reigneth himself: and not herewith content, he hath one mischief upon another. For first he murdered the issue male of his brother: then by making Rhea Sylvia his brother's daughter a Vestall Nun, and under colour of honour and dignity, by perpetual vowed virginity, he bereft her of all hope of child-bearing. But it was a fatal thing, and (as I think) which God would have, that so great a City should be built for to yeeld the ground and beginning of that Empire, which next under the gods is most mighty. For behold, the Vestall Virgin was by force deflowered, and after delivered of two twins: and were it that the thought to in very deed, or because the name and credit of a god might carry away and cloake the fault more cleanly, shee there her ballad children upon Mars. But neither god nor man was able to save herself or her children from the Kings cruelty. For the Votary was committed to close prison, and there kept bound in irons: as for the babes he commanded they should be cast into the stream of the river. But (as God would) by good hap the Tiber overflowed the banks, and the standing waters on either side was nothing roarer, yet so, as there was no coming to the deep current or channell of the very river: and they that brought the infants, hoped well they might be drowned in any place of the water, were it never so still and low. So to fulfill after the Kings commandment, they laid the children in the next place they came to: even whereas now standeth the fig-tree Ruminalis, called, as they say, Rumulus: but all that ground then was nothing but waste deserts, and a very wilderness. The report yet goeth, that when the ebbe and shallow water was gone, and had left on dry ground the floating trough or vessel, wherein the babes were put forth, a she-Wolf from out of the mountains there being athirst, turned towards the childrens cry, and with her pendant teats so gently gave the infants suck, that Fausulus the head Reeve and overseer of the Kings Cattell found her licking them with her tongue: who brought them to his homestead, and gave them to his wife Laurentia to be fostered. There be that think, that Laurentia being a common flumper among these herdmen and shepherds, was usually called Lupa. Whereupon arose the occasion of this strange tale and wondrous miracle. Well, so were they born and so brought up. And as soon as they grew once to some big-ness, it was no boot to keep them within doores, nor to let them idly to tend the cattell, for they would use to hunt abroad in the forest: whereby having gotten strength of body, and courage with-all, they were able now, not only to withstand the violence of wild beasts, and to kill them, but also to set upon common robbers by the high-ways side, laden as they were with booties, and to spoil them thereof, yea, and divide the prey among the shepherds, and as the number of youngers daily encreased with them to keep holidays, to make merry, and follow their disports. And even thus the daies (as men say) was the festival pastime Luperale, used in mount Palatine, which of Palatium, a City in Aradia, was first called Palantium, and after Palatine, wherein Evander, who defended the from the Aradians, long before reigned in that country, and ordained a solemn game and recreation yearly to be held, as aforetime in Aradia, in this manner: that young men in the honor of Pan Lycus, whom the Romans after called Lupus, should loosely and wantonly run naked. Now whilst they were busily occupied in this kind of sport, which by vow yearly they performed: there lay in ambush the robbers afore said, in revenge and for anger of the prizes which they had lost: Where Romulus manfully cut himself, but Remus they took prisoner: and being thus taken, they brought him before King Amulius, accusing him grievously, and laying especially to his charge, that he with his others invaded and murdered into Numitor his Land, and with a power of lusty youths, assembled in warlike sort, had foraged and spoiled the same. Thus was Remus delivered unto Numitor to be put to death. Now had Fausulus even since the first day conceived some hope, that there were in his household children of royal blood: For well he wist, that both by the Kings commandment the babes were cast forth to perish, and also that the time when he took them up left out fully their enormity: this would he in no wise should be known in hate, and before due time; unless it were either upon good occasion or great necessity. Necessity hapned first: and so for very fear he was driven to reveal the whole matter to Romulus. It hapned also, that Numitor himself, having Remus in durance, and hearing they were brethren twins, by comparing their age, and viewing withall their very countenance and countenances, proceeding from no servile and base parentage, be thought himself of his children: and by farther enquiry and computation came to so, as he seemed well-near to acknowledge Romulus for his nephew. Thus on all hands were means wrought to circumvent and surprize King Amulius. For Romulus on the one side not accompanied with a troop of tall fellows, for he was not able in open fight to make his part good: but giving the herdmen his assistants, in charge to come at a time appointed, some one way, and some another, to the Kings Palace, he let upon the King. On the other side, Remus with another crew from Numitor his house, came to secound him: and so they flew the King. Numitor at the first upon giving out estoons, that the enemies had entered the City, and assailed the Kings Palace, and thereupon having called the youth of Alba into the Citadell, to keep it by force with a good guard, and spying the two young men after the murder done, coming towards him with joy: forthwith assembled the people together, and declared openly before them all the wicked dealings of his brother against him, the parentage of his Nephews, the manner of their birth and bringing up, and how they came to be known: after that he reported the murder of the Tyrant, and took it upon himself as the author thereof. The two young men passing with their companies through the midst of the people, saluted their grandfire King, wherein the whole multitude also with one accord and voice ratified the same: so was his royall name and estate by them established. Thus was the whole Regiment or Kingdom of the Albans committed to Nu-mitor. Then Romulus and Remus had a great desire to found themselves a City in the very place where they had been cast forth and fostered: Now were there of Albas and Latines both, very many that might be spared: besides a number of herdmen: who all set together, put them in good hope, that Alba and Lavinium too, would be but small Cities in comparison of that which now was a building. Whilst they were devising of these things, an old canker came between to mar all, even desire of rule and sovereignty, the same which had troubled their grandfathers before them: and thereupon a sould fray, which arose from a small and slight occasion. Forasmuch as they were both twins at one birth, and the respect of their age might yield no choice and difference, it was thought good and agreed upon, that the gods, who had the tuition of those places, should by Angury or flight of birds declare and shew whether of the twain should both name the City, and also rule the same. Romulus chose the mount Palatine, and Remus the Agentine, for their temples or religious quarters, to mark the bird-flight, and each one apart to receive their Angury. First (as they say) had Romulus appearing in flight six vultures or gripeast, and as tidings came unto him of this Angury it hapned that the number unto Romulus was presented double: whereupon they were both of them by their assistants and favorites saluted Kings. The one side took the vantage of the time: the other of the number, for the prerogative of the Kingdom. Thus they fell to hot words first, and from cholerick words to blows and bloudshed: in which fit and press of the people, Remus was wounded and slain in the place. The more common report goeth, that Remus in scorn of his brother, leapt over the new walls: whereupon Romulus in great choler due his brother with his own hands, and in menacing voice, added these words withall, So perish he, whatever else he be, that shall once dare to leap over my walls. Thus Romulus alone became King, and the City new built of the founders name was called Rome. Wherein first he fortified mount Palatium, in which he was himself retired. To all the rest of the gods he sacrificed after the rule and custom of the Albans: only to Hercules after the manner of the Greeks, according to the first institution of Evander. For the time goeth, that Hercules upon a time, after he had slain Geryon, drove that way exceeding far Oxen, and near the River Tybris, where he had dwom over with his drove afore him, laid him down in a fair green meadow, as well to refresh himself, being weary of his way, as also to rest and bait his cattell in so plentifull grasse and forrage. There, fallett he into a sound sleep, as having well charged himself with wine and viands: and one Cacus a shepherd dwelling there-by, a man right fierce, and bearing him proudly of his strength, being greatly in love with the fairness of the beasts, had a good will, and minded to fetch away that booty: but for that if he had driven the beasts into his own cave, the very tracks would have led the owner of them thither, H he drew the goodliest and biggest of them backward by their tails into his hole. Hercules early in the morning when he awoke, and beheld his drove, and missed some of his count, went on towards the next cave, if haply their footing would traile him thither: But seeing all traces forwards, and leading no other way: as one troubled in spirit, and doubtfull what to do, he began to drive farther out of that theif and dangerous corner. But as some of the Oxen in driving, mist their fellows beheld and honing after them, bellowed as their nature is: Hercules chanced to heare them low again, and answer from out of the cave wherein they had been bellowed: whereat he turned back, and made haste thither. But as Cacus forcibly made head against him, and would have kept him from entrance, Hercules smote him with his club: and for all his calling upon other herdmen for help, slew him outright. At the same time Evander, who fled out of Peloponnesus, governed that Countrey, rather by a kind of countenance and authority, than by force and Lordly command. A man much honored for his wonderful invention of Letters, a strange and rare thing among those rude and unlearned sort: but more honored for the opinion that the people had of his mother Carmentis, reputed to be a goddess, whom for her spirit of prophesie, those Countreies, before that Sybilis came into Italy, had in great reverence and admiration. This Evander being raised with the concourse of the shepherds, afrighted about the stranger, guilty of manifest murder, and hearing of the fact committed, and the occasion thereof: viewing well therewith the perion of the man, his feature and favour, and more lately a good deal, and carrying a greater Majesty than the ordinary proportion of men: demerit of him who he was. And as soon as he understood his name, his father, and native Countrey: O Hercules (quoth he) the son of Jupiter, All hail: my mother a most true Prophesie hath fore-shewed unto me, that thou shalt enclose the number of heavenly wights, and that in this place an Altar shall be reared and dedicated unto thee, which the most mighty and richest nation one day of the world shall quoth Hercules and the preface I gladly accept: and so giving him his hand, faithfully promised to accomplish the will of the gods, and erected it straightway and consecrated an Altar in the place. There and then first, he sacrificed one of the fairest Oxen, chosen out of the whole drove, calling to the ministry of that divine service and feast, the Patris and Pinaris, two most noble houses at that time in those parts. It happened so, by chance, that the Patris were ready at hand in due time, and the inward sacrifices were set before them: which being eaten, the Pinaris came to the good cheer behind: whereupon the custom he held, (as long as the family of the Pinaris continued) they might not feed of the sacred inward. But the Patris, instructed by Evander, became the Priests of that holy sacrifice many ages after: until the solemn service and ministry of this family was put over to public servants, and the whole stock of the Patris utterly worn out and dead. There were the only fountaines of immortality, by his own prowess achieved, and whereunto his fortune conducted him. Having in this manner religiously performed and established the service of the gods, he assembled the multitude to an audience: and for that they could by no means but by Laws be united together into one body and society of a people, he devised Statutes, and ministered justice unto them. And supposing that those Laws would be accounted sacred and inviolable of the wild and rusticall sort of men, in case he shewed himself by some regall ensigne venerable: he carried with him a greater port and Majesty, not only in his robes and princely habit, but most of all in the attendance of twelve Officers and Sergeants, called Lictors, whom he caused to go ordinarily before his person. Some think he chose this number according to the birds, which by Augury did foretold and prognosticate his reign: I rather am of their opinion, who think that Sergeants at Arms, and this kind of Officers came from the Tuscans their neighbours, from whence also the Ivory chair of estate, called Sella curulis, and the Royall purple robe embroidered, named Toga praetoria, was fetched, as also the very number of Sergeants or Lictors. For that the Tuscans had this manner, when they chose their King by the common voices of their twelve principal States, each one found a Sergeant. All this while grew the City more and more to be fortified with Ramparts and Bulwarks, as men still built in sundry places where they liked best, seeming thereby to provide rather for a future multitude in time to come, than for the present number wherewith it was then peopled. Furthermore, lest that the City, so large in compass, should stand void and vacante, Romulus for to encrease the number of the Inhabitants (according to the old practise of the founders of Cities, who by gathering about them the base multitude and obscure, feigned that they were an off-spring born out of the earth) set up a Sanctuary, or lawfull Church, called Astyrum in that place which at this day between the two groves, is enclosed and fenced round about with thick briars and brambles. Thither resorted (as to a place of refuge) out of the neighbor Countreies, a rabble and confused medley of all sorts, rag and rag, bond and free, one with another's folk desirous of change and novelty.

So began first the City according to the plot of large buildings, to be well peopled and grow mighty. Thus being provided of power sufficient: he thought, then upon a Councill and policy to his power. And so created a hundred Senators: either because that number seemed great enough, or for that there were no more but one hundred that were of worth to be elected counsellors or (wise) fathers. These men certainly for honor and dignity were called Patres or Sage fathers: and their lineall descent Patris or Nobles. Now by this time was the State of Rome so mighty and

puissant,

A puissant, that it was able in fight to match any City neer adjoining whatsoever. But for default of woman kind, this puissance was to endure but the age of one man: for neither had they hope offit from among themselves at home, nor yet made marriages with their neighbors abroad. Whereupon Romulus by the advice of his Senators, sent Embassadors to the Countreies thereabout, to treat for society and alliance for his new people, by way of marriage. Alledging that Cities also, as well as other things, arose of base beginnings, and in process of time by their own prowess, and help of God willed, grow to great power and reputation: "Whereas therefore they were full well assured, that as the gods were gracious to their first uprising, so to their own virtue and valor should not be wanting: their neighbors ought not, in regard of common humanity, and as they were men, think much and disdain to join in blood and kindred with them, being also men as well as they. Howbeit, this embassage in no place had gentle audience and courteous entertainment. For they all in general despised them, and were in fear for themselves and their posterity, by reason of so mighty a State, encroaching in the midst of them, and under their very noses. And from the most of them the Embassadors were dismissed and sent away, with this trump and demand, Whether they had set up a Sanctuary or lawfull place for women too? For that were alone, and a fit marriage indeed to be tried by knocks. But Romulus dissembling his inward heart-burning, to the end he might find time and place meet for the purpose, prepareth to let forth certain iolemn playes and games, which he named Consualis, to the honor of Nepesne Eques. Hereupon he commanded to proclaime these games all over the country adjoining: and with as great preparation and furniture, as in these days of their skill or ability might afford, they celebrate the same, and all to make the show more glorious and worthy to great expectation. Thither resorted many a one, desirous also to see this new City, but their next neighbors especially of Cenina, Crustumium, and Antenna: The whole multitude of Sabins likewise came with their wives and children. Who being friendly invited to the houses, from one to another, and courteously entertained: when they beheld the situation of the City, the strong walls and fair buildings, so thick standing wound how in so short a space the City of Rome was grown to great. Now when the time of this solemn fight was come, and that their minds were buied, and their eyes bent thereon: then at once, as it was agreed before, there arose an uproar. And the youth of Rome upon a token and watch-word given, fell on every side contrary away the Sabin Maidens. A great many of them were ravished by hap hazzard, as they did fall upon them, and as they came next to their hands. Other some more beautiful then the rest, were appointed for the chief of the Senators, and by certain of the Commons, as they had given them in charge, conveyed home to their houses. But one passing fair and lovely above all others, was hurried by the company or one of one Thalassius (they say) and when as any asked to whom they carried her, they ever vied out (for she should be loved or beloved) Thalassius, i.e. unto Thalassius. Whereupon Thalassius became a common by-word at Weddings ever after. Thus their sport and pastime upon this fit and slight, was marred, and the Parents of the Virgins stood away with heavy cheer, blaming them highly, and complaining of their breach of hospitality: as calling upon the god for vengeance, to whole festive games they being come, were under colour of religion and truth, beguiled. The Damels likewise that were ravished, conceived neither better of themselves, nor less indignation against them. But Romulus himself in person went from place to another, declaring, "That their fathers pride, who denied their neighbors marriage was the cause of all this, promising nevertheless that they should be linked in lawfull wedlock, made partakers of all worldly goods, obtain the freedom of a City, and (then, which nothing is more deer to mankind) enjoy the blessing of children: exhorting them to appease their anger, and quiet themselves, and to give them their hearts, whose hap it was to have their bodies. For oftentimes upon wrong and injury there groweth love and reconciliation. Alledging moreover, that they should find their spouses to much more loving and kind, as every one of them for his part would endeavour, after they had in their turn and course fulfilled the duty to them of good husbands, for to make amends, and supply the miss they have of father, mother, and native countrey. Their husbands which used fair speeches, and flattering words, excusing the matter, and laying all the weight upon fervent affection and pure love: which kind overpersuasion of all other, prevaileth most with womens nature. Thus were the ravished young Wives in some sort quietted in mind, and held themselves well contented. But their fathers then most of all arrayed in mourning weed, with tears and heavy complaints, stirred up the Cities where they dwelt: neither contained their mood within home, but assembled themselves from all parts unto Tatius the King of the Sabins: and to him repaired their Embassages, for that the name of Tatius was highly renowned in those countreies. They of Cenina, Crustumium, and Antenna, who were partly touched and grieved for that wrong done, thought that Tatius and the Sabins dealt but coldly in the action, and went but slowly about revenge. These three Nations therefore banded themselves, and agreed to prepare for war. But so sharp set were the Ceninians that the men of Crustumium and Antenna, bestirred not themselves quick enough for them. So they of Cenina entered alone by force of arms the Territories of the Romans. As they waited and spoiled without order and measure, Romulus met them with an army, and in one small skirmish made proof, how Mood without Might is vain and bootles. For he discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chase their whole host: slew their King in battle, and him deposed: and having slain their General, at the first assault he won the town: and after he had from thence feit. For whilst the Cavalry stood unresolved, as it were, in a hammering whether to fly or fight, and the Infantry withal began to retire: all at once the enemies in thronging manner sallied forth of the gates, and chafed the Romans so fiercely, that in their eager pursuit they were drawn to the very place of ambush. Thence the Romans suddenly arose, and charged the flank of the enemies: And to encrease their fright, they likewise that were left behind to guard the camp, shewed themselves with banners displayed. So the Fidenates terrified sundry ways, before well neer that Romulus and his men of arms could rein about their horse-heads, turned their backs, and rode full gallop towards the town again, and so much the faster, for that they fled now in good earnest themselves, that pursued them, who a little before made but semblance thereof. Yet for all this could they not escape the enemy: for the Romans hard at their heels, rushed together with them pel-mel into the town, before the gates could be shut against them. At this Fidenatian war spreading so dangerously, the Veientians grew angry in their hearts, and began to chafe. Touched they were also in regard of kindred and alliance: for the Fidenates were likewise Tulcans. And fearing left (if the Roman forces should thus distress and lie upon all the borders) they being so neer should not go free, they were the rather pricked forward, and thereupon made rodes, and entered in arms the confines of Rome, spoiling and sifting, more like robbers then professed warriors. So without pitching any tents, or abiding the coming of their enemies, but only driving and carrying away great booties out of the fields, they return again to Vei. The Romans contrariwise, not finding the enemies in the field, but yet provided and resolved to give battle, and to hazard all, passed over the Tiber. Whom the Veientians understanding to be encamping themselves, fully minded to come against their City: issued forth and met them, intending to try the quarrel by dint of sword, and in open field, rather then to be mied up within the town, and to fight and defend themselves from off their houses and walls. There the Roman King with the strength only of his old beaten souldiers, without any other help and supply whatsoever, without policy or stratagem, had the better: and having thus discomfited the enemies, he chafed them even to their very walls. And for that the City was exceeding strongly fortified as well by natural situation, as by walls, he forbore to assault it. But in his return homeward, he wasted the country, more upon a mind to revenge, than hope of spoil. With this desolating the Veientians no less subdued then if they had lost a field, sent Orators to Rome to sue for peace: unto whom Truce was granted for an hundred years, but they were amerced to lose part of their lands. These were in manner all the ads that were done both at home and abroad, during the reign of Romulus. Whereof none seemed to derogate any jot from the opinion, both of his divine birth and beginning, and also of his immortality or deification after his death. Such was his courageous heart in recovering his Grandfathers Kingdom: his policy and wisdom in founding the City first, and after in establishing and governing the same, as well in war as in peace. By whose good proceedings it got such strength, and so sure footing, that for forty years space after, it enjoyed peace with safety. Nevertheless of his Commons he was better beloved then of his Nobles: but above all, his Souldiers most heartily affected him: of whom he had always about him, as Elquires of the body, three hundred Pensioners armed, not only in time of war, but also of peace, whom he called Celeres. Thus having achieved these noble and immortal deeds, as he upon a time assembled all his people upon the plain, at the marsh Capra, there to number or muster his army: behold upon a sudden there arose a tempest with great cracks of thunder, which with so thick and cloudy a form, covered the King, that the people lost the sight of him. And never after was Romulus seen on earth. The Roman youth, after their fear was at length past, and that upon so dark and troublesome weather, it proved a fair day again, and calm withal, gave the Kings Throne empty, albeit they credited the Senators that stood next about him, who gave out he was taken up aloft in the storm: yet strucken into bad dumps, as it were for the loss of their father, held their peace a good while. But afterwards, when some few of them had once begun, they all set on and cried aloud, All hail, god Romulus the son of a god, King and Father of the City of Rome: With earnest prayer beseeching him of his grace, that he would vouchsafe to be propitious, and save their off-spring and posterity forever. I am of this mind, that some there were even then, that suspected and secretly surmised, that the King was pulled in pieces by the hands of the Nobles. For this rumor also was bruited abroad, although in very dark and obscure terms. But by reason of the high admiration of the man, and the present fear withal, the former opinion took place, and was more current. Over and besides, it grew the rather credible, through the politick practise of one person. For as the whole City was penitive and sorrowful for the mis of their King, and sore displeased with the Senators, one Proculus Julius, a substantial good author (as men say) and to be believed in a matter of great importance, stepped forth into the assembly. Romulus (quoth he) O Quirites, the Founder and Patron of this City, even at this very morning at the day break, defended suddenly down from Heaven and met me, and as I stood all quaking for fear, ready to worship him, and humbly beseeching that I might behold him face to face: Away (quoth he) and tell the Romans that the will of the gods in heaven is, that my City of Rome shall be the head and chief of the whole world: will them therefore to follow and practise chivalry, and the knowledge thereof: and wot this well, and so let them teach their posterity to wit. That no power in the world shall be able to withstand the puissance of the Romans. Which (said he) was not so soon spoken, but he ascended on high, and departed. A wonder it was to see, how much they gave credit to this mans tale, and how greatly the mis of Romulus both among the Commons and the Army, was by this belief of his immortality, digested,

In

A In this mean while the Senators fell to strive who should be King, and the desire of sovereignty troubled much and perplexed their minds. But yet, there was no banding nor siding from any one person in particular: for that in a State so newly risen, and of so small continuance, there was not one that far excelled another in authority. All the contention was between the two several factions in general. For they that were deluded of the Sabins, fearing left because after the death of Tarquin there was none of their party, that had reigned with Romulus in equal jurisdiction, they should now lose their possession and title to the Crown, were desirous to have a King chosen out of their corporation. The old Romans again might not abide an alien or forrainer to be King. Howbeit, thus diversly affected as they were, a King they all will needs have, as who (God wot) had not yet raised the sweetness of liberty and freedom. Besides, the Nobles began to fear left per adventure in case the hearts of many Cities thereabouts, should not be well disposed, but left against them, some forraign power would make invasion, finding the City without government, and the army without a Captain. Therefore they all liked well to have one head, but none could find in his heart to give place unto another. Whereupon the hundred Senators associate and combine together in the rule of the Common-wealth, by dividing themselves into ten Decuries, and for every Decury chusing one to bear the chiefe authority. So that ten governed at once, but one alone had the regal Ensigns and the Victors before him. This sovereignty and preeminence determined every five days: and thus went it through them all round in course. After which manner, they continued the space of one year. And the government upon this occasion was (as it is still at this day) called Interregnum. Then after a year began the Commons to grudge and mutter, that their servitude was greater then before, having now Lords over them, an hundred for one: and feared they would no longer endure, but have a King again, yea, and one of their own choosing. The Senators seeing them thereabouts, and taking it to be good policy for to offer that of their own accord, which they were otherwise like to forgo, turned to say unto them in this wise, to wit, by granting the chief prerogative unto the people (in chusing a King) yet so, as they gave them no greater privilege, then they reserved to themselves. Forthus it was decreed, that when the people had elected a King, it should stand firm and ratified, if the Senators liked thereof, and gave thereto their royal assent. And even at this day in making of Laws, and chusing of Magistrates or Rulers, the same right is in some sort observed, setting aside the violence of Tribunes. For that now before the people give their voices, the Senators passe by their authority, that which they would have done, fall it out in the assembly of people, by acrimony, doubtful as it will. To proceed then, the Interregent having called a general Parliament: In the name of God (quoth he) O Quirites, and which may be to you good, lucky, and prosperous, elect, or nominate ye a new King: for so is the good pleasing of the Nobles and Senators: and in case ye shall elect a man of such quality, as may be deemed worthy to succeed Romulus, then will they by their assent paie the same, and allow thereof. This pleased and contented the Commons so highly, that because they would not seem behind in bounty and courtesy, they answered again, that this only they ordained and agreed upon, to wit, that the Senate should determine who should be King of Rome. There was in those days one Numa Pompilius, much renowned and esteemed for his just life and religious: for he dwelt in Cures, a City of the Sabins, a man right skilful and very well seen (as any one might be in that age) in all Laws both divine and humane: whose reacher and first matter, for want of other Author of his Science and Knowledge (they say) but yet untrue, was Pythagoras of Samos. Concerning whom, this is well known, that he 100 years after and above, in the days of Servius Tullius King of Rome, held a School of young men Students, that were his Disciples, and followed his Sect. In the utmost and farthest coast of Italy, about Metapontum, Heraclaea, and Croton. From which places (albeit he had lived in that time) whatfame of him could spread so far as to the Sabins? or by what enter-courte and assiduity of language might he possibly have trained any man unto him for desire of learning at his hands? or by what good means and help, could Numa travel alone unto him in safety, through so many countries, of divers tongues and sundry manners? I am of this opinion rather, that the man by nature was framed and disposed to vertue, and that he was instructed, not so much in strange and forraign Sciences, as after that strict rule, that stern and severe discipline of the ancient Sabins: then whom, the Senators hearing the name of Numa, although they saw well enough, that the Sabins were like to prove of great reputation and power, by chusing their King from among them, yet was there none of them so audacious, as to prefer either themselves, or any one of their party and faction, nor any one, I say, Senator or Citizen, before that man: but all in general with one accord, agreed to confer the Kingdom upon Numa Pompilius. V. he being first for and come like as Romulus at the founding of the City was inaugurate King, or attained to the Crown by means of Augurys also he would needs, that the will and counsel of God should be sought for, touching his own election. Whereupon he was by the Augur (unto whom for ever after that public Ministry or Priesthood, in regard of honor and reverence by patent be owed) brought unto the Cattle hill, and there he set him down upon a stone, with his face toward the South. Then the Augur on his left side, with head covered, took his place: holding in his right hand a smooth staff without knot or knob, and hooded towards the top, which they called lituus. From whence after that he had with good advice, taken a prospect and view towards the City and Country, and made his prayers unto the gods, he limited the quarters of the Heaven, from East to West: and the parts Southward he appointed for the the right hand, and thole Northward for the left. And fo far as ever he could caſt his eye and fee H forward, he imagined to himſelf a mark: then ſticking his ſtaff into his left hand, and laying the right hand upon Numa his head, he prayed in this form: O Father Jupiter, if it may be right and law- ful, that this Numa Pompilius, whole head I lay my hand upon, ſhall be King of Rome, ſhew I be- ſeech thee ſome certain and manifeſt ſigns within that compaſs and thole precincts, that I conceived and ſet out. Then pronounced he in plain words what tokens by ſight or ſight of fowls he would have to appear. Which being once ſeen, Numa was declared King, and ſo came down from the Temple or place of proſpect aboveſaid.

XIX

In this manner, being inaugurate and inveſted in the Kingdom, he provideth by good Orders, Laws, and Cuſtoms, to re-ediſe, as it were, that City, which beforetime had been new built by force and arms. Whereunto, he ſeeing that they might not be brought and framed in time of war, whole hearts were already by continual warfare grown wild and ſavage: and ſuppoſing that this fierce people might be made more gentle and tractable, through uſe of arms, he therefore built the Temple of Janus in the nether end of the ſtreet Argiletum, in token both of war and peace: with this invention, that being open it ſhould ſignifie, that the City was in arms: and ſtanding ſhut, that all the neighbor countries were in peace and quiet. Twice only after the reign of Numa was this Temple ſhut: once, when T. Manlius was Conſul, after the firſt Carthaginian war was done and ended: and a ſecond time (as God would) in our age for us to ſee, when as the Emperor Cæſar Auguſtus, after the battel of Actium (with Antonius and Cleopatra) had obtained peace both by Land and Sea. Numatus having knit the hearts of the borders about him in firm league and amity, K and thereupon, cloſed up the doors of Janus, ſecured now from all fear and care of dangers abroad, yet doubting left through eaſe and idleneſs their minds might fall to looſeneſs and riot, whom the dread of enemies and martial diſcipline had held in awe and good order: deviſed above all things to ſtrike ſome fear of God into them, and to plant religion in their hearts: policy no doubt, with the ſimple multitude (rude in thoſe days and ignorant) moſt effectual. Which reverence of God, for that it could not ſink nor enter well into their heads, and take a deep impreſſion, without ſome device of a ſeined miracle, he made ſemblance, and gave out, that he converted in the night ſeaſon, and had, I wot not what, ſecret conference with the goddeſs Ægeria. By whole counſel and direction forſooth, he ordained ſuch divine ſervice and ſacrifices to the gods, as to them was moſt acceptable: and to every god appointed ſeveral Prieſts for the miniſtry thereof accordingly. But firſt A he have all other things he divided the year, according to the courſe of the Moon, into twelve months: and for as much as the Moon hath not full thirty days to every month, whereby ſome days are wanting to make up the juſt year, after the revolution and circle of the Sun: he, by putting the odd days between every month, diſpoſed and ordered the year, that in every three and twenty years ſpace the days agreed juſt to the ſame point of the Sun from whence they began, and ſo made up the void ſpaces, and accompliſhed fully the term of every year. He appointed likewiſe law days and days of vacation, called Faſti and Neſtaſti, thinking it good, that otherwiſe there ſhould be reſt from attendance on the Courts, and no dealing with the people. After this, he ſet his mind about the creation of Prieſts, albeit in his own perſon he performed very many ſacrifices, eſpecially thoſe which at this day pertain to the Prieſt of Jupiter, called Flamen Dialis. And ſuppoſing that in a City ſo martial, there ſhould ſucceed more Kings like to Romulus than Numa, who in proper perſon would go forth to war: left haply the divine miniſtry that belonged to the King, might be neglected, he created a Flamine to Jupiter, for to be a ſacrificer continually reſident: endued and adorned him with a rich cope or veſtment, and with an ivory chair ſet off upon wheels, called Sella curulis. Unto him he adjoined two Flamines more: one for Mars, another for Quirinus. He inſtituted alſo a Num- mery, as it were, of religious Veſtal Virgins. A Prieſthood that had the beginning from Alba, and ſured well with the houſe, from whom the firſt foundation of the City was defended. And to the end they ſhould attend continually about the Church, as reſeant Chaplains, he allowed them an ordinary ſee or penſion, at the publick charges of the City: and made them by perpetual vowed virginity and other ceremonies to be revered and accounted holy. Likewiſe unto Mars Gradivus he N elected twelve Prieſts called Salii, and gave unto them a rich purple cope, embroidered for an ornament, and to wear upon that coat a brazen breſt-plate, and to bear certain cutcheions or bucklers that fell from heaven, called Ancilia: commanding them to run about the City, chanting hymns and ſongs, with dancing and leaping full ſolemnly. Moreover, he choſe for a Superintendent or high Prieſt, Numa Ma- nus, the ſon of Marcus, one of the Senators: and to him he gave in writing ſet down under his hand and ſeal, a rule, whereby he might know what beaſts ſhould be killed for ſacrifice, upon what days, and at which Temples, and how the money ſhould be levied and diſburſed for the defraying of all charges. All other ſacred rites as well publick as private, he ſubmitted and referred to the diſcretion and ordering of that high Prieſt: to this end, that the common people might know unto whom they were to reſort for counſel and inſtruction, and that no part of O Gods worſhip and ſervice ſhould by neglect of the ancient rites and traditions of their own country, be confounded and corrupted by bringing in any ſtrange and forſaigen ſuperſtitions. He ordained beſides, that the ſame Arch-Prieſt ſhould teach, not only the heavenly ceremonies, but alſo ſeſonal obſequies, and how the ſpirits beneath, and ghoſts of bodies departed, ſhould be quiered and pacified: and what ſtrange and prodigious tokens, that came by way of lightning, thunder, or any other fearful ſight whatſoever, ſhould be expiate and purged by ſacrifice accordingly. And for

Ancilia.

A for to know the truth, potted by theſe tokens even from the minds of heavenly ſpirits above, he conſecrated unto Jupiter Elicus an altar upon the mount Acetivus. And by the means of Augury, he conſulted with that god, what things he was to enterprize and go about. Whilst the whole multitude was thus drawn away, and even turned from thinking of force and arms, and buſied about deviling and ordering of theſe matters, not only their minds were occupied in doing ſomewhat, but alſo the continual fear of God now ſetled in them; (as being perſwaded that the heavenly power was preſent in the managing of mens affairs) had poſſeſſed now all their hearts with ſuch piety and religious holineſs, that faithful promiſe once made, and the reverence of an oath taken, abandoning all fear of law and puniſhment, was able to rule and govern the City. And B as the people ſealed and reformed themſelves to the ſaſhions and manners of their King, as the only and ſpecial pattern to follow: ſo the nations likewiſe bordering upon them, who beforetime verily thought that City to be built, and as it were, enſlaved in the midſt of them to the dilu- biance and diſquieting of all their peace, were now become ſo reſpective of them, that they thought it an impious and ſinful deed, once to offend or offer abuſe to that City, ſo well given, and devo- ted to the worſhip and ſervice of God. Furthermore, there was a grove, the midſt whereof was watered continually by a ſpring that iſſued out of a dark and ſhadowed cave: into which, becauſe Numa C was very oft to retire himſelf alone, without any other, as it were, to have familiar com- pany with Ægeria, he dedicated that grove unto the Muſes, for that, their affluence alſo in coun- ſel and advice he deſired together with his wife Ægeria. And to Faſtulus he inſtituted a ſo- lemn yearly feſtival day, and erected a chapel: Unto which he commanded the Flamines to ride in an arched or embowed cloſe Chariot, drawn with two horſes, and to ſacrifice and execute their function, with their hands covered and wrapped cloſe to their fingers ends: ſignifying there- by, that ſuch is to be kept and preſerved: and that her ſeat was ſacred and conſecrated even upon their ſight hands. Many other ſacrifices, and places for ſacrifice, which the Prieſts call Argeæ, did he appoint and dedicate. But of all his acts this was moſt worthy and memorable, that during the time of his reign he had no leſſe regard to preſerve peace, than to maintain royalty and domi- nion: Thus two Kings one after another, taking either of them a ſeſeral courſe by himſelf, that one by war, this other by peace, mightily promoted the welfare of the City. Romulus reigned 37 years, Numa 43. So that now the City became very populous, as being well and equally tem- D pered both with ſeats of arms, alſo with diſcipline of peace.

Upon the death of Numa the regiment returned again to an inter-reign. Then the people no- minated and elected for their King, with the royal aſſent of the Senators Tullius Hoſtilius, the Ne- phew or Grandſon of that Hoſtilius, who had in times paſt fought valiantly againſt the Sabines, at the foot of the Caſtle hill. This man was no, only unlike the former King, but alſo more fierce and hardy than Romulus himſelf. For beſides the heat of youth, and ſtrength of body withal, the glorious remembrance of his Grandfather ſet him on, and pricked him forward. Suppoſing therefore that the City through reſt and eaſe began to age, as it were, and to decay, he ſought every way to pick quarrels, and to give occaſion to make war. It ſortuned, that the Peaſants about Rome, and thoſe of Alba likewiſe, preyed upon and ſpoiled one anothers land. At that time C. Clautius was Lord E and King of Alba. From both parts well near at one time, were Embaſſadors addreſſed to demand reſtitution of goods, and ſatisfaction for their harms. Tullius Hoſtilius he had ſtrictly charged his meſſengers to have no dealing with the Alban Prince, before they had delivered unto him their meſſage. For well he wiſt, that he would make denial, and yeeld no amends: and then might he with ſafe conſcience juſtly proclaim war againſt him. On the contrary ſide, the Alban Embaſſadors followed their buſineſs but ſlackly, for being courteouſly invited, and friendly entertained by Tullius, and lodged within his palace, they were well content to be ſeated by the King, and were his daily gueſts ſo long, that the Romans had by this time both challenged their own right, and the ſeſeral demand made by the Alban King, given defiance and proclaimed open war within thirty days next enſuing. Upon which tidings by them related to Tullius, he gave the Alban Embaſſadors audience, per- mitting them to declare what their errand was, that they came about. "They (ſimple men) ignorant F of that was done, firſt ſpent time in excuſing themſelves, ſaying they were very loth & unwilling to ſpeak ought that might diſpleaſe Tullius, but being commanded by authority, they might not ſo wil nor chuſe: and therupon were come to make claim of goods & amends for wrongs, and if they were not reſtored and recompence made they had comiſſion to denounce war againſt him. Whereunto Tullius made answer in this wiſe, "Tell your King and Maſter (quoth he) that the Roman King calleth the gods to witneſs, whether of the two Nations ſent the Embaſſadors away firſt, and rejected them when they demanded reſtitution, that upon his head they might bring the miſery, loſs, and calamity of the preſent war. With this diſpatch the Albans returned home. So they made preparation of forces on both ſides all that they could, moſt like all the G world to a civil war, between fathers and ſons, proceeding both from the Trojan race: conſidering that by Trojans Lavinium was founded: ſrom Laſtium came the people of Alba: and from the Alban Kings were the Romans in right line deſcended. But the final end and of this war, made the war it ſelf leſs woeful and lamentable, both becauſe they came not to a ſeſel field, and alſo for that by raſing the houſes only of the one City, two nations were intermingled & united in one. The Albans firſt with a mighty power entered the Territory of Rome, and encamped themſelves not paſt five miles from the City, where they ſtrongly entrenched themſelves: which place of the Captains name was called * Foffus Chullus, many years after until both it and the name with-ended his days, in whose stead the Alban army created Mettius Sufferius their Dictator. Tullius in the mean time became haughty and proud, especially upon the death of the King, oftentimes giving out and saying, that the mighty power of the gods, having thus begun as the very head, would likewise take vengeance on the whole body of the Alban Nation, for their unjust and godless war: and one night above the rest passed secretly by the camp of his enemies, and in warlike manner invaded the Alban land. This news raised Mettius out of his standing camp. Who led forth his army and marched on as near to his enemies as he could, dispatching abroad an Herald unto Tullus, to notify unto him thus much from him, that it was needful and expedient before they joined battle to parle and commune together. If he would vouchsafe to confer, he knew very well, that he should allege and lay forth such matters, as might concern the Weale of the Romans, as well as of the Albans. Tullus refused not the offer, albeit they were but vain toiles that were pretended, and therefore set his men in battell array. The Albans in like manner came forth against him.

 After they were thus ranged and embattelled ready to fight, the Generals on both sides, accompanied with a few of their principal Nobles, advanced between both armies. Then began the Alban Dictator in this wise: "Me thinks (quoth he) I hear already of injury and wrongs done, and how such goods as were demanded are not restored again according to the form of the league, as also that Chullus our King was cause of this war: neither doubt I, O Tullus, but even you pretend, and are about to allege as much. But what we would as we ought to do, stand upon the truth of things, rather then upon I wot not what glosses, and goodly shewes of words: it is ambition and desire of rule only and nothing else, that putteth on two nations of one blood and next neighbors to take arms and war one with another: justly or unjustly, I am not able to say. Let him on Gods name that first began the quarrel, in conscience see to that. As for me, the Albans indeed have made me their General. But this one point Tullus, I would have you to remember and consider: How strong about us and you especially the Tuscans are, you know better, the nearer they are unto them: mighty they are by land, much more by sea. Then wot well this, that when you shall cause the Trumpet to sound unto battle, these two armies will be to them a fair mark and spectacle to behold: that they may give assault to both at once, as well the victors, as them that are vanquished, whilst they are wearied and toiled out of heart. For the love of God, if there be any park of grace in us, since we not contented with that liberty which we surely enjoy, will needs venture and put in doubtful hazard, which of us shall rule and command, and who shall serve and obey the other, let us take some good course whereby it may be decided without great loss or bloodshed on both sides, whether shall be Lord and Sovereign. The motion Tullus liked not, albeit both for disposition of nature, and hope of victory, he were the haughtier of the twain. And as they fought on both parts what way to take, this means at length they found, whereunto fortune it self presented fit matter and occasion. For by good hap even then, in either host three brethren twins there were born at one birth, and thofe neither in age nor strength unlike. Their names were Curatius and Horatius, that is very certain, neither is there any thing of ancient record more famous and notable. Yet as clear in substance as it is, there remaineth still some doubt and error in their names: of whether people the Curatius and the Horatius were. Writers there be on both sides, but the greater number say, as I find, that Horatius were the Romans, to whom I rather incline, and my mind giveth me to follow them. With these three brethren the Kings were in hand, perswading them to fight for the honor of their country, and try the quarrel by dint of sword: shewing them, that on whether side the victory fell, there should remain the sovereign dominion. Nothing refused they to do, the time and place both were agreed upon and appointed. But before the combat, it was covenanted between the Romans and Albans, and these conditions drawn: That whose champions in fight should have the better, that nation should peaceably command the other. There are of covenants many and sundry. Capitulations far different in matter: but they run all after one manner and form. As for this, it was N made, as we have heard in this wise, neither is there extant a more ancient record of any composition whatsoever. The Herald (called Fecialis) demandeth of King Tullus in this wise: Is it your will and commandment my Lord, That I make a covenant and accord with the Paterpatre of the Alban people? It is (quoth the King.) Then (quoth he) I demand of you sacred herbs, The King answered again, Take them pure and clean. The Fecialis then reached from the Castle hill pure herbs from among the grass: which done, he thus asked the King: Do you (my Lord) ordain me the Messenger Royal of the Commons of the people of Rome? and allow necessary implements, all furniture for my self, and my retinue and train? The King answered: I do, so far forth as may be, without the harm or detriment of my self, and of the Citizens of the people of Rome. The Feci- al or Herald for that time, was Marcus Valerius, who created Paterpatre a King at Arms. Sp. O- Fusus, by touching his head and hair with Vervain. Now the Paterpatre is for to confirm the agreement with an oath, and so he read out the covenant and oath, and that with many words: which to rehearse, as they were in a long prescript form pronounced, were very needles. After this having recited all the Articles and conditions thereof. "Hearken (quoth he) O Jupiter, listen thou Herald for the Albans, attend also and give ear ye the Alban people, how these conditions from the first to the last, have been read aloud out of those Books or Tables of wax, without

A "coven, or fraud, and how at this day they are most rightly meant and understood, according to the tenure of the words: from these articles I say, shall not the people of Rome start back hirt, nor make default: If they shall first go back and fail therein by publick consent, and fraudulently: that day, O Jupiter, imite thou the City of Rome, as I to day will strike this swine: yea, and imite thou home to much more, as thou art more able and powerful then my self. And after he had thus said, he smote the swine with a flint stone. The Albans likewise repeated their prescript form of words, and the oath, by their Dictator and Priests for the purpose. The complements of the covenant and composition thus performed, and all concluded, then thofe three brethren of both sides, as it was before agreed, buckle to arm themselves. And being encouraged on both hands, by their well-willers and friends, that put them in mind of their country gods, their native soile and parents, saying, that all their fellow Citizens and country men whatsoever, both at home in the City, and abroad in the camp, every one had their eye only upon them, their weapons and their hands: the young men being both of themselves by nature forward and lusty, and also emboldened with the comfortable words of their friends, advanced forth between both armies. Now were the two hosts set on both sides before their camps, rid of present danger, rather then void of care and pensiveness. For why? the whole trial of sovereignty and rule, rested in the valour and good speed of a few. Whereupon they longing to see the sequel and issue, were wholly bent to behold, and only minded this unpleasant sight and spectacle. At found of Trumpet these brave brethren, three to three like as they had been two to two battels, and carrying the stomachs very of two great armies, affronted one another and with cruel and mortal weapons gave the charge. Neither regarded they their own proper peril, but first before their eyes, only the rule or servitude of the Common-weal as if the fate of their country from thenceforth lay wholly upon their good or bad success in this action. So soon as they began to cope together and make assault, that their helmets and weapons once clattered, and their drawn swords home and glittered again, behold such an exceeding fear came upon the beholders, that they trembled and quaked withal: and during the time of equal combat, seeing no inclination of victory to the one side or the other, they were loatoned, that hardly they could well speak or freely take their wind. Afterwards, when as they were come to hand-to-hoaks, and that now not only the stirring of their bodies, and the doubtful handling of their weapons and armor, but bloody wounds also were seen, two of the Romans D (having fore wounded all the three Albans) fell down one upon the other, and yielded up the ghost. At whose fall, the Alban host shouted again for joy: but the Roman legions, albeit they were now past hope of victory, yet they were not void of care being amazed, and an extasie as it were, with very fear what should become of him, who being but one, had three Curatius upon him at once. But as good hap was, he as yet was fresh and unwounded. And as he was not able alone to make his part good with them altogether, so in single fight, man to man, he thought himself good enough for them all, one after another. To single therefore, and to part them in fight, he begins to flie, thinking thereby they would follow after him, each one as his hurt body would give him leave. Now when he was retired a pretty good way from the place where they fought, and looking behind him, espied them following far afunder, and one of them not much behind E himself, he turned again upon him with great violence. And whilst the host of the Albans cried out to the Curatius to rescue and succour their brother, Horatius by that time had slain his foremost enemy, and was in hand with the second. Then the Romans with such a shout, as they are wont to make, who after a great fight recover themselves and take heart again, encourage their champions: and he himself hasteneth to finish the combat. And before that the third, who was not far off, could get to the other, he had slain the second Curatius. So that now there was but one to one, left to fight on even hand: and they, neither in hope nor strength equally matched. As for the one of them, his body as yet not wounded, and his double victory withal, caused him to attempt the third conflict stoutly and courageously. The other faint and feeble of his hurt, tired with running, had much ado to come forward, and quite out of heart, seeing his two brethren lie slain at F his feet, offered himself as a prey to his victorious enemy: for surely between them was no fight at all to speak of. The Roman he triumphing and crying out for joy. Two brethren already (quoth he) have I sent to the Divil, the third likewise shall I send after them, that a Roman may command an Alban, which is the cause of all this war. And therewith he thrust his sword aloft into his throat, who had much ado to hold his weapons: and so soon as he was down, stript and rifled him.
 The Romans with great triumph and gratulation, receive Horatius rejoicing to much the more, as his safe was more dangerous and well need deperate. Then of both sides address they themselves to bury their champions, but not with like cheer and alacrity of heart. For why? they of the one part were become Lords, and they of the other, Subjects. Their tombs remain yet to be seen in the very places where they were each of them slain, two of the Romans entombed together G in one place near unto Alba: the three Albans towards Rome, but distant afunder, like as they fought and left their lives. Before they dislodged and departed thence the one from another, Mettius, according as it was capitulated in the composition, asked and demanded what Tullus would command him to do: who enjoined him to keep his youth ready in arms at an hours warning, for that he would employ them in service, in case he should war with the Veientians. So were the armies dismissed home. And Horatius he went forth, bearing afore him the threefold spoile of three brethren, Whom his Sister a maid affianced before to one of the Curatius, met before Capena gate: &

Horatius killed his sister.

The judgment of Horatius.

P. Horatius the Father to the people.

clipping upon her brothers shoulders, the coat of arms of her espoused husband, which the her self had wrought with her own hands; the unbowed her head, let her hair loose, and pitiously caud upon her dead spouse by name. This lamentable wailing of the sister presently upon victory, and amidst to great and public joy, moved the proud and haughty young man to wrath, and drawing out his sword therewith, ran the silly damsel through: and with these bitter words rebuketh her also, Get thee hence (quoth he) to thy spouse with thy unseasonable and foolish love, forgetful as thou art, of thy two brethren dead, and him that is alive: forgetful of thy native country, and the honor thereof: and so with a mischief go she, whatever she be, that shall bewail an enemy of Rome. A cruel and horrible fact this seemed, as well to the Senators, as to the Commons: but his late and fresh desert made it the less trespass: yet for all that was he apprehended, and brought before the King. The King, that he might not seem the author of a judgment so unpleasant and odious unto the people, and consequently of punishment according to the doom, assembled the people together and said: I ordain Duumvirs to sit upon Horatius, in trial of a criminal cause of felony, and to judge him according to the law, in that case provided. The tenor of the law runneth thus, in dreadful kind of form, [The Magistrates called Duumvirs shall judge the party accused in a capital action of felony, if he shall appeal from the Duumvirs, let him traverse his appeal, if they overthrow him, then hoodwink him, or cover his head, hang him upon a cursed Gallows tree by a rope, and strangle him, having whipped and scourged him before, either with him the Pomary or without.] By virtue of this law were the Duumvirs created, who by their power of that law thought they might not quit so much as a guileless person: and having once condemned him, then one of them gave sentence and said: I judge thee O Publius Horatius a murderer and an enemy to the state of Rome. Go Liſtor therefore, and bind his hands together. Then came the Liſtor and cast a cord about them, but Horatius, by the advice of Tullius, a gentle and mild interpreter of the Law, I appeal (quoth he.) So upon his appeal was the matter debated, and to be tried before the people: who were not a little troubled in deciding or judging this cause, and most of all in regard of Publius Horatius the Father, crying out and saying, "That he deemed his daughter was justly and worthily killed: otherwise he would himself have punished his son by his fatherly authority. Being moreover, that they would not now make him childless, whom erewhile they saw with a goodly company of children about him. And therewithal the old father embracing the young man, and shewing the spoils of the Curvatis, set up and hanging in that very place which now is called Pila Horatia, i.e. Horatius his Pillar. And can ye indeed (O ye Romans, quoth he) abide to see him bound under a Gallows, yea, and whipped and tormented, whom a while afore ye beheld to march in great glory and jollity for his achieved victory? So unfeemly and foul a sight as which, the Albans themselves can hardly suffer. Go Liſtor, go bind those hands fast, which "armed a little before, won the people of Rome their dominion: Go I say, and hoodwink his head "who saved and delivered this City from bondage, hang him by the necks, and strangle him upon "a cursed tree: scourge him and spare not, either within the circuit of the walls, so it be among "those javelins and spoils of the enemies: or without the walls, so it be within the compass of the "Curvatis Sepulchres. For to what place can ye lead this young gentleman, where his honorable acts may not save him from so unworthy and shameful punishment? The people could no longer endure, either the tears of the old father, or the constant resolution of the youth his son, who shewed himself still the same, and not to change for any danger. So they quit him, in the honorable regard rather of his prowess and valor, than in the right and equity of his cause. Yet to the end that the murder so manifest and openly known, should be in some sort expiated, and satisfaction made therefore, his father was charged to purge his sons sin, and make amends, at the expences of the City. Who having performed certain purgatory sacrifices, which afterward belonged to the house and family of the Horatii, put a rafters or beam cross overthwart the street, and caused the young man with his head covered to go under, as under a yoke of gallows: which remaineth yet unto this day, from time to time at the City charges repaired, and they call it Sororium Trogillum, i.e. The Sisters beam. And in that very place where Horatius was wounded and fell down, her tomb was erected of four square stones.

But not long continued the Albans in quiet and peace. For the common people finding fault and greatly discontented, that the whole state of the Weale-publick was put into the hands of three soldiers, infected so, and poisoned the vain and brittle head of the Dictator: that for as much as plain and upright dealing sped no better, he began to win again the hearts of his Commons by crooked means, and indirect courses. Seeking therefore war in time of peace, as before in time of war he fought peace: and seeing his people had more heart then hand, and their strength not answerable to their stomachs: he stirred up other nations, openly by way of proclamation and defiance to make war, and reserved his own men under a colour of league and confederacy, for to practise treason and falsehood. The Fidenates, a Colony of the Romans, having made the Veientians partakers of their counsel, and combined with the Albans to forsake the Romans, when time came, and turn unto them, brake out and took arms. When Fidene had thus openly revolted, Tullius sent for Metius and his power from Alba, and lesteeth forward against his enemies: and passing over the river Anio, encamped near the confluence, where both streams meet together. Between which place and Fidene, the army of the Veientians had crossed the Tiber, who put themselves in the right wing of the battel fast by the river, and the Fidenates in the left,

A left nearer to the mountains. Tullius directly opposeth his own forces against the Veientians, and placeth the Albans to affront the Fidenates. The Alban Captain having as little heart as honesty and truth, neither durst keep his standing, nor openly turn unto the enemy, but by little and little withdrew himself toward the mountains: and when he thought he had gained vantage enough, he mounted up the hill with all his companies, and with a wavering mind to spend the time, displayeth his ranks. His intent and purpose, as on what side fortune seemed to give the better, with them to join and take their part. The Romans that stood next, perceiving their flanks naked by reason of the departure of their friends and allies, at first marvelled much at the matter: but afterwards there galloped an horseman, and advertised the King that the Albans were gone away. Tullius in this so fearful and dangerous case, vowed twelve Priests Salus and two Temples to Palor and Pavor, i.e. to Paleness and Fear: and with a loud voice cried out in the hearing of his enemies, commanding the said horseman to return to the battel, saying, There was no cause at all to fear, for that himself had commanded the Alban host to wheel and lurch about, and so to charge the Fidenates on their backs where they lay open. Willing him especially moreover, to cause the men of arms to hold up their lances on end. By which means, a great part of the footmen could not see the Albans as they departed and went their ways. And those that had seen them, thinking it was a truth which they heard the King to speak, fought so much the more boldly. So the King turned now from them, and fell upon the enemies: for they heard the King when he spake so loud, and also a great many of the Fidenates being co-habitants with the Romans, under Tullius Latine. For fear therefore, that the Albans should all on a sudden run down from the hills, and stop their passage to the town, they turned their backs and fled. Then Tullius prefieth hard upon them, and having discomfited the Fidenates wing, cometh back more fiercely upon the Veientians, being already amazed at the flight of the other. Neither were they able to withstand the brunt. Howbeit the river behind at their backs kept them at first from flying away, but afterwards when their flight bended thitherward: some flinging their weapons shamefully away, like blind men, ran headlong into the water: other lingering till, and taying on the bank side, doubtful whether to flee, or to stick to it and fight, were trod under foot, and hewne in pieces. Never had the Romans before that day a more cruel battel. Then the Alban army, which beheld and saw all this conflict, defended down into the plain. And Metius, forthwith, rejoiceth much on D Tullius behalf for this victory. Tullius again speaketh Metius fairly, and gave order, that the Albans in a good hour should join their camp to the Romans: and against the next day, prepared a purging or Lustral sacrifice. The morrow when it was day, and that all things were in a readines, according to the manner, he commandeth both armies to assemble together to an audience. The Criers, beginning at the farthest part of the camp, summoned the Albans first. Who also for the strangeness of the matter, and desirous to hear the Roman King to make his Oration, pressed forward to stand next. The Roman legion on purpose, as it was before decreed, stood armed round about, and hemmed them in: and the Centurions had in charge without delay to execute whatsoever they were commanded.

Then began Tullius to speak in this wise, "If ever in any war heretofore had cause, O Romans, The Oration E "to render thanks, first to the immortal gods, and then to your own manhood and valor, certainly it was in yesterdays battel. For ye fought not then with the force of your enemies more than with the treachery and falsehood of your friends and confederates, which is the greater conflict and far more dangerous. For to put you clean out of doubt, and to bear you no longer in hand with a wrong persuasion: The Albans went up toward the hills without my commission, neither was that my commandment, but a policy and countenance only of command: to this end, that ye not knowing how ye were forsaken, might not withdraw your hearts from fight, and also that your enemies weening they were environed behind, should be afraid and so enforced to flee. Yet are not the Albans all in general to be charged with this fault which I reprove. They did but follow their leader, as ye likewise would have done, if I had willed the march to have turned any whither from thence. It is Metius that was the guide and leader of F this journey, Metius is he that is the worker and deviser of this war, Metius I say it is, and none but Metius, the breaker of the Roman and Alban league. Butler who that will from henceforth presume hard to do the like, if I make not him a notable example to all the world. The Centurions stood armed round about Metius, and the King stoode on with the rest of his speech as he began, and said: "That which I pray God may turn to the good prosperity and happiness of the people of Rome, of my self, and you the Albans, I am minded to reduce all the Alban nation to Rome: to endue the Commons with the freedom of the City: to advance their chief Gentlemen to the order of Senators, and to make one uniform City and Common-wealth: that as in times past the Albans state, out of one body was divided into twain, so now it may be united and become one again. At these words the Alban youth unarmed, and beset on every side with armed men, albeit they were distracted in mind, yet were they forced with a general ear to keep silence, and hold their peace. "Metius Sufsums (quoth Tullius then) If thou couldst have learned to keep allegiance promise, and covenants, thou mightst have been taught it at my hands with life. But now since thy forward nature is incurable, teach thou by thy fearful example and death all mankind, to hold and repute those things for sacred and holy, which have by thee been broken and violate. Like as therefore erewilles thou barest a double heart in doubt, ful balance, between the Fidenates and the Romans state: even so streightways shalt thou yield thy body to be drawn alunder, and plucked into two peeces accordingly. Then forthwith he called two teames of four houltes to belet to, and Meius to be stretched out and tied unto the chariots to them belonging. Afterwards were the hories driven a contrary way, and carried with them in both chariots the body torn in peeces as far forth as the limbs hung fast together by their cords and ligaments: which made all men avert their eyes from beholding so cruel and horrible a spectacle. This was the first and last punishment that ever the Romans executed with so little respect or none at all (to say a truth) of the laws of humanity. In all other they may lawfully make their boast, that no nation in the world hath been lesse delighted and pleased with extremity of torment.

While the thetethings were in doing, there had been certain horsemen sent afore to Alba, to translatte the multitude to Rome. After whom were the legions also of the toomten thither led, to rafe and destroy the city. At whose entrance within the gates, there was not that stir nor fearful hurry, as usually is seen when cities are loft: and when with breaking down the gates, beating and battering the wals with rams and other engines, forcing the citadel, the enemies shout, and the armed souldiers, run to and fro in the city, killing and slaying, firing and burning all afore them as they go: but a sad silence, and a fill kind of sorrow and penitencels so possessed and attonied all their minds; that for fear forgetting what to leave behind them, or what to take with them, without advice and counsel, one asking another what to do, they one while stood in their house entrees, another while ran up and down wandering in their houltes, as if their last day had been come. But so soon as they heard the horsemen cry aloud, and command them with menacing to void and depart, and that now the rattling of the tiles and flates from off the houltes, as they were a pulling down, was from the furthest part of the town heard: and that the dust raised from places far off had as it were with a cloud overcast and filled all: then every man came flying up hastily, and carrying forth what he could, leaving their domestic algods, leaving their houltes wherein they had been born, bred, and brought up, departed forth: so that now they filled the streets as they went close on a row together, and the light one of another with mutual committeration, redoubled their tears and wofull complaints. Yea, and pious mone and lamentations were heard of women especially, as they passed by their fair and itately husbands, bder with souldiers, and abandoned their gods as it were captives and prisoners. After the Albans had thus quitted the city, down went the Romans every where with the buildings as well publick as private, and laid them even with the ground, and so in one hour destroyed and raised four hundred years work, for so long had Alba stood and flourished. Howbeit the temples or the gods they spared, for so the king had given commandment, Rome all this while rich by the fall of Alba. The number of Citizens increased double: to enlarge the city the mount Celuis was annexed to it: and that it should be better peopled and more inhabited, Tullus added his royal seat and palace there, and therein from that time forth he kept his court. The chief Citizens of the Albans he advanced to the order of Senators: that he might augment that state also of the Commonweal: namely, the houltes of the Tullij, Servilij, Quintij, Geganij, Curius, Celsij: and for that degree and order of Senators by him encreased, he built an hall or new court, called until our fathers dayes Hofilia curia, i. Hofilia court. And that all estates and degrees might out of this new people be somewhat strengthened, he chose from out of the Albans ten troops or cornets of horsemen, and with the same supply he both fulfilled the number of the old legions, and also made and enrolled new.

War with the Sabins.

Tullus upon this affiance he had in his strength and power denounceth war against the Sabins, a people in those dayes of all other most puissant and mighty, both in men and munition next the Tuscans. Wrongs had been done, and outrages committed on both parts, and restitution or amends demanded, but to no effect. Tullus found himself grieved, that divers occupiers or merchants of Rome, at an open mart or fair of great resort before the temple of Verona were laid hold upon and apprehended. The Sabins on the other side complained, that their men notwithstanding they took sanctuary in a certain sacred and priviledged grove, were arrested and in hold at Rome. These were the quarrels and occasions pretended of the war. The Sabins well remembering, that not only part of their own forces was by Tullus translated to Rome, and there planted, but also that now of late the puissance of the Romans was well amended by the supplement of the Albans, began likewise for their part to cast about, and seek for help abroad, and forraign aids. Now was Tuscan their neighbour nation, and of the Tuscans the nearest unto them were the Veientians. From thence they gat certain volunteers to take their part: by reason that their minds already were well disposed to revolt upon old grudges and ran our remaining (till of the former war past) otherwise also vagarant and idle persons of the rascal sort, and needy commons, were faine hired for money. But as for any succour from thence by publick consent of the state they had none at all. So much prevailed even with the Veientians (for in the rest it was less marvel) the faithful covenant of race concluded with Romulus. Now when these preparations of war were made on both sides to the uttermost of their power, and that it stood upon this point, That they were like to have the odds and vantage, who should begin first, and enter the field: Tullus prevented the enemies and invaded the Sabine land. A sharp and bloody battel was there fought under the wood Aracusa. Where the Romans bare themselves bravely that day, much upon the valour of the Legiatory foot-

A footmen, but more upon the strength of their men of arms, whose number lately was augmented: for by the suddain and forcible charge of the horsemen, the battel of the Sabins was broken, their ranks so disordered, that they could neither hand nor foot together to fight it out, nor yet spirited themselves to fly, without great slaughter and bloodshed.

The Sabins, defraved by the Romans,

The Sabins thus vanquished, and the kingdom of Tullus and the whole state of Rome, being very glorious and wealthy: behold, news came to the King and Senators, that in the Alba mount it rained stones: which hardly was believed, and therefore certain men were sent of purpose to see this strange and prodigious sight: who might plainly behold stones to fall thick out of the skie like as when some terrible winds drive hail in big round balls upon the earth. They imagined mourning, that they heard a great and mighty voice out of the grove from the very top of the hill crying unto them, and warning the Albans to do sacrifice and divine service according to the rites and ancient manner of their forefathers: which they had discomitted and forgotten as if together with their country they had abandoned their gods; and either taken to the Roman fashion, or eliebearing angry with fortune (as it is commonly seen) forgot and neglected the worship of the gods altogether. The Romans likewise upon that miraculous sign, for the purging and expiation thereof, celebrated solemn publick sacrifices for the space of nine dayes, called a Novendia: either because they were moved thereto by that voice from heaven (for that also is reported) or took direction from the Soothsayers that pry into the inward of beasts. Certain it is, that a solemn custom remained still unto this day, that whensoever word cometh of the like wonder, they keep holiday nine dayes together. Not long after this, the pestilence rained in the city, and albeit the people began thereby to slack souldery and military service: yet would not this martial principle give them rest and respite from war: being of this mind, that the bodies of young men were more healthy in armour, abroad in the open field, than at home in the city under covert: until home at length fell sick of a long and lingering disease. Then that haughty and congruous to make of his, together with his lully and able body, became so abated, that he would scarce before thought nothing lesse bestowing a king, than to let his mind, and busy his brains about religious ceremonies: now all upon a sudden became wholly devoted to all kind of superstition both more and lesse; yea, and filled the peoples heads besides with holiness and devotion. So as now the very common sort withing again for the old world, under the reign of king Numa, were fully perfwaded, that there was no other remedy left for their sick and diseased bodies, but to obtain at Gods hands grace and pardon. Men say, that the king himself in perusing and turning over the Commentaries and registers of Numa his predecessor, and therein finding certain hidden and solemn sacrifices that had been unto Jupiter Elius retired himself, and kept close within a house to celebrate the same. But for that this holy service was neither begun aright, nor duly administered, he had not only no divine apparition and heavenly vision presented unto him, but also incurred the heavy displeasure and wrath of Jupiter, whom by his preposterous religion he had thus disquieted: and so both himself and his whole houlte were consumed with lightning. This Tullus, in great glory and renown of martial prowels, reigned two and thirty years.

When Tullus was dead, the government returned again, as it was from the first beginning ordained unto the Senators: who named an Interregent, and he called a Parliament, wherein the people elected Ancus Martinus for their King, and the Senators gave their assent thereto. This Ancus Martinus, was Numa Pompilius his daughters son, who so soon as he was come to the crown, both in remembrance of his grand-fathers glorious government, and also in regard of the reign of his next predecessor, which in other points right excellent and commendable, in this onely failed, and was not so happy: either for that religion was neglected, or not with due ceremonies exercised: and thinking it a thing most necessary, and of greatest moment, to redound all publick divine service and sacrifices to the first institution of Numa, he commanded the Arch-priest or High-priest to make an extract, and transcript of all the sacred rites and mysteries out of Numa his Commentaries, and ingrois them into one table, and to publish them a-ford unto the people: whereby both his subjects and citizens desirous of peace, as also the States thereby adjoining, were in good hope, that the king would altogether conform himself, and take after the customs and ordinances of his grand-father.

Hereupon the Latin, with whom in King Tullus his dayes a league was made, took heart unto them, made inroads into the country about Rome, and fetched out booties. And when the Romans demanded restitution, they made them a proud answer, supposing belike, That the King of Rome would pass the whole consue of his reign in ease and idleness, sitting still in his chappels, and by his holy altars. But Ancus was of a meane and indifferent disposition by nature, having an eye as well to Numa, as to Romulus, and compelled as it were of both. For over and besides, that he thought peace more expedient and necessary for his grandfathers reign, the people being as then but new risen, unsettled, and fickle: considering also, that himself should not easily, without taking wrong, enjoy the quietness which to him happened: for that his patience was already tried, and not onely tried, but also despised: and seeing that the State of the present time was fitter for a Tullus to be King, than a Numa: yet to the end that, as Numa in time of peace instituted ceremonies of religion, so he might likewise set out to posterity others concerning war: and that wars should not be onely made, but also denounced and proclaimed orderly, and in some religious form of solemnity: he he set down in writing that law and formal order, by virtue whereof restitution is demanded (which at this day the Feciales or Herald observe) like as he received it from the ancient people Egrii.

The Embassador Feial, coming to their borders, at whose hands the goods are required again, covering his head with a bonnet or vail of woollen yarn, saith thus: Hear O Jupiter, give ear ye limits and confines (naming them of such and such a Country) let Justice and Right bearken also to what I shall say: I am the publick messenger of the people of Rome, of a just and religious embassage am I come, and so my words give credit. After this, rehearseth he all his demands, and then calleth Jupiter to witnes, saying, If I unjustly and impiously demands, that such persons should be delivered, or such and such goods be rendered unto me, the publick messenger of the people of Rome: then let me never return again to enjoy mine own country. These words rehearseth he, as he fetterth foot, and steps into the confines: the same also he speaketh to him whomsoever he meeteth first: the fellest words he pronounceth, as he entrench within the gate of the City: yea, and when he is come into the market place he saith the same, changing and varying in some few tearms, from the prescript form of the demand, and taking the solemn oath. In case then, the persons whom he requirerh, be not yielded after 33. days expired (for so many juls are usually granted) then proclaimeth he war in this wise. Hear O Jupiter, and thou Juno, Quirinus thou: ye celestial Saincs all, and terrestrial powers, ye infernal spirits also, listen and give ear. I call you all to witnes, and protest before you, that this nation (naming them whosoever they be) is unjust, and doth not according to right and equity. But of these matters will we consult at home in our own country, with our elders, and ask their advice how we may come by our own. Herewith returneth the messenger unto Rome for counsell, and presently the King would in these or such like words, sitting in Council with his Peers, move them in this manner. Whereas the Paterpatrat or Herald, in the behalf of the people of Rome, and their Quirites, hath treated with the Paterpatrat, or Herald, in the name of the ancient Latines, and with the folk of the ancient Latines, concerning certain things, differences, suets, and causes thereupon depending: which things they have neither yielded nor paid, nor performed and done: which ought to have been paid, yielded, performed, and done: what is your judgment? speaking to him, whose opinion first he asketh in this case. Then (saith he) My advice is, that those things be sought for, and recovered by mere force, by just and lawful war. This do I fully agree unto, this do I determine resolutely. After him were the other asked in counsell: and when the greater number of them who were present accord thereunto, then by general consent, they were wont to proclaim war in this order: That the Feial or King at Arms should go with a javelin, having an iron head, or with a red bloody spear burnt at the end, as far as to their borders or marches: and there in the presence of three witnesses at the least, not under fourteen years of age, should say thus: Whereas the people of the old Latines, and the old Latine folk, have perjured and trespass'd against the people of Rome and the Quirites, and whereas the people of Rome and the Quirites have so determined, consented, and agreed, that war should be made with the ancient Latines: I therefore together with the people of Rome, do denounce and proclaim, and make war with the nations of the old Latines, and with the old Latine folk. And when he had thus said, he lanced his spear or javelin within the confines of the enemies. After this manner then, was restitution demanded of the Latines, and war denounced or proclaimed: which order of proceeding, M their posterity by tradition received.

Anus having committed the charge of divine service and sacrifice unto the Flamins, and the other Priests, levied a new Army, went forth into the field, and by force won Peltorinum, a City of the Latines. And following the usual manner of the former Kings his progenitors, who had mightily increased the Roman State, by admitting their enemies into the number of Citizens, transported the whole multitude from thence to Rome. And because the ancient natural Romans inhabited Palatium, the Sabins about the Capitol and rock Tarpeia, and the Albans dwelled in the mount Calvus: therefore the hill Aventine was allowed this new company to dwell in. Unto whom not long after, there came fresh inhabitants to people it, upon the winning of Tellene and Ficava. But after this, the Romans were driven to recover by war Peltorinum again: for that whilst it stood void and empty, the old Latines had surprised and taken it. Which was the cause, that the Romans destroyed that City quite, that it should not be at all times a receptacle for the enemies. Last of all, when as now the Latines war was driven wholly and brought before Medullia, there for a good while was much ado, and doubtful issue of fight, and interchangeably victory: for that the Town was both well fortified with bulwarks, and furnished with a strong garrison of men: and also by reason that the army of the Latines being incamped in plain and open ground, had sundry times with banners displayed, encountered hand to hand with the Romans. At the last Anus bending his whole power against them, first gave them an overthrow in a set battel: and so having gained rich pillage, returned to Rome. At that time also were many thousands of the Latines received into the City: Who to the end, that the Aventine and Palatium should meet together, were appointed to seat themselves about the Temple of Mars. The Janiculum likewise was adjoined unto the City, not for want of ground, but because it might not be at any time a fortress and hold for the enemies: which was thought good to be united unto the City, not only with a wall, but also for more commodious passage to and fro, with a wooden bridge over Tyber. The Quirites foils or ditch also, no small defence against the easie access from the plain grounds, was a work of Anus. Thus the state being grown

A grown to exceeding strength and bigness: when as now in so huge a multitude of people there was much confusion, and no difference of well doing or ill, and thereby many mischiefes and outrages began secretly to be committed: for to refrain therefore with some terror, such boldness increasing daily more and more, there was a goal or common prison built in the heart of the City, even over against the common place of assembly. And in this Kings days not only the circuit of the City was enlarged, but also their Lands and Territories. For by reason that the forrest Macra was conquered from the Valentians, their Signory reached to the Sea: where, in the very mouth of Tyber was the town H. flus built, and the salt pits made there about, and upon such noble exploits by arms achieved, the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, was in more ample and glorious manner repaired.

In the reign of Anus, there came to dwell at Rome one Lucumo, a pregnant nimble headed man, and a wealthy, upon a desire especially and hope of advancement and honor, which at Tarquinius (where he was born, although defended of foreign parentage) he had no means to attain unto. The Son he was of D. marcius the Corinthian, who upon civil troubles and dissensions having fled his country, and by chance planting himself in Tarquinius, there married a wife and had issue by her two sons, named Lucumo and Aruns. Lucumo survived his father, and became heir of all his goods. Aruns died before his father, leaving his wife behind him, conceived with child: neither lived the father Dema-tus long after his son, who not knowing that his daughter-in-law and sons wife was with child, made no mention at all of his Nephew in his Will, and so departed this world. Whereupon the child after his Grandires decease being born to no part of his goods, for his poor condition, was called Egerius. But Lucumo on the other side the sole heir and inheritor of all, as he began by his wealth to be haughty enough, and to look aloof, so he grew much more proud for his matching in marriage with Tanquilida dame of a right noble house defended, and who could hardly bear a lower estate and degree than that wherein she was born. When she was one married, and saw the Tulcan to disdain Lucumo, for that his father was a stranger and banished person, she could not endure that indignity. But forgetting all kind of affection to her native country, so she might see her husband raised to high promotion, she resolved and plotted to leave Tarquinius and depart. To which purpose and design, Rome seemed a place most fit and convenient of all others. For thus she projected and discurf: That in a City lately founded, where D all kind of Nobility suddenly cometh up, and ariseth from virtue and prowess, her husband a valorous and industrious man must needs have place, and be entertained: that King Tantius a Sabin born, had reigned there: that Numa was from Tures sent for thither, and called to the Crown: that Anus also a Sabin by his mothers side, had the only image of Numa to shew for his Nobility. Thus the soon periwaded him, as being a man ambitious and desirous of honor, and whose mother only was a Tarquinian born, and therefore he was to make less scruple of abandoning the place of his Nativity. Thereupon they removed with all they had to Rome. And it turned that to Janiculum they came. Where, as Tarquinius sat with his wife in the chariot, behold an Eagle came gently flying down from aloft, and took up his bonnet from his head, and soaring over the chariot with a great noise, and clapping of her wings, as if she had been sent from Heaven to do this feat, set it gently and handsomly on his head again: which done, she mounted on high, and flew away. Tanquil, as they say, embraced this Augury with great joy, being a womankind, as commonly all the Tulcan are, in such prodigious sights and apparitions from heaven: and therewith taking her husband about the neck, wished him to be of good cheer, and to hope for great matters and high preferments: saying, how that bird came from such a quarter of the heaven addressed as a messenger from such a god, and shewed a divine token and preface upon the highest part of man, even the top of the Crown, and lifted up the ornament that stood upon his mortal head, to give it him again immortal, as from God above. In these hopes and cogitations which they entertained by the way, they entered the City: where they took an house, and from thence forth he was commonly called L. Tarquinius. Now within a while both his new coming, and his wealth withal, made him well known: and himself also besides, for forward his good fortune by courteous and fair speech and affable language to every man, by friendly envying, and liberal seating, and by making what friends he could by gifts, favours, and good turns: so far forth, as the fame of him came into the Kings Court: where, by his willing service and singular dexterity, in short time he had not only access to the Kings knowledge, but also entered into familiar acquaintance and friendship with his Highness. Insomuch, that both in private Councils and publick consultations, as well at home as abroad, he was always present, and bare a great flock. And having in all kind of offices carried himself with credit, was in the end by the Kings last Will and Testament made Tutor or Protector of his children: Thus reigned Anus 24. years, for glory and reputation of his age government, as well in war as in peace, equal to any of the former Kings his predecessors.

Now were his sons near 14. years of age when he died, Tarquinius therefore made the more haste, that the high Court of Parliament should with all speed possibly be summoned for creation of a King, which being against a day proclaimed, he sent away the boys to the chafe a hunting, at the very instant of the said election. He himself (as men say) was the first, that both ambitiously fought for the Crown, and also for to win the hearts of the Commons, devised and framed an eloquent Oration, "Saying, it was no new and strange thing that he stood for: And why he was not the

"the first (that any man should be offended, or make any wonder) but the third alien that in Rome
 "affected and aspired to the Kingdom: that both Tullius, not of a foreigner only, but of an ene"my became King: and Numa likewise, a man unacquainted with the City and matters of State,
 "was without any sute or seeking of his party by the Romans sent for: & advanced to the crown.
 "As for himself, he alleged and said, that from thence time that he was at his own liberty and dispose "of himself, he with his wife & all that he had, removed and came to Rome: and of that age wherein "men are employed in civil affairs, he had spent a greater part in Rome, then in his own ancient "country. Moreover, that he was trained up both at home in the City and in war abroad, to the "knowledge of the Roman laws, orders, and customs, and that under no mean person but an ex"cellent master, even King Ancus himself. And finally, for faithful service and diligent attendance
 "about the King, he had endeavored to pass all others: and for liberality and courtesie towards
 "all others, he had striven to go beyond the King. These and such like allegations, as he laid forth
 "and pleaded, and that right truly: the people of Rome with exceeding great content elected him "their King. Who being a man other wise of singular parts and of great worth, as he was ambitious
 "in seeking the kingdom, so continued he still, when he wore the crown: and minding no less to es"tablish his own state and throne, than to maintain the good estate of the Common-wealth, he ad"vanced one hundred more to the order of Senators, who afterwards were called Minorum Patres, as a men would say, Senators of a later sort, and meaner quality. A fiction, no doubt to take "part and side with the King, by whose means they had been admitted into the Senate. The first war
 "he made, was with the Latins: from whom by force he won the town Ardea: from thence ha"ving brought away a greater pillage in proportion, than the war imported in brute, he set forth ga-
 "mings and plays more stately and with greater furniture and provision, than the other Kings before "his time, Then was the plot or compals of ground first let out & appointed for the lists or theater, "called now Circus maximus wherein were assigned scaffolds for the Senators, and for the Gentle"men or Knights severally by themselves, called Fori, where they might make them places to see the "pastimes at their ease and pleasure. And in this manner stood they to behold: namely, upon scaf"folds born up twelve foot high from the ground with forked perches or props. The gamings were "running of horses, ... fighting at fists and buffets: for performance whereof, there were champions "sent for of purpose, especially out of Tuscan. These sports continued afterwards from year to "year in great solemnity, and named diversely, either the Roman games, or the great Games. This "King moreover assigned certain places about the Forum or common place for private men to build "in where the galleries and shops were made. He went in hand likewise to wall the City about with "a stone wall, but the Sabin war staid him in the beginning, that he went not forward with that "work. This came so suddenly upon him, that the enemies were passed over the river Anio, before "the power of the Romans could meet them, and make head against them. Whereupon great fear
 "there was at Rome. And at the first a cruel conflict there was, and much blood shed on both parts,
 "but no appearance of victory. But after the enemies were retired once into the camp, and that the "Romans had time to gather fresh forces, Tarquinus supposing his only want was in his cavalry, "determined to join unto the Rhamneses, Tuicenes, and Luceres, which Romulus had ordained, other
 "Centuries or Cornets of horsemen, and then to leave unto the posterity after him, bearing his M "own name. Which because Romulus had done sometime by the counsel and advice of Angus, Ancus
 "Navius renowned and famous in those days for his skill that way, oppoed himself and gave "out plainly, that there might be nothing changed or newly ordained in that behalf, unless the birds
 "first approved and allowed the same. Whereat the King was wroth, and in scorn and derision of his "art, as they lay: Come on Sir Soothsayer (quoth he) agreed, and tell me by the flight of your birds, "whether that may possibly be done, which I now conceive in my mind. To which demand Navius,
 "who had first made proof thereof by his learning, answered resolutely, that it might in a very deed be "effected. Why then (quoth he) I have imagined in my conceit, that thou shalt cut a whetstone a-
 "sunder with a razor: Heretake them to thee, and dispatch that which thy fowls forewarn may be "done: then as the report goeth, without more ado, he cut the whetstone quite in two. And in that "very place where this feat was done, the Statue or Image of Ancus was erected, with his head co"vered, even in the Comitium, at the stairs thereof on the left hand of the Curia or Council house. It is "reported that the whetstone also was set up in the same place, for a memorial to all posterity fol"lowing, of that miracle. Certainly, both Anguries, and the Priesthood and Colledge of Augurs from "that time forward was so highly honored, and had in such reverence, that never after was there "ought done, either in war abroad, or in peace at home, but by their counsel and advice. Assemblies "of people summoned were dismissed, armies levied and ready to take the field were discharged,
 "yea, and the greatest affairs of State, were given over and laid aside, when the birds allowed not "thereof. Neither did Tarquinus for that time alter the Centuries of the horsemen any whit, only he "redoubled the number, so that in three Centuries or Cornets there were 1300, horse: and those "later sort who were added to the others, bare the names of the former, which at this day, because "they be double, are called the six Centuries, Tarquinus thus having encreased that part of his power,
 "bade the Sabins battle the second time. And over and besides, that the Romans army was in "strength well amended, he devised also privily a subtil stratagem, and set certain men to let on fire
 "a mighty flock of wood, lying upon the bank of Anio, and so to cast it into the river: the wood "burning still by the help of the wind, and most of it being driven against the piles of the bridge,
 "and

A and there sticking close together with the boats and planks, fired and consumed it clean. This ac"cident both terrified the Sabins in their flight, and when they were discomfited, troubled them
 "much, and hindered their flight: so that many a man having escaped the enemy, yet perished in the "very river. Whose armor and weapons floating down the river, were known at Rome, and brought "news thither of this victory, in manner before word could be brought thereof by land. In this "conflict the horsemen won greatest price and praise. For being placed at the skirts of both the "wings, at what time as the main battel of their own footmen, were now at the point to retire
 "they charged so forcibly upon the enemy (as it is reported) from the flanks where they were mar"shalled, that they not only stayed the Sabin Legions pressing hard and fiercely upon those that be"gan to shrink and give back, but all at once put them to flight. The Sabins stay again towards the "mountains, but few got thither: for the greater number, as we said before, were by the horsemen
 "driven into the river. Tarquinus thinking it good so take the time, and follow hard upon them
 "whiles they were frighted, after he had sent to Rome, the booty with the prisoners, and burned on
 "a great heap together (as he had vowed to Vulcan) the spoils of the enemies, marched on still for"ward, and led his army into the Territory of the Sabins: who albeit they had already sustained an "overthrow, and could not hope for better success, yet because they had no time to consult and ad"vise with themselves, with such a power as might on a sudden in that fit be raised, met with him.
 "Where they once again were defeated and vanquished, and in the end being in despair to make "their part good, they sued for peace. Then was Collatia, and all the lands about it taken from the "Sabins, Egerius the Kings brothers son, was left with a garison at Collatia to keep that place. And "as I find upon record) the Collatins were yielded into his hands, and the manner of their sur"render went in this order. First, the King demanded thus and said: Aye ye Embassadors, or de"puted assigns sent from the people of Collatia to make surrender both of your selves and the Colla-
 "tines? We are (quoth they.) And are the people of Collatia in their own power, and at liberty to do "what they will? They are (say they.) Do ye also render up your selves, the people of Collatia
 "their town, their territory and lands, their waters, their limits, their temples, their household stuff
 "and implements, and all thing else, as well sacred as profane, unto my power and the peoples of "Rome. We do yield (say they.) Then (quoth he) do I accept thereof, and receive all into my hands.
 "The Sabin war thus finished, Tarquinus returned to Rome in triumph. After this, he waited "upon the old Latines, but they never proceeded so far on any side, as to join issue in a general bat"tle, and one set field for all. But bringing his power first to one town, and after to another, he "made a conquest of the whole nation of the Latins. So as the towns, Corniculum, old Ficulna, "Camptia, Crustumium, Ameriola, Medullia, Nomentum, were recovered from the old Latines,
 "or from those that had revolted unto them.

After all this ended peace, Then was he more earnestly bent to go forward with his works,
 "begun in time of peace, then he was before busied in managing of his wars: inasmuch, as he gave
 "the people no more repose at home, then he had in wars abroad. For besides that he prepared to
 "compals the City (which as yet he had not fortified) round about with a stone wall, the beginning
 "of which piece of work was by the Sabin war interrupted and broken off: he devised also certain
 "E draughts or vaulted finks from aloft into the Tyber, whereby he drained and kept dry the bafe City,
 "or lowest grounds about the market place, and the other vallies between hill and hill, for that
 "out of the plains and flats, they might not easily make riddance and conveyance away of the wa"ter. Moreover, he levelled a large court or plot of ground, ready for the foundation of the Tem"ple of Jupiter in the Capitol, which he had vowed in the Sabin war, his mind even then giving him,
 "that one day it should be a stately place.

At the same time there hapned in the court a wonderful strange thing, both in present view,
 "and also in consequence. For as the report went, a young lad, whose name was Servius Tullius,
 "he lay asleep, in the sight of many persons had his head all on a light fire. And upon an outcry raised
 "at the wondering of so great a matter, the King arose: and when one of the household brought wa"ter to quench the flame, he was by the Queen stayed. And after the fire was somewhat appeased,
 "she forbade the boy to be disquieted, until such time as he awoke of himself: and within a while
 "as the sleep deeped, the blaze likewise went out, and vanished away. Then Tanquil the Queen
 "taking her husband aside into a secret room. "See you this boy (quoth she) whom we so homely
 "keep, and in so poor and mean estate bring up? Wot well this, and know for certain: that he will
 "one day be a light to direct us in our dangerous troubles and doubtful affairs: he will be the chief "pillar and support of the afflicted state of the Kings house. Let us therefore cherish and foster with "all kindness and indulgence the subject matter of so great a publick and private ornament. Where"upon, they began to make much of the boy, as if he had been one of their own children, and to in"struct and train him up in those arts, whereby forward wits are stirred to great enterprises, and to
 "C achieve high place of wealth and honor. And soon came to that pass, which pleased the almighty "gods. For he proved a young man indeed of princely nature and towards in such sort that when
 "there should be a son in law sought out to match with Tanquil his daughter in marriage, that "was not one of all the young gentlemen of Rome to be found comparable to him in any respect. So "as the King affianced his daughter unto him. This forgot he not whereunto he was advanced upon "whatsoever cause or occasion it was, in duemth me to think he was not the son of a bond woman,
 "nor that he served whilst he was a little one, as a slave, I am of their mind rather, that report thus:

elder and younger fort, according to the computation set down by Servius Tullius, considering their numbers is now doubled. For having divided the City into four Wards, according to the quarters and hills; those parts which were inhabited he called Tribes, of the word Tribute (as Livius saith.) For he it was that devised and brought up the manner of equal contribution and payment, proportionably to the assessment and rate of mens goods. Neither were these Tribes any waies at all respective to the division or number of the Centuries aforesaid. When this Levy and taxation was finished, which he dispatched the sooner, by reason of the peoples fear of an act by him made, concerning those that should not come in to be registered and enrolled in the Subsidy book; he published an Edict, under pain of imprisonment and death, that all Citizens of Rome, as well horsemen as footmen, should the morrow after at the break of day, every one in his own Century, I shew himself in Campus Martius, as in Mars field. There, after he had mustered and embattailed the whole Army, he assailed and purged the same with the sacrifice of a Swine, a Sheep, and a Bull. And this was called Condium Lastrum. Which was the very cloing up and accomplishment of the assessment. In this Lastrum there were numbered and assessed 80000 Citizens. Fabius Pictor, a most ancient writer saith moreover, that so many there were of able men to bear arms. For to contain this multitude, it was thought good the City should be enlarged. Whereupon he adjourned unto it two hills more, to wit, Quirinalis, and Viminalis. After this, he proceeded to augment the mount Esquilis; and to grace that hill, and make it of more reputation, there he dwelt himself, and had his Court. He cast a trench and ditch, and raised a rampire about the City, and then walled it; by occasion whereof, he let out the Pomery further. Pomary, according to the Etymology and literal signification of the word, is as much to say as Postmarium, or the Arrivance, that is a plot of ground behind, or without the wall. But indeed it is rather a space about the wall on either side, which the Tullians in old time, when they built their Cities, used by advice of Augurs, to hallow and consecrate in certain bounds and limits, all along where they minded to set the wall: that neither within, the houses might joy upon the wall (whereas now adays they build close to and without all there might be a void piece of ground, lying common, free, and unoccupied of men. This vacant space, that neither might lawfully be inhabited, nor yet eared and plowed, as well because it was without the wall, as the wall without it, the Romans called Pomary. And ever as the circuit of the City was made larger, look how much the walls should be set out further, so far those hallowed and consecrated bounds of the Pomery were extended.

Thus the City being much increased in compass of building, and all things disposed in good order, requisite as well for war as peace; to the end, that he should not always seek to purchase wealth and puissance by war and martial prowess only, he attempted to amplify his dominion by policy, and withall to bestow upon the City some glorious ornament to beautifie the same. And even at that time was the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, of great fame, and much renowned: which as the report went, was built in common by all the states and princes of Asia. When as therefore Servius would use highly to praise and commend unto the Lords and heads of the Latines (with whom of purpose he had both in public and private, mutual entertainment and familiar acquaintance) that general agreement of the Princes of Asia, in matters of religion, and in the uniform worship of the same gods: at length, by much iterating and following (till that them, he prevailed with them so far, that the nations of the Latines, and the people of Rome together, built at Rome a Temple unto Diana: which was a plain confession, and clear case, that Rome was now the impeded neglected quite, and made no care at all thereof, seeing they had so often attempted it by force of arms, and sped to badly: yet fortune seemed to one only man to cast a favourable aspect, and yield good hope, by his private policy and industry, to recover again the imperial dignity unto the Latines. A certain householder, forsooth, of the Sabins, had, as they say, a cow bred with him of a wonderful bigness, and faire withall. (For a memorial of which so rare and wonderful beast the horns were set up, and remained fast fixed in the porch of Dianas Temple, many a hundred years after.) This was supposed (as it was no less in very deed) a strange and prodigious thing: and the *N*ew men or wizards prophesied, that the sovereignty and Empire should be settled and established in that State, whereof any one Citizen sacrificed that cow unto Diana. This prophetic came to the ears of the Priest of Dianas Temple. The Sabin above said, so soon as he had espied a meet and convenient day for sacrifice, drives the cow to Rome, and leads her to the Temple of Diana, and there presented her before the Altar: where the Roman Priest wondering to see a huge beast, the Sabin in this wise. My friend (quoth he) what mean you to sacrifice so uncleanly unto Diana, and do not rather pursue and wash your self all over in some running stream, before you come thither? Lo where Tiber runneth in the valley beneath. The stranger then, moved with some scruple of conscience, who desired nothing more, than that all should be well and orderly done, than a happy success might be correspondent and answerable to so prodigious a beast, forthwith went pleased the King and the whole City wonderful well.

Servius, albeit he were now without all question by so long continuance, fully and really invested in the Kingdom yet because he heard say, that young Tarquinius other while gave out speeches of him; that he reigned without the nomination and election of the people: therefore after he had first

A first wan the hearts of the Commons, by dividing among them every one certain lands gotten by conquest from the enemies, he ventured to propound unto the people, and put it to their suffrages and voices, Whether their will and pleasure was, that he should reign over them. Thus was he declared King with as great content, as never any before with the like. But Tarquinius for all this, had nevertheless hope to aspire and attain unto the Crown: nay, rather so much the more, because he understood the said division of the lands among the Commons, was a thing concluded and passed against the will and mind of the Senators. Taking therefore occasion thereby to accuse and blame Servius before them, he supposed he had good means offered to wind himself into favor with the Lords of the Senate, and so to become strong in the Council-house. Over and besides, he chose both himself a young man of great courage and hot stomachs, and his wife likewise at home, dame Tullia, lay ever upon him, and picked forward his discontented and troubled mind: for you must think, that the royal Court of Rome also hath brought forth and conceived against the Kings governments, licentious and horrible acts: that by a weariness and loathing conceived against the Kings government, liberty and freedom might the sooner grieve: and that reign be the last, which was by mischief gotten. In this L. Tarquinius, whether he were the son or nephew of Priscus Tarquinius, is not very clear, howbeit, I would rather think with most writers, that he was his son. A brother he had, Aruns Tarquinius, a young gentleman of a mild nature. These two (as is aforesaid) had married the two Tullias, the Kings daughters; and they also themselves were in conditions far unlike. And happily it so fell out, that two froward and violent natures were not coupled together in wedlock: such was the good fortune, I believe, of the Roman people, that thereby the reign of Servius might continue the longer, and the City brought and settled in good order. The younger Tullia, a stout dame and a proud grieved and vexed much that her husband had nothing in him, no metal or matter at all, either to covet and desire, or to enterprise and adventure: her mind was fully set upon the other Targin, him she esteemed highly, and had in admiration, him she said to be a man indeed, and defender of royal blood. As for her sister, she despised and checked her, for that the having a forward and valorous Knight to her husband, at first, and seconded him not in audacity and boldness, as a woman should do. Well, in short time likeness and disposition soon brought them together, and as it is commonly seen, Naught will to naughts and fort be together. But the mischief and trouble that brought all up-side down, arose from the woman. For the using to have conference with her sisters husband, never ceased to speak badly, and to rail of her own husband unto his brother, and of her sister unto her husband. Affirming in good earnest, it were better both for her self to be a widow, and for him to live single, and without a wife, than for to be matched as they were, and through the craven cowardice of others to languish and come to nothing. As for her self, if the gods had given her an husband according to her own quality and worthiness, she doubted not to see, and that very shortly, the Crown in her own house, that now she feeth in her fathers. In this manner possesseth she quickly the humorous young man, and filled his head with her own rashness and follies. Now when Aruns Tarquinius, and the elder Tullia, who died just in a manner both at one time, had well rid their own houses, and made way and overture for a new marriage, it was not long but they were married, with Servius his leave and niversity, rather than his good liking. But then every day more than other began Tullius to be a continual mote in their eyes, his old age hateful, and his reign more odious: for now the woman minded nothing but one mischief upon another: and would not suffer her husband to be at rest night nor day, lest peradventure the former murders done and paid, should serve to no purpose, and mis the effect of their designments. And thus he brake out and said, That she wanted not before one that carried the name of an husband, with whom she served, and kept her self quiet and said nothing. But he had a want of one, that thought himself worthy of a kingdom: that remembered he was the son of Tarquinius Priscus, that loved better to be seized of a Crown and scepter indeed, than hope for a kingdom, and hear thereof. But first quoth the King if you be the man to whom I take my self wedded, then I call you both husband and king: it is not, then is our case changed for the worse, in that cowardliness is accompanied now with wickedness. Why resolve you not? why arm you not your self, and go about this business? you need not go so far as to Corinth or Tarquinii, for to seek and compels forrain kingdoms, as your father did. The gods of your own house and native country, the image and example of your father, the Kings Palace, and therein the royal seat and throne of estate, yea, the very name of Tarquin, createth, nameth, and sautech thee King. But an if your heart will not serve you to these designs, why bear you the world in hand and deceive them? why take you so upon you as you do, to shew your self as a kings son? Get you hence to Corinth again, away to Tarquinii, turn backward to your former flock and condition, more like to your brother than to your father. With these and such like motives, by way of reproof, she checked the young man, let him on, and picked him forwards, and the her self for her part, could be no more for thinking that Tanquil, an alien and stranger born, could contrive in her head, and effect to great a matter, as to make two kings together. one after other, namely, her husband first and afterwards her son in law: and the her own self, a Kings daughter, could bear no stroke either in giving or taking away a kingdom, Tarquinius kindled with these furies and temptations of a woman went about, laboured and made court to the Nobles, especially those that were Munus gentium: oftentimes putting them in mind of the pleasures and favours that his father had done them, and requiring now of duty the like good turn at their hands. The young men the flower flower and manhood in general of the City, he wrought and won to himself with gifts: and so partly with great promises, what wonders would he do, and partly with railing slanders upon the King in all places, and charging upon him odious crimes, he grew very great and mighty. At the last, chusing a convenient time to let on foot, and put in execution his intended projects, with a strong guard of armed men, he entered forcibly into the Forum or common place of assembly, whereto the people all surprized with great feare, he fat him down upon the King's throne, even at the entrance of the Curia or Senate house, and there, by the voice of the crier summoned the Senators to counsell before King Tarquinius. Who forthwith there assembled together: Some, thereto made and prepared aforehand others, for fear lest their not coming might turn them to displease. And as they were all seated at this strange and wonderful sight, so they thought Servius utterly undone, and his case desperate. There Tarquinius began an invective in spitefull & reproachfull terms, touching the first pedigree or parentage of Servius: saying, that he being a slave, born of a bondswoman, after the cruel and shameful death of his father Tarquius, usurped the Kingdom: not by means of an Interregnum as the order was aforetime, nor by a solemn assembly, and the free voices of the people, nor yet by the assent of the nobles, but only through the wile and fraud of one woman. And as he was quoth he thus born and thus created King, so hath he been a partial favourer of the basest sort even such as himself: and in hatred of the noble birth of others hath divided among the vilest persons, lands taken from the chief men of the City: and all such burdens and charges as had been in times past common to all, he hath call upon great personages of quality and worth, and let up an assailing or taxing, that the state of the wealthier persons being made known and exposed to envy, he might bring them into disgrace with the people, and below their goods upon the poorest and neediest at his pleasure. Amidst this Oration of his came Servius in place, advertised of the matter by a fearful messenger in all haste. And presently began to cry out with a loud voice at the very porch or entry of the Curia: What is here ado, (quoth he) and what meaneth this Oration? how darest thou during my life, assemble the Senators or sit on my seat? Whereunto he stoutly made a prond answer that he did but keep his fathers throne, and being as he was, a King's son, he deemed himself more worthy to be inheritor of the Kingdom than a bondslave: and as for him, he had been suffering long enough to play with his good Masters, and to insult over his betters. With this arose a great clamour from the partakers and complices of both sides: the people they ran from all parts to the Councill-house, and like it was, that the stronger should be King. Then Tarquinius being put to his shifts, and forced to try the utmost, seeing no other remedy, took Servius by the middle, as being himself much younger and stronger far, carried him out of the Councill-house and threw him down from the stairs head to the foot: and so returned again into the Senate-house, to get the Senators together. The Kings Officers with the guard attending upon him, fled. Himself well near dead, with certain of his outriers and train, breathless also for fear, made speed, and retired towards his Pallace as far as to the top of Cyprius street, where he was overtaken by them that were sent by Tarquinius, and so slain outright. And it is verily thought that this was done by the suggestion and procurement of Tullius: so little disagreeth it from other wicked pranks of hers. But this one thing is known for certainty, that she came riding in her coach into the common place of assembly, and nothing dismayed or abashed at the presence of so many men there met together, called forth her husband out of the Senate-house, and was the first that filled him with the title of King. By whom she being willing to depart away out of that throng and uprore as she returned homeward as far as the pitch of Cyprius street, where was of late a place consecrated unto Diana, called Dianium, the coachman that had the guiding and driving of the steeds as he turned the chariot on the right hand up to the cliff Vulturnus, for to pass up to the hill Esquilus: suddenly staid for fear and reined in his horses, and shewed unto his Lady and Mistress Servius lying there murdered. And hereof followed (as the report goeth) a beastly part, and beyond all fence of humanity, which the very place doth witness still at this day, called thereupon Sceleratus Pons: i.e. the wicked street: wherein the raging and frantic woman Tullius, hurried with the furies and haunted with the ghosts of her fitter and husband, caused (men say) her chariot to be driven over her fathers dead corps; and being herself besprinkled and beset with the bloody chariot, carried home with her some part of it in token and witness, that her hand was in this parricide and murder of her own father: to the end, that she might provoke her own domesticall gods and her husbands to wrath and displeasure: and so consequently, as they entered their reign with mischief and wickedness, they might soon after be turned out thereof with shame and infamy. Servius Tullius reigned four and forty years, in such wise carrying himself, as it were hard, even for a good and kind Prince that should succeed him, to follow his steps. This made moreover for his glory and fame, that together with him died all right and lawfull government of Roman Kings. And even that regiment of his, so mild, so gracious, and temperate as it was: yet because it given over had not this wicked intestine practise from his own family come between, to prevent and cut off his good designs and intent to let his country free.

After him began to reign Tarquinius, for his insolent acts (turnamed Superbus, i.e. the proud. For he would not suffer his wives father (unkind son in law he) to be interred: saying oftentimes in jibing manner, that Romulus also died and was never buried. Moreover, the principall heads of his Peers and Nobles, such (as he thought) had favoured Servius his proceedings, and took

A part with him, thole he made away and flew. Afterwards, fearing upon the guilt of his own conscience, that he had given an ill precedent for others, to take vantage against himself, attaining to the Crown so lowly; he retained therefore a guard of armed men about his body: and in every truth, setting only might aside, no other right had he to wear the diadem, as who reigned neither by peoples election nor Senators approbation. Over and besides all this, to the end he might fit lately in his seat by fear, let awe, and dread, who reposed no trust nor hope in the love of his subjects; therefore to strike the greater terror into them, and hold them in awe, he by himself alone without assistance of any counsell, late upon all matters of life and death: by means whereof he was able to kill, banish, and condemn in forfeiture of lands and goods, not thole only whom he suspected and hated, but also to them, from whom he could look for nothing else but spoi. Thus when he had decaied the number of the nobles especially, he purposed to chuse no new in their place, for to make supply: to the end, that the fewer they were, the more contemptible the whole order might grow: and with less discontent put up the indignity, that they were not employed in the State, nor ought done by their advi. For this King was the first that abolished the custome received and continued by all others afore him, of consulting with the Senate in all matters, & managing nothing without them. He governed the Commonweale by himself, and after his own waies: with whom it pleased him he made war and peace, league and society, even of his own head: & would break the lame as himself thought good: thus he did and urdid all at his pleasure, without regard of the peoples mind, or the Senates authority. Above all, he thought to win the hearts and good wills of the Latine nation, that by support or to retain power also, he might be more secure and safe among his own people: neither entertained he with their Prince friendship and amity only, but entered also into alliance and affinity with them. For unto Oetavius M. Minius a Tusculan, he gave his daughter in marriage. Thus Tullius was to all Latines the principall and noblest person, lineally descended (if we may believe true, common bruit and report) from Ulysses and Circé. By this marriage he gained many kinsfolk and friends of his new law. So that now Tarquinius was in great authority and reputation among the Lords and Barons of the Latines. Whereupon he gave them knowledge, and proclaimed, that upon a certain day they should all meet him at the sacred grove of Feronia, to treat and commune together about matters concerning the common good of both States. Thither resorted they in great number betimes in the morning. And Tarquinius himself staid not for his part to keep the very day appointed, but it was functioning well near before he came. There, in that assembly all day long before his coming, was much talk and reasoning, pro & contra, touching him. Tullius Herdonius of Ardea, had inveighed spitefully against Tarquinius in his absence (for his being away) saying, It was no marvel indeed that he was at Rome intramed Superbus (for even then commonly they termed him so, although secretly, and in whispering wise). For could there be (quoth he) a prouder part plaid, than thus to mock delude and abuse the whole state of Latiunum, that when their princes and nobles were cited there to appear, far from the Cities and dwelling houses he only shoud be absent that summoned the assembly? Which verily was but a device, to this to try their patience, that if they once took the yoke, he might keep them still under, as his vassals: for who leeth not what he reacheth at? even to command and Lord it over the Latins. And in such his own Citizens have done well, in trusting him in the rule over them (if a man may say they trusted him, and not rather that he came foully and forbaitly to them with shame, ill murder) the Latines also may put themselves into his hands with security. And yet like not why they should so do, considering he is a meer stranger and alien. But how and if, as own (inbreds) repents, and are discontented with him, being one after another by him murdered, banished, deprived, and spoiled of their goods? What better dealings may the Latines hope and look for? Therefore if they would be ruled by him they should depart home every man and not keep the day of the Diet no more than he doth that published and proclaimed it. Whilist this seditious and dangerous person, who by these and like factitious courtes was grown to be a great man and powerful in his country, stood arguing thus, inforcing and following hard upon other points, tending to the same effect in cometh Tarquinius. Whereupon he brake off his speech, and all was hushed. Then turned every man to salute and welcome Tarquinius: Who after silence made (being advise) by some of his familiars that were next unto him, to excuse himself for coming at that time of the day) said that he had been taken to be an arbitrator or daiesman between the father and the son: and because he was desirous and carefull to procure an attornment between them, and to make them good friends: he made the longer stay and came the later. Whilist this occasion of business, seeing it had disappointed them of that day, therefore the morrow after he would deliver that which he had in purpose and intended to move unto them. But Tullius (as they say) could not hold nor put up so much as this with silence: but brake out and said again there was no speedier deciding, and taking up of any matter, than between the father and the son: a thing that might be digested in few words: for if he would not obey and give place unto his father, he should abide the smart of it with a mischief. And thus the Ardeine having girded as it were, and glowed at the Roman King, departed out of the Assembly. Whilist this Tarquinius taking more patiently a good deal than he made semblance of, forth with devised and practised to bring Tullius to his death, that he might strike the same terror into the hearts of the Latines, whereupon he had kept under his own subjects at home. And for that he had no absolute power to cause him openly to be slain, he framed most fallily a criminall action against the guiltless man; thereby wrongfully to work his destruction. By means of certain Aricians of a contrary faction, he wrought a bondslave of Turnus with a sum of money, to suffer a number of swords privily to be conveyed into his Masters Inn or Lodging: which being done in that one night accordingly, Tarquinus (somewhat before day) sent for the chief Lords of the Latines to come unto him; and pretending as though he were might by some strange accident, said, "That his long tarrying the day before, (by Gods special providence, as it were,) appointed was for the safety of him and them all. For he was informed that Turnus contrived to maffacre both him and the heads of their nation, to the end that he alone might reign over the Latines: That he minded yesterday to have put this plot in execution, even in the very afternoon; but the deed was deferred, for that him- self (the principal author of that meeting) whose life he fought for above all other, was not in place; and hereupon it was (saith he) that he fared so as he did, and railed against him so bitterly the day before in his absence; for that he by his long tarrying had put him by his hope and the effect of his designs: and if all were true that was told him, he nothing doubted but early in the morning at break of day, to foen as they were fet in Council together, he would come armed and well appointed with a crew of his adherents and sworn confederates: for reported it is, (quoth he) that a number of swords & other weapons are brought into his lodging; which whether it be so or no might soon be known. And therewith he desired them to take the pains to go with him thither. And verily, considering the proud nature and haughty spirit of Turnus together with his yesterday's Oration, and the long stay of Tarquinus besides, for that the pretended maffacre seemed thereby to have been put off and prolonged, the matter became very suspicious and pregnant. Thus go they with minds verily (somewhat enclined and disposed to believe all, and yet so, as they would think all the rest but tales and lies, unless they found the swords aforesaid. Being come to the house, and Turnus awakened out of sleep, certain warders were set to keep him on every side: and when they had laid hold upon his servants, who for love of their Lord and Master began to make resistance, the swords were brought forth out of all the blind corners of the hostelry openly to be seen: then was it a clear case and past all peradventures: and Turnus was apprehended and irons clapt upon him. And immediately in all haste the Latines assembled together to council in that great tumult and uproar: Where, upon bringing forth the swords in sight before them all, they were so incensed and deadly bent against him, that he was not suffered to answer and plead for himself, but was presently at the source or spring head of the Ferentine water plunged down, and a hurdle done aloft upon him, and great stones heaped thereon, and so after a new kind of death stifled and drowned. Tarquinus then, after he had called the Latines again to the place of council, and much commended them for duly executing Turnus, who practising thus to alter and trouble the state, was detected of manifest intended murder, made this speech unto them: "I might quoth he if I would, by virtue of ancient rites alledge and plead, that forasmuch as all the Latines are descended from Alba, they are comprised within that confederacy and league, whereby in the reign of Tudus the whole Commonweal and State of Alba, together with their inhabitants, became incorporate into the Empire of Rome. Howbeit, in regard rather of the com- modity and weal-publike of all, I judge it requisite, that the league were renewed, and that the Latines might enjoy and be partakers of the prosperity and happy fortune of the people of Rome, rather than evermore to beizard and suffer the destruction and desolation of their Cities, with the spoiling and waiting of their lands, which first in Ancus daies they tasted, and after in my fathers time they had abidden & suffered. The Latines were heretofore periwaded. And although in that league the preeminence and sovereignty rested in the Romans, yet they saw well enough that both the Heads and Rulers of the Latine Nation stood with the Roman King, and were wrought unto his hand, to side with him: and also Turnus unto them was a fresh precedent and example, to teach them what danger might betide every one that should make a part against him and cross his intention. So the alliance was renewed and proclamation made according as it was capitulated, that all the serviceable men of the Latines should at a day appointed repair in good number with their armour unto the grove of Ferentina. Who when they were thereto met together from all parts according to the Edict of the Roman King, to the end they should have no Captain of their own to lead them, no privy watchword or regiment by themselves to direct them, nor private ensignes distinct from the rest to keep them together; he shuffled or mingled the bands and companies of Latines and Romans one with another, making one of twain, and two of one: and when he had thus doubled the bands, he set Centurions over them. And albeit he was in peace an unjust Prince, yet was he in war no bad Captain; nay, for martial prowess he had been equal to the former Kings, had he not failed and degenerated in other things, and thereby stained and hurt his glory even in that behalf. He was the first that warred upon the Volcians, which war after his time lasted more than 200 years: and was from by force Suffa Pometia, where having made portofale of the pillage and raised as much gold and silver as amounted to 40 talents, he conceived in his mind to build so stately a Temple of Jupiter as might become the sovereign King of gods and men become the noble Empire of Rome, and answer the Majesty also of the very place where it was to stand. And for the rearing and finishing of this Temple, he laid that money apart, that came of the spoil aforesaid. But presently upon this was he surprised with a war that held longer than he hoped it would. For having made one assault in vain upon Gabii, a neighbour City to Rome, and despairing also of any good success by beleaguering the town,

A for that he was valiantly repulsed from the wals, at the last he devised and resolved to get it by wile and deceit: a counse that Romans had not usually practised. For making as though he had given over and abandoned this war, as being now earnestly bent and busily occupied about laying the foundations of the Temple, and following other publique works in the City: Sextus his son, the youngest of three, fled on purpose to Gabii, complaining of his fathers intollerable rigour and cruelty against him: saying, "That now he had turned his accustomed pride from strangers upon his own blood, and was grown to be weary of so many children: that as he had made good hand and clean riddance of his Nobles, and left the Senate desolate, so he might bring it to pass in his own house, to leave behind him no issue nor inheritor of the Kingdom. And for his own person B verily he was elcaped from among the pikes and swords of his father, and was periwaded fully, "he might no where be safe in safety, but with the capital enemies of T. Tarquinus. For to put them out of doubt, and that they might be no longer abided, the war continued still against them, which seemed in outward shew given over and laid away: and his father would not fail, but whensoever he could spy his vantage and fit opportunity, come upon them at unawares. But in case there were no place of refuge and protection for poor & humble suppliants amongst them, "he would wander & travel all over Latium, and if he might not rest there, he would from thence go to the Volcians, Equians, and Hernicks, until he came to them that knew how to save the children from the cruelty and inhumane persecution of the fathers. Perhaps he should find means to stir coals and kindle war, yea, and perform himself good service against that most proud C King, and that most stout and insolent people. And seeming withall in great anger and discontentment, (if they would not regard his complaints) ready to depart and go his waies, he was kindly entertained and friendly entreated by the Gabians: who willed him to be of good cheer and not to marvel at all, that Tarquinus became now at length so ill affected against his own children, like as he had tyrannized already upon his subjects and confederates: for he would no doubt in the end exercise his fell homack even upon himself, for want of other subject matter to work upon. And as to him, right welcome he was to them, assuring themselves that within a while it would come to pass, that if he with them would set to his helping hand, they should remove the war from the gates of Gabii unto the very wals of Rome. After this he was admitted to sit with them in common counsell. In which he used oftentimes to say, "That in other matters he gave place, and referred himself to be advised by the ancient Gabins, as men more practised and experienced than himself; but for the war, which ever and anon he periwaded them upon, himself took upon him a special insight and skill therein, as that he knew the strength of both nations, and was fully periwaded in his conscience, that the Kings pride must needs be odious to his subjects, which his very own children could not brook and endure. Thus whiles by little and little he solicited the principall Citizens to rebell, and went himself daily in person with a crew of the most forward and able young men, foraging spoiling, and making rodes into the Territory of the Romans, and that now through his words and deeds, which tended to fraud and deceit in the end, they began more and more to give credit unto him that one day would deceive them: he was at last chosen General for the war. And having made certain small skirmishes between Rome and Gabii, in which for the most part the Gabins had the better (whiles the simple people, God wot, saw not his drift, and how he carried the matter:) then all the Gabins from the highest to the lowest, thought verily and in good earnest, that Sextus Tarquinus was sent them by special grace even from God above to be their Captain and Protector. But with the soldiers, what with attempting painful enterprises and performing dangerous service, and what with dealing prizes liberally amongst them, he passed how he grew into credit, and how dearly he was beloved: inasmuch as Tarquinus the Father was of no greater command at Rome, than Tarquinus the Son at Gabii. Thus when he saw he had gathered strength sufficient, and was fully furnished against all affairs; he dispatched unto his father at Rome, one of his trusty servants with a redence, to know his will and pleasure, seeing that the gods had done him this grace, that he at Gabii was able to do all in all. F This message made the King no answer at all by word of mouth, taking the man belike, as I verily think, for one hardly to be trusted. But as one musing with himself and in a deep study what answer to shape, he went into a garden on the back side of the house and his sons messenger followed after. There walked he up and down, and said never a word: only with his rod or walking staff, as it is reported, he knapt off the uttermost heads and tops of the poppies. The messenger weary with calling for an answer and waiting such attendance returned to Gabii as he came, and without effect of his errand. He reported what he had laid and seen, namely, how the King whether upon anger or hatred, or pride ingrafted by nature, uttered no speech at all. But Sextus knowing by these myttical and secret circumstances, his fathers will and direction made no more ado but flew the chief of the Citizens: some by accusations unto the people, and others by reason of dislike. G they were already in, and thereby exposed unto violence, were soon overthrown. Many of them were openly executed, and some, whom there was little appearance or colour of justice or none at all to accuse, were secretly murdered. Divers of their own accord fled into voluntary exile: or else they were forced into banishment; whose goods as well as theirs that were put to death were divided among the people, by sweetnets of this largesse of spoil by the profit and wealth that grew to private persons: the publick woe and calamity was nothing felt and keen: until such time as the Gabii whole estate despoiled of counsell, bereft of aid and succour, yielded without dint of sword unto the King of Rome.

Tarquinus having thus gained the town of Galer, made peace with the nation of the Æquians, and remitted the league with the Tusculans. After this he converted his mind to the affairs of the City, among which this was the principal, to leave behind him the Temple of Jupiter, upon the mount Tarpeius, for a monument and memoriall of his reign and name. That of two Tarquinus, Kings both, it might be said another day, that the father vowed it, and the son finished the same. And to the end that the floor and plot of ground, freed and exempted from all other kind of religions might wholly be dedicated to Jupiter and his Temple, there to be built: he determined to exaugurate and to unhallow certain Churches and Chapells, which having been first vowed, by King Tatius, in the very extremity of the battle against Romulus, were after by him consecrated and hallowed. In the very beginning and founding of which work, it is said, that the divine power and sovereignty deity moved the gods to declare the future mightiness of so great an Empire. For when as the birds by signs out of the Augurs learning, admitted and allowed the exauguration and unhallowing of all other cels and chapells besides, only in that of Terminus, they gave no token to confirm the unhallowing thereof: which was taken for an ominous preface, and thus interpreted, That seeing the fear and house of Terminus was not stirred, and he the god alone that was not displaced and called forth of the limits to him consecrated; it shewed that all should remain there firm and stable for ever. This divine token of perpetuity being received for good and current: there followed another strange and prodigious sign, portending the greatness also of the Empire. For as they digged for the foundation of the Temple, there appeared, as they lay a mans head, face and all whole and found: which sight imported no doubt, and plainly foretold, that it should be the chief Cattle of the Empire and the Capitall place of the whole world. To this effect prophesied the wizards, as well they of the City as those whom they sent for out of Tuscan, to know their opinion and judgment. Thus was the Kings mind all wholly left upon sumptuous building, and spared no cost. So that the pillage taken at Pometia, which was laid by for the accomplishment of the whole work, would hard and scant serve for the very foundation. And therefore I would rather give credit unto Fabius Pictor (to say nothing that he is the more ancient author of the twain) that there were but 40 talents, and no more, than to P. a. who writeth, that there was 4000 pound weight of silver set by for that use. Which sum or mals of money could never be looked for to arise out of the fackage of one only City in those daies: and mult needs exceed the charges of the foundation of any of these lately ad magnificent buildings in this our age. The King being thus wholly minded and bent to the finishing of the Temple, and sending for Carpenters, Masons, and other workmen, out of all parts of Italy, employed not only the Cities money and stock thereabout, but also had the work and labour of the common people withall, which was no small toil of theirs; considering the travell of warfare besides: yet were they less aggrieved and discontented therewith, so long as they founded and reared with their own hands the Temples of the immortal gods. But afterwards they were employed and set to other works, which as they were less in shew, so were they more painful and of greater trouble, namely, the making of scaffolds or standing-places in the Cirque or Theater; and to the conveyance of a mighty great sinke or vault under the ground for to receive and carry away all the filth and corruption of the City. To which two pieces of work, scarcely is the magnificence of our new modern buildings, in any respect comparable. Having in this wise held the commons in continual labour, because he thought that a multitude of people would but over-charge and pester the City, when they were not employed some way or other, and also minded by erecting Colonies, to enlarge the Confiners of his Dominions, he therefore sent part of them to inhabit and people Signa and Circeti, two strong forts and frontier towns for the defence of the City by sea and land.

Whilst he was busied in these affairs, there appeared unto him a strange and fearful sight, namely, a serpent gliding down a pillar of wood, which having put the beholders in great fright, and caused them to flee into the Kings palace, did not so much amaze the Kings heart with sudden and momentary fear for the present, as fill his head with perplexed cares what the thing might portend. Whereas therefore the manner was to use the Calebars and wise men of Tuscan about N publicke prodigions tokens only: he being much troubled in spirit, and terrified at this fearful sight, being domestick, and as it were touching and concerning his own person: purposed to send out as far as D Iphi to the most famous and renowned Oracle in the world. And for that he durst not put any other in trust with the answers that should be delivered by the fatal Iolls, he addressed two of his sons, to take a voyage through unknown lands in those daies, and more unknown seas into Greece. Tatius and Arms were they that went this journey, having to bear them company all the way, Iunius Brutus. This Brutus was the son of Tarquinia, the Kings sister, a young gentleman of a far other nature and disposition than he seemed in outward shew and semblance. He having heard say, that certain principall Citizens, and his own brother among, had been by this his uncle put to death: to the intent that himself might have nothing left, either in the parts of his mind for the King to fear, or in his outward state for him to covet and desire: resolved under the cloak of bale contempt to save himself, since that in right or justice he might repose small or no safeguard at all. And therefore composing and framing himself of purpose to counterfeit a noddy and a very innocent, as suffering himself and all that he had to fall into the Kings hands as an elcheat, he refused not to be misnamed Brutus, a name appropriate to unreasonable creatures; that under the shadow & colour of that surname, that courage of his lying cloathed,

A which should one day set free the City of Rome, might abide the full time and appear in due season. This Brutus being by the Tarquin brought to Delphi, as their laughing lock to make them parttime by the way, rather than a meet mate to accompany them, carried with him (as men say) for to offer and present unto Apollo a golden rod within a staffe of cornell wood, made hollow for the purpose: the very type and resemblance by secret circumstances, of his naturall disposition. Thither being arrived, the young men having done their fathers commission accordingly, were very desirous and earnest to inquire and learn of the Oracle, which of them should be King of Rome. And from the bottom of the deep Vault, this answer, as men say, was delivered in their hearing: [Which of you (young men) shall first kiss your mothers shall be an chief and sovereign rule in Rome.] B The Tarquin then intending that Sextus their brother who was left behind at Rome, might neither know the answer, nor yet obtain the kingdom, willed the matter should by all possible means be carried to secret as might be, and concealed from him. They themselves agreed upon this together, to draw Iolls whether of them twain, when they were returned to Rome, should first kiss his mother. But Brutus supposing the speech of Apollo his Priest, tended to another sense, made as though he tumbled forward and took a fall, and so touched the ground with his mouth and kissed the earth, thinking this with himself, that she was common mother of all mortall men. Then returned they to Rome, where they found great preparation for war against the Rutians.

The Rutians then were Lords of Ardea. A people in those parts, and for those times, very rich and wealthy: and that was it that gave the very occasion and was the first motive of war. The Roman King was desirous both to enrich himself, as having about the sumptuous building of publicke works emptied his coffers: and also by some spoil, to mollifie and win again the hearts of his naturall subjects: being much discontented (besides their general milke of his pride otherwise) at his manner of government: and disdaining greatly that they were by the King made labourers, to serve carpenters and masons, and held so long to servile toil and painful labour. The Romans afflicted at the beginning to surprize and win Ardea by assault: but when that way sped but ill, then began they to annoy and distress the enemies by laying siege, by casting trenches, raising forts, and labricks about the town. During this siege, and the standing camp lying there, (as it falleth out commonly, when the war is rather long and late than hot and cruell) there were granted large licencies and passports to and fro between the Camp and Rome, with much liberty: and yet more to the Principals of the Army than to the common Soldiers, And the Kings sons had otherwhile good leisure to feast and banquet one with another. Upon a time it hapned whilst they were drinking and making merry with Sextus Tarquinus in his pavilion, where Collatinus Tarquinus the son of Egeria sat at supper: there arose among other good table-talk, some arguing about their wives: whilst every man highly praised and wondrously commended his own. And growing to some heat and contention thereabout: There need not many words for this matter, quoth Collatinus, for in few hours it may be known how far my Lucretia surpasseth all the rest. And therefore if there be any lustiness and courage of youth in us, why mount we not on horseback, and in our own persons go and see the natures and dispositions of our wives? And as they shall be found and seen, taken of a sudden, and not looking for their husbands coming, so let every man judge of them, and let that down for the only trial of this controversie. They had all taken their drink well, and were prettily heat with wine: Mary, content say they all, and to horic they go, and away they gallop on the spur to Rome. Thither were they come by the flutting in of the evening when it grew to be dark: and so forward without any stay to Collatinus they ride. Where they find dame Lucretia, not as the Kings sons wives, whom they had surprized and seen afore, passing the time away in feasting and rioting with their minions and companions: but sitting up far within the night in the midst of her house amongst her maidens, hard at wooll-work by candle-light. Whereupon, in this debate about their wives, the entire praise and commendation rested in Lucretia: Her Husband and the Tarquin had a loving and courteous welcome at her hands. And he again for joy of the victory, invited the Kings sons kindly and made them friendly cheate. There at that instant Sextus Tarquinus was bewitched and possessed with wicked wanton lust, for to offer violence and villany unto Lucretia: her passing beauty and her approved chastity set him on fire and provoked him thereto. But for the present, when they had disposed themselves all night long like lully and pleasurable youths, they returned betimes in the morning to the Camp. A few daies after, Sextus Tarquinus, unwitting to Collatinus attended with one Publius man came to Collatia, where he was again in good and friendly sort received by them in the house, that suspected nothing less than that whereabouts he was come. And being after supper brought up into the guest chamber, when he thought all about him sure, and that every body was fast asleep all set on fire and burning in love, he leppeth with naked sword in hand to Lucretia, as she lay sleeping full soundly, and bearing down the womans breast with his left hand. Peace (quoth he) Lucretia: Be not a word: I am Sextus Tarquinus. Have my drawn sword in hand if thou once speak thou shalt surely die. The silly woman thus starting out of sleep, was fore affright, as feeling no remedy but in a manner present death, in case she had cried for help. Then uttered Tarquinus and confessed his amorous passion, fell to entreat and entreat again, and with his prayers intermeddled threats, and went every way about her, not ceasing by all means to sit, to found and tempt the womans heart. But when he saw her obstinate and invincible, and (to disloer it) not relenting one jot: then, besides the fear of death, he presented unto her dishonour and shame: pretending pretending that after he had massacred her, he would lay by her side in naked bed, her own manlevrant with his throat cut; that it might be voiced abroad, that he was taken and killed in filthy adultery. For fear of this reproach and infamy, few how fittest he was the victory, and conquered constant chastity: and Tarquinius in great pride and jollity, that he had by assault won the fort of a woman's honour, departed thence. But wofull Lucretia, all forrowing for to heavy a mischance, dispatched a messenger to her father at Rome, and so forward to her husband at Ardea, with this errand: That they should come unto her, each of them with one faithful and true friend, and herself they must not fail, but make all the speed they could, for that there was befallen a grievous chance and horrible. So there repaired to her Sp. Lucretius her father, accompanied with P. Vale-rius the son of Vol. furi, and Collatinus her husband, with L. Jun. Brutus. Who both together by chance going back to Rome, encountered in the way his wives messenger. Lucretia they found sitting alone in her bed-chamber, all heavy and sad: and she at the coming of these her dearer friends, shed tears and wept apace. How now my dear (quoth her husband) is all well? No God wot sir,

" (quoth she again.) For how can ought be well with a woman that is despoiled of her honour " and womanhood? The print, Collatinus, of another man is to be seen in thy own bed. Howbeit, " my body only is defiled: my mind and heart remaineth yet unspotted: and that my death shall " make good and justifie. But give me first your right hands, and make faithful promise that the " adulterer shall not escape unpunished. Sex. Tarquinius is the man, he it is, who this night past, en" tertained as a friend, but indeed a very foe in the highest degree, hath by force and violence taken
" from hence with him his pleasure, a deadly pleasure, I may say, to me: and to himselfe also no less, K
" if ye be men of courage. All of them one after another give their assured word, comforted the " wofull hearted woman, excused her that was but forced, and laid all the blame upon him that " committed the shameful act: saying, It is the mind that sinneth, and not the body: and where there " was no will and consent, there could be no fault at all. Well (quoth she) what is his due to have,
" (see you to that: as for me, howsoever I quit and avenge my self of him, yet I will not be freed from " punishment. And never shall there be example of Lucretia, any unchaste woman or wanton har-
" lot live a day: & thus having said, with a knife which she had close hidden under her cloaths, she " stabbed her self to the heart, and sinking down forward, fell upon the floor ready to yield up the " ghost. Out alas, cried her husband and father hereat: and whilst they two were in their plaints
" and moans, Brutus drew forth the knife out of the wound of Lucretia, & holding it out afore him, L
" all embraced and dropping with blood. Now I swear (quoth he) by this blood, by this most chaste
" and pure blood, before the villany wrought by the Kings son, and here before the gods I protest,
" whom I call to witness, that I will by fire and sword, and with all my might and main persecute
" and drive the country of L. Tarquinius the proud, and his ungracious wife, and the whole brood
" of his children, and suffer neither him nor any else for his sake to reign as King at Rome. Then " gave he the knife to Collatinus, and so to Lucretius & Valerius, who greatly amazed at this so strange
" current, and wondering how it came to pass, that Brutus should of a sudden be so changed, and " become so stout of stomach and courageous, took the same form of oath that he swore afore: and
" so leaving their wailing and lamentation, and wholly set upon anger and revenge, they followed
" Brutus as their Captain and Leader to put down and overthrow the government of Kings, and ut" terly to root out their race. The dead corps of Lucretia, was had out of doors, brought into the " market place, and there shewed. And thither, what with wondering (as the manner is) at so strange
" a sight, and what with the indignation of so unworthy a fact, they railed much people together.
" Every man for his part was ready enough to complain of the wickedness and violence done by the " Kings blood. The sorrow of Lucretia the father on the one side, the resolution of Brutus on the o" ther side, who rebuked and blamed all vain weeping and foolish moaning, moved and perswaded
" all that were present, that like men of valour, like true hearted Romans, they would take arms a" gainst them that demeaned themselves no better, nay, worse than ordinary enemies. And presently,
" the bravest and tallest young men shewed themselves forward, ready in armour, and voluntary. The " rest of the youths followed straight after. And having left at Collatia the one half of their forces in N
" garrison, toward the gates, and set certain watches, that no man brought tidings or news unto the " King and his sons of this rising and commotion, all the other were appointed in warlike manner, " followed their leader Brutus, from thence directly to Rome. At the sudden coming thither of this ar" med multitude: no marvel if all the way whereas they passed and marched, there arose a fear
" and trouble among the people. But when they perceived the most substantiall and principall Ci" tizens in the forefront, they judged what over the matter meant, it was not for naught. And verily
" this famous fact disquieted the minds of men no less at Rome, than it had before at Collatia. There" fore from all parts of the City there was flocking and running into the market place. And being " thither come, the Bedell or common Crier, summoned the people to appear before the Tri" bute of the Censors or Captain of the guard: which office haply Brutus bare at that time. Where " he made an Oration not proceeding from that spirit, nor resembling that quality of nature which " unto that day he had pretended and made shew of unto the world, for he inveighed against
" the violence and filthy lust of Sextus Tarquinius: the shameful villany and not to be named,
" done upon the body of Lucretia: " he discoursed of her lamentable end and piteous death, and " the desolate case of Tricipitinus, bereft now of all his children: who accounted the occasion of " his daughters death a greater indignity, and more pitifull, than her very death. Moreover he " laid

A " laid abroad the pride of the King himself, the miseries, the infinite toils and pains of the Com" mons, buried as it were under the ground, with cleaning and casting of ditches, voiding and far" ming of the finks. Saying, that the men of Rome which were the conquerors of all nations about " them, were now of warriors become quarriers, hewers of stone and day-laborers. He reckoned " up also and put them in mind of the unworthy death and cruell murder of Servius Tullius: and
" how his daughter (oh abominable act!) rode over the corps of her father in her chariot chariot:
" And herewith he called on the gods that are revengers of outrages and wrongs done to parents.
" Thus rehearsing these and other matters, much more grievous and horrible, (I verily beleve) ac" cording as the present indignity at the very time doth minifie and give utterance for, not so easily
" B penned and set down by writers that come after, he so mightily inflamed the multitude, that he " caused them to depole the King, to deprive him of his royall state and dignity, yea, and to decree
" and enact, that L. Tarquinius with his wife and children should be banished for ever. Himself
" having selected and armed the younger gallants who offered their service, and willingly entred
" their names, set forward in person to the Camp lying before Ardea, to excite the Army there against " the King: leaving the government of the City unto Lucretius, who had before been appointed " Deputy and Lieutenant there, by the King. In this time of garboile, Tullia left the palace and fled,
" and all the way as she went, both men and women cursed and cried out upon her, and besought the " ghostly spirits and furies of parents to be avenged. When news hereof was brought into the Camp,
" and that the King upon these strange tidings made haste towards Rome, to stay and suppress these
" C broyles: Brutus having intelligence of his coming, turned another way because he would not meet " with him. And so at one instant in a manner by contrary journey came Brutus to Ardea, and Tar" quinius to Rome. But the gates were shut against Tarquinius, and instead of entrance, warned he " was, and commanded into exile. The whole Camp received with joy Brutus the redeemer of their " City. From thence were also the Kings sons driven: two of them followed after their father and " departed into banishment unto Cere, a town of the Tuscans: as for Sextus Tarquinius, he retired
" himself to Gaes as it were into his own Kingdom: where he was murdered in revenge of old
" quarrels, upon malice and hatred of the people which he had brought upon himself in times past.
" L. Tarquinius Superbus reigned 25 years. Thus continued the Kings Regiment at Rome, from the " foundation of the City, unto their freedom and redemption thereof 244 years. Then in a solemn
" D assembly and election by the Centuries, held by the Provost of the City, according to the ordi" nance of Servius Tullius, in his Commentaries, two Consuls were created: L. Junius Brutus, and

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Second Book.

B RUTUS took an oath of the people, that they should not suffer any to reign King at Rome. He com" pelled his fellow Consul Tarquinius Collatinus, a suspected man to take part with the Tarquins, by " reason of the affinity he had with them, to give over the Consulship, and to depart the City. The goods of " the King and his sons he commanded to be seized upon, and rifled. A field of theirs he consecrated to " Mars, which was named afterwards Campus Martius, or Mats field. He beheaded certain young Gen" tlemen of the Nobility, together with his own and his brothers sons, for conspiring to receive the King and " his Complex again into the City. Who the bondslave Vindictus, that bewayed the plot, he gave his " freedom, if whom Vindictus took the name. Having led an Army against the King, who had assembled
" a power of Volentians and Tarquiniens, and made war, he died in battell together with Brutus, the son " of Superbus: and for his death the dames of Rome mourned one whole year. P. Valerius the Consul " proposed and made a Law concerning Appealing unto the people. The Capitol was dedicated. Por-
" cenna King of the Cluins, warring in the quarrell of the Tarquins, and being come to the Janiculum,
" was by the valour of Cocles Horatius, impeached that he passed not the Tyber: who alone whilst others
" heaved down the Sublician bridge, withstood the Tuscans: and when it was broken down, leapt armed as " he was into the river, and swam over to his fellows. Another example of manhood is reported of Mutius,
" G who being entered the Camp of the enemies with full intent to kill Porcenna, and having slain his prin-
" cipall Secretary whom he took for the King, was apprehended: and thrusting his hand into the fire of the " Altar, whereupon they had burned sacrifices, suffered it there to fry untill it was consumed: and laid " without, that there were behind him three hundred men besides, that had sworn the oath of the King " himself. Who wondering at their resolution, was driven to offer conditions of peace, and upon taking of " hostages gave over war: amongst whom, one virgin Cloelia, beguiled her keepers, made an escape, and " swam over Tyber to her friends: and being rendered again, was by Porcennas sent honourably home, and had rest; he made no great account of them: but afterwards, upon further consideration he admired the enterprise, and plainly said, it surpassed far all the adventures of the Caelia and the Munio: as he pretended that if the maid were not rendered again, he would take the league as broken, and being yielded, he would send her back to her friends, undefiled, and without any abuse or violence done unto her. On both parts was promise faithfully kept: For both the Romans restored the pledge of peace according to covenant, and seen also it was, that venue was not only secured, but also highly regarded and honoured with the Tuscan King. For after he had commended and praised the damsel, he promised to give her part of the hostages, chide whom she would. And when they were all brought forth before her, she made choice (they say) of those young boies that were under 14 years of age: which was not only most befitting her virginity, but also by the accord of the hostages themselves best approved: namely, that that age especially should be delivered out of the enemies hands, which was most subject to injury and taking wrong. The peace thus renewed and confirmed, the Romans rewarded this rare valour in that sex, with as new and strange an honour, for, in remembrance of her, in the top of Via sacra, there was erected her statue, [A maiden sitting on horseback].
" her

There remaineth yet even unto our daies amongst other solemn ceremonies, this one custome received from our ancestors, far differing and disagreeing from this peaceable and friendly departure of the Tuscan King from before the City of Rome, and this it is: In the portale of goods they use to proclaim first aloud, The sale of King Porfena his goods. This ceremonial custome must needs either begin in time of war, and so was not afterwards forgotten in peace: or else arose from some more gracious and gentle occasion at the first, then this title or outward form pretendeth, of selling goods by way of hostility, and after the manner of enemies. But the likeliest conjecture and nearest to the truth of all those that are given out is this: that Porfena a lodging from the Janicle, gave freely unto the Romans, (the City at that time being after long siege distressed and in great straits) his rich Camp furnished with victual and provision, conveyed thither out of the plentiful countries of Hernia near adjoining: which goods, for fear there should have been some havoc and spoil made thereof in warlike wise, in case the people had been left looke to the rifling of the tents, were after sold, and called Porfena his goods: which title signified rather their thankful acceptance of the gift, and remembrance of the giver, than any open and overt sale of the Kings goods, which were not so much as in the Romans power, nor at their disposition.

Thus Porfena having given over the Roman war, because he would not seem to have brought an host of men into those parts, and performed no exploit, sent his son Arus with part of his forces to surprize and assault Aricia. At the first this sudden and unexpected enterprize much troubled the Aricins, but afterwards when he had gotten aid both from the Latine Nations & also from Cumes, they took such heart again, that they durst enter into the field & bid the enemy battle. In the beginning of the conflict, the Tuscan charged them so hotly, that at the very first encounter, they brake the armies of the Aricins. But the troops of the Cumes setting policy against force, went a little aside, made way and gave some ground, and when the enemies had outstripped them & were rashly and disorderly passed beyond them, they turned their ensignes, and let upon their backs: so were the Tuscan, being in the very train of their victory, beset round about and slain in the midst between. Only a small remnant of them after the loss of their Captain, because they had no other place of refuge nearer, were fain to trudge to Rome without weapons and disarmed, like suppliants both in deed and shew. Where they were kindly entertained and bestowed in several lodgings. Some of them when they were cured of their wounds repaired home reporting the hospitality & courteous usage they have found. Many remained still at Rome for love of their hosts and the City: who had a place allotted them to dwell in, which after they called Thufens vicus, the Tuscan street.

After this, were P. Lucretius and P. Valerius the third time created Coss. In that year, for a small end, there came Embassadors from Porfena, to treat about the restoring of the Turians into their Realm: to whom this answer was returned: that the Senate would send Embassadors to the King himself: whereupon there were immediately addressed unto him in Embassy the most honourable personages of all the Nobility, who in the name of the people of Rome delivered this speech: That the chief of their Nobles were sent, rather than any dispatch given by word of mouth unto his Embassadors at Rome; nor for that they could not have shapen them this short answer, "They would no Kings have: But to this end that for ever after there should be no more renewed of that matter, nor in so great mutual benefits, and favours passed between them, some discontent arise on either side. whilst he might be thought to request that which was repugnant and prejudicial to the liberty of Rome, and the Romans again, unless they would be executors of their own wrongs, and seek their own mischief, to make denial unto him, whom by their good will they would not seem to deny ought for any thing in the world. But as to the substance in the matter, this was the point: namely, that the people of Rome were not under the regiment of a King, but were a free state: and fully settled in this purpose. To let open their gates to the enemies sooner than to Kings: and were all generally of this mind and resolution. That look when the freedom of that City had an end, then should the City come to an end also. To conclude therefore they were to entreat him, that if he tendered the weal and safety of Rome, he would permit them to be free still and at their own liberty.

The Roman
Embassadors
to King Porfena.

A The King overcome with very modesty, and much abashed in himself, answered thus again: "Since you are so fully minded and stily bent (quoth he) neither will I importune you, nor dull your ears with harping till upon this unpleasant string, and do no good: nor bear the Turians any longer in hand, and deceive them of that hope of aid, which nothing at all is in my power to perform. Let them from henceforth seek some other place of exile, either for peace or war, as they shall think more expedient: that there may be nothing to let and hinder the free course of amity, and alliance between me and you. To the good and kind words he joynted better and more friendly deeds. For all the hostages that remained in his hand he sent home: and the Veientians lands which by the covenants indented at Janiculum, were taken away, he restored to the Romans again. This Turquin feeling all hope of return cut off, removed unto Tusculum to his son in law Manlius Orestes, there to live and spend the rest of his daies in banishment. So there continued faithful peace between the Romans and King Porfena.

Then were Coss. M. Valerius and P. Posthumus. In that year the Romans fought with the Sabins fortunately, and the Consuls triumphed. But afterwards the Sabins made greater preparation of war: to withstand whom, as also for fear of some sudden danger that might arise from Tusculum, from whence they suspected war, although none was openly seen, were P. Valerius the fourth time, and T. Lucretius the second time created Coss. But among the Sabins there grew some civil discord between that part that would have war, and the contrary that sought peace: which gained the Romans some strength even from thence. For Appius Claudius (who afterwards at Rome was named Appius Claudius) a periwade himself of quietness and repose, being overwatched and not able to make his part good with the adverse faction that minded and stirred up troubles, accompanied with a great power of friends and followers, from Regillum fled to Rome, who were enfranchised Citizens, and possessed of those lands that lye beyond the river Anio. And from thence came the name of the old trade Appia: after that other new Citizens were put unto them, those I mean, that defended of that race, and out of the same territory. This Appius was admitted into the number of the Senators, and not long after advanced to be one of the chief men and heads of the City. The Coss. went with a strong power into the Sabins lands, where after they had first waited the Country, and after in battle abated the strength and puissance of the enemy; so, as for a long time after they needed not to fear any rebellion from thence, they returned to Rome in triumph.

The year following, when Agrippa Menenius and P. Posthumus were Coss. P. Valerius ended his daies in great glory, reputed the only singular man in those times, by all mens judgment, for skill and knowledge as well in martiall feats, as in civil affairs: but too poor was his estate, that he had not wherewith to defray his funeral expences, and therefore at the Cities charge right honourably entred. And the Dames of Rome mourned for him as they did for Brunus.

The same year two Colonies of the Latines, Pometia and Coras, revolted to the Auruncans. The Romans first began to war upon the Auruncans. And after they had discomfited a great host of them, who met with the Consuls as they entered the borders, and fiercely made head against them, then all the Auruncan war was driven and translated wholly to Pometia. The slaughter and execution was no less after the conflict, than during the fight: for whereas there were many more of them slain outright in the place than taken prisoners, those also that were prisoners they spared not, but murdered every where as they went: neither itaid the furious rage of war therewith, but even the very hostages whom they had received, to the number of 300, they put to the sword. In this year also was a triumph at Rome.

The Consuls Opter Virginis, and Sp. Cassius, that followed the next year, assailed Pometia, first by meer force to scale the walls, after with pavoises, mantelets, platforms, and other fabricks, raised against it. Upon whom the Auruncans sallied forth, rather of a carkred and malicious hatred than for any hope or vantage given them of good exploit: the greater part of them furnished better with fire-works than armed with sword and spear, killed and burned all aore them: and having thus fired their fabricks afore said, hurt and slain a great number of their enemies, one of the Consuls also (but his name precisely is not by any author set down) was sore wounded, stricken down from his horse and well-near slain. Whereupon the Romans returned back to Rome thus unhappily defeated, leaving the Consul behind them amongst many that were hurt, like to dye. Soon after, and no longer than whilst their wounds might be healed, and a new supply ofouldiers made, they came against Pometia, in more furious manner than before, and also with a stronger power. And when by making of new mantelets and other warlike instruments of assault, they were proceeded thus forward that theouldiers were ready to scale and got up the wall, then they within yielded: and notwithstanding the Town was thus surrendered up, yet there was no more mercy shewed unto it, than if it had been forced by assault. The chief and principal Citizens shamefully got their heads, the rest of the inhabitants were sold at the spear in open market like slaves. The Town sacked and razed to the ground yea, and money made of the lands belonging to it. The Consuls for that they had to wreaked their anger, and sharply revenged themselves, more than for any great war they had finished, obtained triumph.

The year following, were Posthumus Caninius and T. Lartius Consuls. In this year, during the games and plaies at Rome, certain yokners of the Sabins, went about in a wanton jollity to carry away and ravish the Curtuzans and common Strumpets of the City. Whereupon the people ran together together, and made a riot, grew to words, and from words to brawls, inasmuch, as they went together by the ears, and made a fray in manner of a battell: upon which small occasion there was a rebellion like to ensue. Over and besides the fear of the Latines war, (for to encrease their troubles the more, news came, and it was certainly known, that by the soliciting and practise of Ostius Manlius, there were already thirty nations banded together against the Romans. The City thus being perplexed for the event and expectation of these so great occurrences, there arose the first occasion and mention made of creating a Dictator. But neither in what year, nor in what Consuls time (for that it can hardly be believed, that they should be of the Tarquinius faction, and yet that also is reported) nor yet who was first created Dictator, is it certainly known: Howbeit, in the most ancient writers I find that T. Lartius was created the first Dictator, and Cneius Calpurnius General of the horsemen: and Consular men, (i.e. such as had been Consuls afore) they were that elected him: for so the law provided that was enacted, concerning the creation of a Dictator. And this inducteth me the rather to believe, that Lartius an ancient man, and one who had been Consul before, was appointed as a Controller and Master over the Consuls, and not M. Valerius the son of Marcus, and grandson of Volsus, who as yet had not attained to the Consular dignity. For if these Consular men aforesaid had been minded to have chosen a Dictator out of that house above all others, surely they would have made choice rather of his father M. Valerius, a noble personage, of approved prowess and valour, and one besides that had been Consul. When the Dictator was once chosen at Rome, and the axes were seen borne before him, the Commoners stood in great awe, and took better regard to be obedient at every beck and command. For neither could they make account of any help (as they might under the Consuls, who were both in commission alike, and of equal authority, when they had recourse from the one to the other) nor yet appeal unto the people: no nor look for succour at all, but in their own double diligence and care of obedience. The Sabines likewise were afraid of the Dictator thus created at Rome: and so much the more, because they were verily persuaded he was made of purpose for them: and thereupon, they sent Embassa-dors to treat for peace, who beseeching the Dictator and the Senate to pardon so small a fault, and being but a trick of youth, received this answer: That youth indeed might well be pardoned, but such old babes as they might not, who never rested to fow debate, and minister occasion of one war after another. Howbeit, they fare in consultation about a peace, and obtained it had been, if the Sabines could have found in their hearts and condescended to make good and repay the expenses that the Romans had disbursed about the war: for that was the thing demanded at their hands.

So, defence was sent and war proclaimed. And yet for that year all was quiet, as it were in time of a secret truce, during the Consulship of Servilius Pulpitius, and M. Manlius Tullius, in whose year there was nothing done worthy of remembrance.

The famous battell at the Lake Regillus.

After them were L. Ebutius, and C. Velsus. In their time Fidene was besieged, * Crosumeria won, and Prosestis revolted from the Latines unto the Romans. And the Latine war, which had been a breeding and budding for certain years, was no longer delayed, but brake forth. A. Posthu-mius the Dictator, and T. Ebutius General of the Cavalry, with great power of foot and horse, set forward and advanced as far as the Lake Regillus, in the Territory of Tusculum, and there encountered the Army of the enemies in their march. And because they heard say that the Tarquinius were in the host of the Latines, they could not for anger forbear any longer, but presently fell to it, and began battell. This field was fought right fiercely, and cost more bloodshed a good deal, than others usually before: because the Generals and chief Commanders were there present, not only to give direction by their counsel and advice, but also in person themselves hazarded their own bodies, and fought bravely in the medley. And not one almost of the principall leaders escaped out of the skirmish, either of one side or of the other, safe and sound, save only the Roman Dictator.
For as Posthumius was encouraging his men, and setting them in array in the vanguard, Tarquinius Suppibus (albeit he was now very aged and unweildy, and notable to bestir himself) yet spurred to his horse, and ran full butt against him. But having caught a thrust from above, was rescued by his men that came about him, and retired to a place of safety. And in the other wing, Ebutius General of the horsemen, set upon Ost. Manlius: but he, the Captain I mean of the Tusculans, was well ware of him, and espyed him coming, and ran his horse with full career likewise upon him, and so desperately they beat their Lances one against the other, that Ebutius was run quite through the arm, and Manlius wounded in the breast, whom the Latines succoured and received into the middle ward. As for Ebutius, not able any longer to bear his staff, with his arm fore hurt, withdrew himself out of the battell. The Leader of the Latines nothing dismayed at all his hurt, maintained fight still: and seeing his souldiers somewhat distressed, he lenteth for the Regiment of the Roman exiles, that were under the leading of L. Tarquinius his son: who flicking more couragiously unto it for anger that their goods were spoiled, and they driven out of their own coun-trei, renewed the combat afresh for awhile. And as the Romans from that quarter began to recoile, and give ground, M. Valerius, the brother of Publicola, espying young Tarquinius vanishing himself gloriously in the fore-front of the exiles, with a desire of domestical glory of his house: that the same family, which had the praise of expelling the Kings, might likewise win the honour of killing them, spurred his horse, and with deadly spear ran against Tarquinius, who giving way to his mortal enemy, retired back to his own Regiment. But Valerius by this time was disbanded from his company, and rashly ridden into the battell of the exiles,

A and there a common souldier hapned to charge upon him a flank, and run him through. The horse flaid not a jot for all the rider was wounded, and so the Roman Knight ready to die, fell to the ground with his armour upon his body, and paid nature her debt. Posthumius the Dictator, after he perceived so valiant a man slain, and the banished man advancing lustily forward with full trot, and his own souldiers distressed, at point to turn their backs gave express commandment unto his own band, which he had about him of choise tall men for to guard his person, that as many by reason of a counter-terror the Romans made head again and renewed the battell. Then began the Dictators cohort to fight, and coming with fresh bodies and courageous stomacks, charged upon the wearied exiles, and killed them on every side. Whereupon began another combat also between the Colonels and Captains of quality and mark. The General of the Latines seeing the battallion of the banished well near environed round by the Roman Dictator, speedily took with him into the forefront of the battell certain squadrons of those that were appointed in the rear-guard to succour and aid: whom T. Herminius, a lieutenant, espyed to come marching in good order, and knowing amongst them Manlius by his gorgeous harness, and goodly coat-armour, with far greater violence than the General of the horsemen a little before encountered the Colonel of his enemies so hotly that both he ran Manlius through his sides, and flue him outright, and also whilst he was disarming and rifling his body, he was wounded himself with a short javelin, and being brought back with victory into the Camp, and at first dressing yielded to nature and died. Then C rode the Dictator apace to the horsemen, and earnestly cried unto them, that seeing the footmen were too ed out and wearied, they would alight from their horses, and take the matter into their hands. The horsemen soon obeyed, leapt from horseback, and set forward, as it they had flown, to the forefront, where they exposed their targets in defence of them that fought before the ensigns.
Whereat presently the Infantry began again to take heart, seeing the principall men of arms, and noble young Gentlemen in the like kind of service, exposed to the same danger, and ready to take part with them. Then at the last were the Latines put back, and their whole battell began to shrink.
The Gentlemen had their horses brought to them again, and they mounted on horseback to pursue their enemies. The footmen likewise followed after. There the Dictator omitting no help of God and man, vowed as men say a Temple to Castor, and openly promised and propoled rewards D to that souldier that made either first or second entry into the enemies Camp. Whereupon they bestirred themselves so courageously, that the Romans at one brunt both vanquished their enemies, and also were possessed of their tents. This was the noble field fought at the Lake Regillus.
The Dictator and the General of horsemen returned into the City with triumph. For three years after, there was neither assured peace between them, nor yet professed war.

Consuls were Q. Cloelius, and T. Lartius. After them A. Sempronius, and M. Minutius. Whiles these two were Consuls, the Temple to Saturn was dedicated, and the feast called Saturnalia instituted. After them succeeded A. Posthumius, and T. Virginus. And in this year and not before, I find in some authors, that the said battell was stricken near the Lake Regillus, and that A. Posthumius suspecting the fidelity of his brother Consul gave over his place, and so was made Dictator. The E account of times doth so vary and is so intricate and confused, whiles writers diversly set down the chief Magistrates, that in so great antiquity, not of acts only, but also of authors, man cannot orderly and directly distinguish, according to some writers, who were Consuls, and what was done in every year.

Afterwards were Ap. Claudius, and P. Servilius created Consuls. This year was famous for the news of Tarquinius his death. He died at Cumes, to which place after the defeiture of the Latines power, he went to Ardea, the Tyrant. At which tidings the hearts of the Nobles were well lightened the Commons also began to look up. But the joy in the Nobility was above measure too excessive and licentious. For why? the great men began now to wrong and wring the commonalty, when until that day they had favoured and pleased to their full power. In the same year the F Colony Signis, which King Tarquinius had created, was now stored again the second time, and the number supplied with new inhabitants. And the tribes or wards at Rome were now made up in the time of the Latine war, neither was there peace nor war: for both the Volscians had levied a power for aid to lend unto the Latines, if the Roman Dictator had not made good speed: and also the Roman Dictator hastned the more for fear he should in one battell have to deal with Latines and Volscians both at once. Upon this quarrell, the Consuls led forth their Legions into the Volscians Country. The Volscians fearing no revenge for their disfigurement (that was intended only, and never came in action) were much troubled with this sudden and unlooked for occur-rent. Not minding therefore to make resistance and forgetfull of warlike prowels, they delivered G 300 of their Noblemen children out of Coras and Pometia for hostages. Whereupon the Roman Legions from thence without any fight were withdrawn. But not long after the Volscians being somewhat eased and delivered of their fear, came again to their old place strentured to their wonder nature, and secretly under-hand made preparation anew for war, joining with them as confederates in this quarrell the Hernikes. They sent also their Embassadors all about, to move and arms, that they could not forbear the very Embassadors, but offer them abuse. They apprehended H therefore the Volscians, conveyed them to Rome, and delivered them to the Consuls: where they revealed and gave intelligence, that the Volscians and Hernicks were out in arms, ready to war upon the Romans. Which being reported unto the Senators they were so well pleased and contented therewith, that they set at liberty 6000 Latines, prisoners, and sent them home. And concerning a league to be concluded with them, which was like before to have been denied for ever, they referred the consultation thereof, unto the new Magistrates that should next enter. And in good sooth pleasant & glad were the Latins then, for that they had done, and the authors of peace were magnified and had in great reputation. They sent moreover a Crown of gold into the Capitol, for a present to Jupiter. With these Embassadors and the present, those prisoners which before were set free came in greater number. Who repaired straight ways to every man his home, where they had been prisoners, yielding them great thanks for their kind usage and friendly entertainment in time of their calamities and miseries, and promised therewith the like courteous and mutual hospitality. Never were the Latines at any time afore, both publicly and privately, united more neerly to the Roman Empire.

But as the Volscian war was now at hand, so the City was at discord among themselves. The Senators and Commons hated one another at the heart, and all this arose by occasion especially of certain persons that were indebted and in danger of their creditors: who muttered and gave out in murmuring wise, how that abroad they adorned themselves and fought for the liberty and dominion of the City, and at home by their own neighbors they were held prisoners and oppressed: saying that the freedom of the Commons was more late in time of war, than of peace, among the enemies rather than their own fellow Citizens. This inward grudge and heart-burning, which of it self still kindled more and more, the notable calamity of one man above all others, set on a light fire. A certain aged person, called to break prison, and with the arms, badges, and ornaments of all his ancestors ran into the market place. His apparel was all to tattered, soiled, and loathsome, but the habit or plight of his body much more filthy: so pale, so wan, so lean withall, as if he had been over-pined and starved, his long shaggy beard and hair of his head so overgrown, that they made his visage and countenance wild and gaily. Howbeit, for all he was thus disfigured by this deformity, he was a man well known, and as some said, he had done good service in the wars, had been a chief Centurion, and had the charge and leading of bands in the field: and the common people, as pitying his estate, and to move compassion, recounted many worthy exploits of his, to his great credit and singular commendation. Himself likewise shewed the scars of wounds, which in his breast and fore-part of his body in divers places he had received that might testify his valiant service. The people flocking about him as it were in a common assembly to hear a solemn Oration enquired of him, how he came to be in that taking, so poor, so disfigured and deformed? He answered, that whilst he served in the Sabine war, he by reason of the continual foraging, and wasting of the Territory, not only lost the revenues and increase of his lands, but also his Manor-house was burnt, all his goods ranlack and spoiled, his cattell driven away: and when a levy and tribute was exacted in a time when he might have been driven to take up money and run in debt: which growing more and more by payment of interest, first he was constrained to sell his land, that his father and grandfather had left him, and to turn himself out of all, by making a clean hand of the rest of his goods: untill at length his body also began to winder away in a consumption, Complaining moreover how by his creditor he was not only brought into bondage and thralldom, but also imprisoned, and whipped, and tormented in most cruel and but herlike manner. With that he shewed before them all, his back lately scourged, with the fresh wounds of the lashes newly given him. At the sight and hearing hereof, there arose a great outcry of the people, so that anon the uprore kept not within the compass of the market place, but spread over all the City: in such sort, that as well they that were bound, as they that were loofe came forth from all parts into the open streets, calling the Quiriter and the people pitifully to help. In no corner wanted any companions to take part willingly in this seditious rout, and every where in all the streets they run by companies into the common place. Those Senators who chanced to be abroad, at their no small perill light upon this multitude: and had not the Consuls P. Servilius, and App. Claudius, made the better speed, and come upon them to appeale the commotion, there would have been some knocks, for hardly could they have held their hands. At whose coming the multitude turned upon them, shewing their irons and all their other shameful misusage and misery, saying, This is all the good we have gotten for our warfare: upbraiding every man the services they had performed, some in one place, some in another, requiring them in threatening wise rather than by way of supplication, to call the Senate together. And they the while stood about the Curia, as if they would be judges and moderators of their public counsel. Very few of the Senators, such only as by chance came that way, could be brought to repair to the Consuls: as for the rest, they were afraid not only to come into the Consular house, but also to venture abroad into the market place, so that by reason of their small assembly, there could be nothing done nor determined. Then thought the people indeed they were mocked and dashed withall, and driven off with delays, surmising, that the Senators which were away, abated themselves not by chance, nor for fear, but only to hinder the proceeding of their cause: and that the Consuls themselves did dissemble and shrink, and without all question made

A made but a scorn and game at their miseries. This broil so increased, that hardly could the reverence and Majesty of the Consuls restrain the peoples rage. But the Senators standing in doubtful terms, whether to tarry behind or to come forward would be more dangerous, at length they resolved to repair into the Senate, and being now at last a full and diligent house gathered, neither the Lords there assembled, nor yet the Consuls, could well agree amongst themselves what to do in this case. Appius a man of a hot spirit, was of opinion to order the matter by Consular authority and commandment, saying, That if one or two of them were laid hold on, the rest would be quiet. But Servilius more inclined to mild and gentle remedies, thought it a more safe and easy course too, rather to bend than to break their angry and fell stomachs. But amidst these troubles there happened a greater and more fearful occurrence: For certain Latin on horribable trouble in post, and brought news in hasty and tumultuous manner, that the Volscians were coming with a mighty and cruel army against the City to assault the same. Which news being heard (see how discord had of one City made twain) wrought far other effect in the Nobles, than in the Commons. The commonality leapt for joy, and said the gods were now come down from Heaven to be revenged of the Senators pride, and encouraged one another not to take premonition, or to enter their names in the Muller-masters book, saying that they had rather dye at once with all, than perish alone and none but they: "Let the Nobles (quoth they) serve as soldiers: let them take weapon in hand, and abide the brunts and hazards of war, who receive the profits, the prizes and rewards thereof. But contrary-wise the Senate pensive and discharged with this twofold fear, as well from citizen as enemy, be sought the Consul Servilius (a man by nature more affable and popular) That he would provide for the safety of the Common-wealth, better as it were round with to fearful perils. Then the Consul dismissed the Senate, and came forth into the assembly of the people, where he shewed what care the LL. of the Senate had for the good of the commons: But whilst they were (quoth he) busy in consultation for the greater part of the commons of the City, and yet in truth no more but a part, it fell out so in the mean while, that of necessity they must see to the whole body of the Common-wealth, whereof they stand in exceeding fear. Seeing therefore the enemies were almost hard at the gates, they could not possibly do or intend any thing before war. Neither (if there should be any respite and leisure granted) were it either for the commons credit and honesty, nor to fight for their Country, unless they had their pay before hand: nor well becoming the Nobles and for their reputation, to look unto and take order hastily, to redress the miseries and calamities of their citizens upon fear, rather than afterwards with good deliberation, for love and of willing mind. This speech of his he confirmed with an edict, by virtue whereof, he gave freight commandment: Inprimis, that no man should keep bound or in prison, any citizen of Rome, but that he might be enrolled before the Consuls. Item, that no person should hold in possession, or sell the goods of any soldier, so long as he abode in the camp, nor arrest his children or childrens children. This edict being once published and proclaimed, not only the enthralled debtors their presents were immediately by name enrolled, but also from all parts of the City, they leapt quickly out of their houses, seeing that now their creditors had no right nor power to detain and arrest them, and ran into the market place for to take a military oath of allegiance, to be true soldiers and faithful to the State. A number there was of these: neither was there any that more manfully behaved and quoth themselves or took more pains in the Volscian war. Then the Consul forth with his power against the enemies, and within a little of them incamped himself. The night following, the Volscians presuming upon the variance and discord of the Romans, assailed the tents, if in the night season any of them might have been wrought to abandon the camp and come to them, or to practise any treason. But the Sentinels delricted them, and upon alarm given, the whole army arose, and every man made halt to his weapons. Thus came that enterprise of the Volscians to nothing. The rest of the night both parties rested, and were quiet. On the morrow by break of day, the Volscians having filled up the trench, assailed the bulwarks and rampiers: And by that time they had on every side plucked up the fences, palisades, and other fortifications, the Consul who for all he was called unto instantly on foot, made some way on purpose to try the courage of his men: and seeing well how they stood, as eager to fight as might at length gave them a token to rush forth, and to let them loose, as eager to fight as might be. So at the very first onset the enemies were presently discomfited and put to flight: the footmen followed hard upon them in chase, and as they could reach, wounded them behind on their backs, and killed them: the horsemen likewise pursued them even to their pavilions, who till feared exceedingly what might become of them: and within a while their very camp also, environed about with the legions, and abandoned of the Volscians themselves for fear, were forced and rifled. The next day following, the legions marched to Suessa Pometia, for thither the enemies were fled: and within few days the Town was won, and put to the sack, and the spoil and pillage given away: whereby the needy soldiers were somewhat refreshed. The Consul in great glory and honour brought back his victorious army to Rome. Upon the looting of Pometia, came unto dooms of the Etrurian Volscians disruling their own State, and a decree passed, peace was granted: him. To whom after consultation had with the Senate, and a decree passed, peace was granted: but they were fined to part with their Lands. Immediately upon this, the Sabines also put the

Romans in a fright, and in every deed it might be called a tumult, rather than a war. For word H was brought in the night season, that an army of the Sabines were come in a rode, as far as the river Anio, robbing, spoiling, and burning all the villages and hamlets as they went. Forthwith was sent thither the whole power of hories under the conduct of A. Postumius, who in the Latin war had been Dictator. After him followed the Consul Servilius with a choien regiment of footmen. Most of the enemies as they ranged abroad a foraging in scattering wile, were by the horsemen surprised and inclosed. And when the Infantry besides marched against the Sabines legion, they were not able to resist: for being tired out, partly with their long journey, and partly with plundering all might long, and many of them having overcharged themselves with meat and wine within the villages, had hardly strength enough to run away. Thus the Sabins war in one night was heard of and ended. I The day following, when as now the Romans were in good hope that they had peace on every side, beheld the Auruncian Embassadors came into the Senate proclaiming war, unless they would forgo the Volturnian lands, and restore them to their rightful owners. And even at one time with the Embassadors was the army also of the Auruncans abroad, and had taken the field. The news whereof, and namely, that they were now in fight not far from Aricia, raised up the Romans in so great a broil and hubbub, that the Senators could neither be consulted with, and deliver their opinions in order, nor yet give a peaceable answer to those that came as it were with weapon in hand, being thus forced to take arms themselves. So to Aricia directly in warlike manner they march, and not far from thence they joined battle with the Auruncans. And in one day that war had also an end.

Thus when the Roman souldiers had gotten victory within so few days in so many places, and had now defeated the Auruncans, they looked for the promise of the Consul, and the faithful performance of it by the Senate. At what time Appius both upon a proud stomach, and arrogant spirit, of his own by nature, and also to discredit and disanul the word of his fellow Consul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands, and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a souldier, whole care it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Consul his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, at his hands they claimed a promise: every one upbraided and reproached him with their service in war, with their fears there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the Senate, and as a Consul, succour and protect his Citizens: or like a General, maintain his souldiers. These matters no doubt, moved the Consul: but so flood the care that he could neither will nor chuse, but dissemble, deal double, and temporize with them: to fully bent and wholly wedded to the other party, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet won favour with the Nobles: whiles the Nobles took him for a soft and base minded Consul, seeking to please all parties; and the Commons for as crafty and false dissembler: in somuch as within a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Consuls hapned on a time to strive, whether of them twain M should dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the people election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals, he should erect and institute a Colledge, or fellowship of Merchants; and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the solemn feasts or festival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Le Flornius, principal Centurion of the vanguard; which as it easily appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office bestowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling: as to disgrace and deface the Consuls. Hereat, one of the Consuls, yea, and the Patricii stormed and fumed exceedingly against the Commons. But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwise, and to take another course then they purposed at the beginning: for despairing of N the Consuls and Senats help, when they saw a debtor sued and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, so that the Consuls sentence and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour, And de reoer judge what he would, no man would obey. And so violently they went to work, that in presence of the Consul, the creditors were singled out, evil-treated, and misused of the Commons. Leing many together. So the whole fear and hazzard of the main chance, even of liberty it self, was now all together translated from the debtors to the creditors. In the very neck of thier troubles, there arose a fear of the Sabins war, and when it was determined there should be a muster of souldiers, no man would answer to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raged and took on, as if envying bitterly against the nicety and popularity of his brother Consul, who with his keeping silence for displeasing the people, by his post carriage of himself, had betrayed the Weak-pollid, and over and besides that, he had not minimized justice for the loan of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought the matter for to pass that he could take no musters by virtue of the decree of the Senate. Howbeit (saith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forsaken and forlorn, nor yet the Consular authority utterly cast down and trodden under foot: for he would himself alone, if there were no more but he, defend and maintain both his own place, and the Senators dignity, When as the multitude

low Consul,

A multitude therefore stood, this malapertly, as their daily manner was, about the bar, he commanded one principal Captain of sedition to be attached and had away, as he was haled to prison by the Sergeants and Licitors he appealed. Neither would the Consul have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obstinate stiffness with much ado been overwayed more through the discreet advice & authority of the chief nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noise & menaces of the multitude: so resolute was he, and his heart so courageous, to undergo either ill will and heavy displeasure. This grew the mischief more & more daily, testified not with open mouth & broad speeches only, but also (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by conventicles, secret meetings, and confabulations. At length these Colls, so odious unto the Commons, went out of their office, to wit, Appius, a man wondrous well affected of the Nobles; Servilius like neither of them nor the Commons. After whom A. Virginii, and T. Volumnius entered their Consulship. But then the Commons noting what manner of Consuls they should have, began to assemble together by night, some in Eggnis, others in the Aventine: to the end, they might not be unprovided and to seek upon a sudden, what to do in the common place, nor manage their business hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Consuls supposing (as it was indeed) a perilous example, and of ill consequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not orderly ask their advise what was to be done: they took to on, and kept such outcry and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and fuming, that the Consuls should lay upon the Senate the burden and heavy load of that, which properly they by virtue of their authority and office should execute and perform themselves: and surely, if there were any Magistrates in the City (say they) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other tumult but publick; whereas now the State is divided into a thousand Courts and conventicles: whiles some have their meetings and assemblies in Eggnis, others in Aventine: assuredly one only man indeed (for that is more than a Consul) such a one as Appius Claudius was, would soon dispatch, and in one minute of an hour scatter these their unlawful assemblies. The Consuls upon this rebuke and check, replied again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are resolved to do nothing slackly and coldly, but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senators. Whereupon an order passed, that they should take muster and levy souldiers with all rigour and severity; yea D moreover, that the Commons with idleness and ease were grown over-malpert and too licentious. And when the Senate was dismissed, the Consuls went into the Tribunal & took their places, and summoned by name all the younger sort to appear: and none making answer to his name, the multitude standing about as it had been to hear some publick Oration, said plainly, that the Commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Consuls should never get so much as one souldier, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publickly before was made, and restore to every man again his liberty, before they caused them to take weapon in hand: to the end they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Masters. The Consuls saw well what they had in commission from the Senate & that of all those who within the Council house walls spake so stoutly & gave out so great words, there E was not one present to take part of this odious malice of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worst, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advice of the Senate, and to confer with them. But then all the younger sort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to the Consuls seats, willing them to give over their Consulship, and to resign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Consuls had sufficiently weighed and tried both ways, thus at length began they and said, A great sedition and commotion is toward, my LL. To the end therefore that ye pretend no ignorance, and lay another day ye were not foretold of it, there is a great sedition and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who find greatest fault with ourr miselness and lack of courage, assist us and sit with us while we take F the musters: and since you will needs have it so, we will execute it according to their minds, that are most earnest and severest. Then come they back again unto the Tribunal, and commanded on set purpose, one of them that were there in fight to be cited and called by name. But bestiford still and held his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he should have some harm or violence done unto him. The Consul then lent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulld off, then those Nobles which fate there on the bench to assist the Consuls, cried out upon the shameful indignity, and said it was intolerable, and so ran down in hift from the Tribunal seat, for to aid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Licitor alone, and only stayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Patricians. So that the Coll, were fain to step between, and then the fray was apparelled. In which, there being G no stones flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, bawling, and chaffing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate houle called in great hurry: and with more confusion far they there in Council: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and misused, required that commissioners should fit upon this riot and make due inquisition: and the stoutest of them gave their determination as much by clamor and noise, as by sentence and opinion grounded upon reason. At last, when the tempest was overblown and their heat allayed, and that the Coll, hit them in the teeth, and reproved them, saying there was a little discretion and gravity in their

At what time Appius both upon a proud stomach, and arrogant spirit of his own by nature, and also to discredit and dishonour the word of his fellow Consul, in all actions of debt proceeded, and gave judgement with rigor against the debtors. Whereupon, both they that had been before imprisoned, were delivered again into their creditors hands; and other also became prisoners anew. Whereat when as a soldier, whose care it was thus hardly to be dealt withal, called upon the Consul his fellow for help, they ran all at once to Servilius, for his hands they claimed a promise: every one upbraided and reproached him with their service in war, with their fears there gotten, requiring that he would propose the matter again unto the Senate, and as a Consul, succour and protect his Citizens; or like a General, maintain his soldiers. These matters no doubt, moved the Consul: but so stood the case that he could neither will nor chuse, but dissemble, deal double, and temporize with them: to fully bent, and wholly wedded to the other part, was not only his colleague, but also the whole faction of the Nobility. Thus by bearing himself as a Neuter, and going as they say, between the bark and the tree, he neither avoided the hatred of the Commons, nor yet won favour with the Nobles: whiles the Nobles took him for a soft and bafe minded Consul, seeking to please all parties, and the Commons for as crafty and false dissembler: in so much as within a short time it appeared he was as much hated of the people as Appius. For, the Consuls hapned on a time to strive, whether of them twain should dedicate the Temple of Mercury. The Senate put over the deciding of this matter from themselves unto the people: and decreed withal, that to whether of them the dedication of the Temple was by the people's election granted, he should over and besides have the charge to purvey corn and victuals, he should erect and institute a College or fellowship of Merchants, and he in stead of the high Priest, should undertake the solemn feasts or festival days. Then the people gave the dedication of the Temple to M. Laetorius, principal Centurion of the vanguard: which as it easily appeared, was done not so much to grace the man, as who had an higher office bestowed upon him, then was fit for one of his degree and calling: as to disgrace and deface the Consuls. Hereat, one of the Consuls, yea, and the Patricians formed and fumed exceedingly against the Commons. But the Commons took heart unto them more and more, and began to proceed far otherwise, and to take another course then they purposed at the beginning: for despairing of the Consuls and Senate's help, when they saw a debtor sued and brought to the bar, they would run flocking from all parts together, so that the Consuls sentence and decree could not be heard for the noise and clamour. And decree or judge what he would, no man would obey. And so violently they went to work, that in presence of the Consul, the creditors were singled out, evil entreated, and misused of the Commons, being many together. So the whole fear and hazard of the main chance, even of liberty it selfe, was now altogether translated from the debtors to the creditors. In the very neck of these troubles, there arose a fear of the Sabin war, and when it was determined, there should be a muster of soldiers, no man would answer to his name and be enrolled. All this while Appius raged and took on, "inveighing bitterly against the nicety and popularity of his brother Consul, who with his keeping silence for displeasing the people, by his soft carriage of himself, had betrayed the Weal-publick, and over and besides that, he had not omitted justice for the loans of money, nor dealt according to law in that behalf, he had brought the matter forso past that he could take no musters by virtue of the decree of the Senate. Howbeit (saith he) the Common-wealth is not wholly forsaken and forsorne, nor yet the Consular authority utterly cast down and trodden under foot: for he would himself alone, if there were no more but he, defend and maintain both his own place, and the Senators dignity. While the

A multitude therefore stood this malapertly at their daily manner was about the bar, he commanded one principal Captain of sedition to be attached and hid away, and as he was haled to prison by the Sergeants and Lictors, he appealed. Neither would the Consul have given place to the appeal (for all he knew the people how they were bent, and what their doom would be) had not his obligation, (itself with much ado been overthrown more, through the direct authority of the chief nobles & Lords of the Senate, than by the clamorous noise & menaces of the multitude) so resolved him, and his heart so courageous to undergo their ill will and heavy displeasure. Thus grew the mischief more & more daily, testified not with open mouth & broad speeches only, but also (which was more pernicious and dangerous) by convenient, secret meetings, and consultations. At length these Colls, so odious unto the Commons, went one of their offices to wit, Appius man, wonderful well affected of the Nobles, Servilius liked neither of them nor the Commons. After whom A. Virginii, and I. Junius entered their Consulship. But then the Commons not knowing what manner of Capituli they should have, began to assemble together by night, some in Elgylis, others in the Comitien to the end, they might not be unprovided and to look upon a judgment, what to do in the common place, nor manage their business hand over head, and at a venture. Which the Consuls supposing (as it was indeed) a perilous example, and of ill consequence, propounded the matter before the Senators: but when they had proposed it, they could not orderly ask their advice what was to be done: they took to hand, kept such outcries and clamour at it, on all hands fretting and fuming, that the Consuls should lay upon the Senate, the burden and heavy load of that, which properly they by virtue of their authority, and office should execute and perform themselves; and surely if there were any Magistrates in the City (say they) there would not be thus suffered in Rome any other council, but publickly, whereas now the State is divided into a thousand Courts and conventicles; whiles some have their meetings and assemblies in Elgylis, others in Aventine: Affuredly, others only man indeed (for that is more than a Consul) such a one as Appius Claudius was, would soon slip out, and in one minute of an hour scatter these their unlawful assemblies. The Consuls upon this rebuke and check, replied again and demanded in this manner: And what would you have us to do (quoth they) for we are resolved to do nothing (sland and Gold), but with as great courage and diligence as shall be well liked of the Senators. Whereupon an order passed, that they should take muster, and levy soldiers with all rigour and fevering diligence. Moreover, that the Commons with idleness and ease were grown over-malpert and too licentious. And when the Senate was dismissed, the Consuls went into the Tribunal, & took their places, and summoned by name all the younger sort to appear: none making answer to his name, the multitude standing about as it had been to hear some publick Oration, said plainly, that the Commons from thenceforth would be no longer deluded, and that the Consuls should never get so much as one soldier, unless they would stand to their word, and make good the promise that publickly before was made, and restore to every man again his liberty, before they caused them to take weapon in hand: to the end they might fight for their country and country-men, and not for their Lordlike Matters. The Consuls saw well what they had in commission from the Senate & that of all those who within the Council house walls spake so stoutly & gave out to great waxes, there was not one present to take part of this odious malice of the people. And like they were to have a bitter fit and cruel broil with the Commons. They thought good therefore ere they tried the worst, and dealt by extremity, once again to ask advice of the Senate, and to confer with them. But then all the younger sort of the Senators, approached by multitudes, hard almost to the Consuls seats, willing them to give over their Consulship, and to resign up their rule and authority, to the maintenance whereof they lacked courage. Now when the Consuls had sufficiently weighed and tried both wayes, thus at length began they and said, A great sedition and commotion is toward, my LL. To the end therefore that ye pretend not ignorance, and lay another day ye were not foretold of it, there is a great indignation and commotion toward. We require therefore that they who find greatest fault with our remissness and lack of courage, assist us and fit with us while we take the musters: and since you will needs have us do, we will execute it according to their minds, that are most earnest and severest. Then come they back again unto the Tribunal, and commanded on self purpose, one of them that were there in fight to be cited and called by name. But he stood still and held his peace, with a company of men gathered round about to guard him, for fear he should have some harm or violence done unto him. The Consul then sent a Sergeant to attach him, who being repulsed off, then those Nobles which were there on the bench to assist the Consuls, cried out upon the shameful indignity, and said it was intolerable, and so ran down in haste from the Tribunal seat, for to aid the Sergeant. But the violent rage of the multitude, who let the Lictor alone, and only stayed him from laying hold on the man, turned upon the Patricians, so that the Coll, were fain to step between, and then the fray was appeased. In which, there being no stones flying about their ears, nor weapon drawn, there was more clamor, hawling and chaffing than any hurt done. Then was the Senate house called in a great hurry: and with more confusion than they there in Council: whiles they that pretended how they were beaten and thrust required that commissioners should fit upon this riot and make due inquisition: and the stoutest required that their determination as much by clamor and noise, as by sentence and opinion grounded upon reason. At last, when the tumult was overblown and their heat allayed, and that the Coll hit them in the teeth, and reproved them, saying there was a little discretion and gravity in their burns: as having carried with them such things only as were necessary for the sustenance of their life. Great fear there was in the City, and in this mutual and reciprocal fear, all men were perplexed and to seek what to do. The Commons follow'd of their fellow Commons doubted the violence of the Senators: the Senators again stood in fear and jealousy of the Commons that remained still behind: and wherein suspense whether it were better they abode still among them, or followed after their fellows. For how long a row ye, will a multitude once disbanded itself in quiet? Again, in case any forraign was should arise in the mean time, what might ensue thereupon in the end? In conclusion, there was no hope behind to be looked for, but in the concord of Citizens: and therefore the commons one way or other, either by reasonable conditions or unreasonable: were to be reconciled again and reduced into the City, there was no remedy, so it was thought good and agreed upon, that one Munnius Agripae (a fair spoken and eloquent man, gracious-witted and well-beloved among the commons, for that he was from them defended) should be sent as an Orator to treat with them. Who being received into the camp, after that old and harsh kind of salutation in those days, spake as men faith to this effect, and told this tale and parable: "Upon a time (quoth he, when as in mans body all the parts thereof agreed not, as now they do in one, but each member had a several intent and meaning; and yea, and a speech by itself: so I do beleve, that all other parts besides the belly, thought much and repined that by their carefulness, labor, and ministry, all was gotten, and yet all little enough to serve it: and the belly itself lying still in the mids of them did nothing else, but enjoy the delightful pleasures brought unto it. Whereupon they mutined and conspired altogether in this wise, That neither the hands should reach and convey food into the mouth, nor the mouth receive it as it came, nor yet the teeth grind and chew the fame. In this mood and fit, whilst they were minded to fashin the poor belly, behold the other limbs, yea, and the whole body besides, pined, waled, & fell into an extreme consumption. Then was it well seen, that even the very belly also did misall service, but leted the other parts as it received food it self: seeing that by working and concocting the meat thoroughly, it digested and distributed by the veins into all parts, that fresh and perfect blood whereby we live, we like, and have our full strength. Comparing herewith, and making his application to wit, how like this inefine and inward sedition of the body, was to the fell stomach of the commons, which they had taken and born against the Senators, he turned quoth the peoples hearts. Then began some treaty of unity and concord, and among other articles it was conditioned and granted, that the Commonalty should have certain sacred and inviolable Magistrates of their own among themselves, such as might have power to assist the Commons against the Consuls: Item, that it might not be lawful for any Senator to bear that office. So there were created two Tribunes of the Commons, C. Licinius and Lo. Albius. And these elected three other fellow officers unto them. Of whom Sicinius, the Author of the edition or insurrection was one, who were the other twain is not for certain known. Some say there were but two Tribunes created and no more in the mount Sacer, and that the sacred law was there made concerning their immunity.

common people first created.

During this insurrection and revolt of the commons, Syr. Caffius and Postumius Cominius entered their Consulships. In whose time a league was made with the people of Latium. For the establishing whereof, one of the Consuls layed behind at Rome: the other was sent unto the Volscian war, who discomfited and put to flight the Volscians of Amim, chasing and driving them into the Town Longula, which he won. And immediately betook Mucamites a Town of the Volscians, and after that with great force assaulted Coridi.

There was in camp then among the flower of gallant youths, one Caius Marius, a Noble young Gentleman, right politic of advice, active besides, and tall of his hands, who afterwards was intitled Coriolanus. Whiles the Roman army lay at siege before Corioli, and were amazed wholly upon the Towne-men within, whom they kept fast shut up, and feared no present danger at all from any forraign war without: behold, all on a suddain, the Volscian legions that came from Antium, assailed them: at which very instant the enemy also fell out of the Towne. Which Marius seeing, who by good hap quartered and warded there, with a lusty band of elect men, N not repressed and stopped the violence of those that issued and brake upon him, but also whiles the gates stood open, fiercely rushed in himself: and having made a foill laughter of people thereby, at his fitt entrance into the City, and caught up fire at a venture, flung it upon the houses that stood upon and about the walls. Whereupon arose a great outcry of the folk within the Towne, together with lamentable weeping and wailing of women and children, as commonly is seen in such a fright. Which at the very first, both hardened the Romans, and also troubled the Volscians: and no marvel, seeing the City taken before their face, for which they were come to rescue. Thus were the Volscians of Antium defeated, and the Towne Corioli won, And Marius through his praise, so much oblitured and stopped the light of the Consul's fame, that had it not been ingraven in brasse for a remembrance and monument, That there was a league with the Latines, and the fame made by Sp. Caelius alone (for that his companion was absent) there had been no record at all, but forgotten quite it had been, that ever Sp. Cominius warred with the Volscians. O

The fame year died Menenius Agrippa, a man all his life time before beloved indifferently of the Senators and the Commons: but after the insurrection, much more dear unto the Commons than before. This truce-maker, this mediator for civil atonement, this Ambassador and Messenger from the Senators to the Commons, this reconciler and reducer of the Commons home

A home again into the City, had not at his death sufficient to defray the charges of his funerals: the Commons therefore made a purse and a contribution of a Sextant by the poll, and were at the cost to inter and bury him worthily.

After this were made Conuls, T. Gregentius and P. Minutius. In which year when all was quiet abroad for any war, and the different all home haled up clean; and skinned: another calamity or more grievous entered the City. First, a dearth of corn, and all manner of victuals, by reason that the grounds upon the departure of the Commons were neglected and untilld. Hereupon ensued famine, even such as usually is incident to men beleagued. And verily the household of bondsmen, yea, and the commons too, had utterly perished for hunger if the Consuls had not B. in time made the better provision: by lending unto every man all abroad to buy up corn, not only into Hetruria, by coasting along the river on the right hand from Hoffia, and on the left hand by Sea, (passing through the Volcians Country) even as far as Cumes: but also into Sicily, there to lay for grain. Such was the care of the borders, that Rome was enforced to have need of succor and relief from afar. Now when they had bought certain corn at Cumes, it was no sooner embarked, but the ships were wayed and arrested there by Arifodentus the tyrant, for the goods of the Tarquins, whose heir in remainder he was. In the Volcians Country and Pomphilius they could buy none for money. There, the very Partizels themselves were in danger of violence, by the men of the Country. Out of Tuscan there came out upon the Tyber, wherewith the Commons were furnished and refreshed. And considering the freights they were in for want of victuals, they had been fore distressed and vexed with wars besides, and that in a very ill time, and unseasonable for them: but that the Volcians, who now were in readines, and upon the point to make war: had a peltence that rained hot among them. Which heavy crois and affliction, the enemies were so discouraged with, that when the plague began to stay, even then they continued still afraid.

The Romans both at Pellire augmented the number of the inhabitants and also at Norba, sending a new Colony into the Mountains; to be a Fortress and strength for all the territory of Pompinnum. Moreover, when M. Minutius & A. Sempronius were Consuls, great store of corn was brought out of Sicily; and it was debated in the Senat-house at what price the Commons should be served therewith. Many thought the time was now come to wring the Commons, and keep

D them under, and to recover again those royalties, which by their departure were forcibly wrested and dimembered from the nobility. But above all others Martinus Civiolumanus, an utter and capital enemy to the Tribuns power and authority, “If they will (quoth he) have their corn and “visuals at the old price, let them resort unto the Senators their ancient right and prehe-“mence. Why fee I (as one brought under the yoke of servitude, and put as it were unto a “ransome, by Robbers and Thieves) these Magistrates of the Commons? why fee I Scianus fo “mighty? Shall I endure these indignities longer than I needs must (I that could not bear Tra- “quanus to be king, I shall brook and suffer Steimus? Let him depart aside now, and take his “Commons with him: the way is open to Mount Sacer and other Hills: Let them carry away “with them the corn out of our possessions and Lordships, as they did three years ago: let “them enjoy, take for their use, and spend the store, which they in their foetry and fury have “provided. I dare be bold to say, that when they are by this calamity once tamed, they will “rather till and husband the ground themselves, than with weapon in hand, and by way of in“furrection, forbid and hinder the tillage thereof. I cannot so soon say, whether it had been as “meet, as I suppose it was possible and easy to effect, that the Senators by offering more gentle “conditions in the prices of corn and visuals, might have eased themselves of the Tribuns au“thority over them, and also have been disburdened of those impositions which will they, nil “they, were laid upon them. Well, this seemed to the Senate a sharp censure and severe sen“tence, which it had like to have caused the Commons to rise up in

of Coriolanus, and for very anger also it had like to have caused the death of Arms. For they muttered and gave it out in their tears, "That now they were laid at the P^rail'd with famine like enemies, defrauded and bereft of their meat and pittance: that the ourlandish corn, the only sustenance and food which fortune had mingled unto them beyond all hope, was snatched and plucked from their mouths, unless the Tribuns be delivered and yielded Prisoners hand and foot bound to C. Martins, unless he might have his pennyworth of the back and shoulders of the Commons of Rome. For he was now flart up and become their tormentor and hangman, to command them either to death, or to servitude. As he went out of the Council house, they had run upon him with violence, but that the Tribuns, as good luck was, served him with protests in time, to appear at a day, and come to his answer. Here-with, their furious anger was suppressed. For now every man saw, that he was himself to be the judge and Lord of his enemies life and death. Martius at the first scorned the Tribuns thundering G threats, and gave the hearing, as though he made small reckoning thereof, saying: That their authority had power granted by limitation, only to aid and not to punish: that the Tribuns were Tribuns to the Commons, and not to the Senators. But so spitefully were the Commons bent, and all so fit upon mischief, that there was no other remedy, but one man must pay for it to save & exale the rest of the Nobles. Howbeit, the Senators did what they could to withstand them: by opposing hatred and displeasure again and making all means, what either privately they were able of themselves, or jointly by their whole Order and degree to procure. And first, this countie they assayed assayed to stop and overthrow the suit commenced; namely, by setting their followers and retainers in sundry places to deal with the Commons severally one by one: & what they could to frighten them from meetings and assemblies together. Afterwards, they came all forth at once into the Forum or common place. A man that had seen them would have said they had been the parties themselves in trouble and accused, ready to hold up their hand at the bar: such praying, such a beseeching they made of the Commons, in the behalf of this one citizen, this only Senator; that if they would not in their love acquit him for their sakes, as innocent and unguilty; yet they would give him unto them as an offender and faulty person. In conclusion, when his day came, he made default and appeared not, yet continued they still in their angry mood against him. And being condemned in his absence, for contumacy, departed into banishment to the Volcians, I menacing his own country as he went, and carrying even then with him the revenging stomach of an enemy.

The Volcians at his coming received him courteously, and friendly intreated him every day more than others, as they perceived his anger more and more toward his country-men, by many complaints he made of them, and threats which that he oftentimes gave out against them in their hearing. He made his abode and sojourned in the house of Accius Tullius, who at that time was a mighty great man among the Volcians, and one that ever bare mortal malice unto the Romans. And whilst the one of them was provoked with an old cankered grudge, and the other set on and pricked forward upon a fresh quarrel and occasion of anger, they both laid their heads together and conspired to make war upon the Romans. This only thing stood in their way to cross their designs: They thought verily their Commons would hardly orkately at all be brought, to rise and take arms again, which they had so often unhappily attempted: And besides, their courages were well cooled, and their stomachs abated, by the loss of their youth in many and sundry wars often times afore, and now at last, by the late pestilence and mortality. They were therefore to go cunningly to work: that forasmuch as the old hatred against the Romans was grown out and worn away, their hearts upon some new anger might be kindled and galled again. There were by chance at that time in Rome, the great Games and Playes in hand, to be set out anew the second time: the occasion whereof was this: A certain householder one morning betimes before the fives and games began, had beaten with rods a poor slave of his under the fork which he carried on his shoulders, and driven him along through the mids of the Circus or Theatre: and with that began the playes, as if there had been no matter therein of frowle or Religion. But not long after, one T. Laetius a mean Commoner had a dream or vision: In which he thought that Jupiter complained and said, that the Dancer before the playes pleased him never a whit: and unless those games were newly exhibited again, and that very stately and sumptuously, some great danger should befall the City: willing him withal, to make relation hereof unto the Consul's. The man albeit in truth he was not without some fence and feeling of Religion and the fear of God: yet made he no such great scruple at the matter, but that the reverence he had of the Majesty and countenance of the Magistrates surmounted and dashed it clean: for fear lest haply he should become a talking stock in mens mouths, and be mocked for his labour. But this delay and sleeping of the matter, he bought full dear. For within few dayes his son happened to dye. And because he should be out of doubt what was the cause of this his losse and suddain misfortune, whilst he was troubled in spirit, with anguish and sorrow, behold, the same vision appeared to him again in his sleep, and seemed to ask him whether he had not yet sufficiently paid for this disobedience and contempt of God? threatening moreover, that in case he made no greater haste to certify the Consuls thereof, there was a greater judgement and plague toward, and that verneer. Now was the thing more evident than before, and past all peradventure. Howbeit he neglected and drave it off still, until he was himself overtaken with a grievous diselle, and brought to great weakness in all his joints. Then verily the wrath of the Gods taught him to be wiser. And being overworn with his pains past, and in fear of more presently to misse, he conferred with his kinsfolk and friends to be advised by them. When he had declared unto them what he had seen and heard: namely, how Jupiter had so often appeared unto him in his sleep, and that the fearful displeasure and threatnings of the heavenly Gods were shewed plainly by sundry mischances fallen upon him: by the full consent of all them that were about him, he was brought in a litter to the Consuls, into the Forum or common place, from whence by the Consuls commandment he was carried into the Council house. Where, when he had made report unto the Senators of the self-same things, to the exceeding wonder and admiration of them all, see another strange miracle: He that was brought into the Senate house a lame creeple of all his limbs, after he had once delivered his errand, returned home to his house (as it is recorded) sound upon his feet. Hereupon the Senate decreed, That the Games should be set out as magnificently as could be devised.

To these solemnities resorted, by the motion and perswasion of Accius Tullius, a great number of Volcians. But before they were begun, Tullius according to the complot between him and Martius at home, made a step or errand unto the Consuls at Rome, saying, that he would willingly commune and treat with them apart, of important affairs concerning the State. When the room was clear, and every man gone, he began in this wise: Loth I am (quoth he) if otherwise I could chuse, to speak ought but well of my country-men and fellow citizens. Yet come I

to the Roman Consuls.

A "not to complain of any action of theirs already passed; but to give a caveat; and provide that nothing be practised hereafter. The nature and disposition (I may tell you) of our people, is too too uncontant and untayed; more I know than I would they were, a great deal: that have we found and felt to our great cost and manifold damage, we it say who verily at this day by your long inturance, and not by good desert of ours, do find in good times and peace of safety. There is now here a great multitude of Volcians, the Playes and Games ready to be represented and celebrate. Your City will be wholly amused in the beholding thereof: I remember upon the like occasion, what was sometimes enterprised and wrought in this City by the youth of the Sabines; and my heart doth tremble and quake for fear, lest some inconsiderate, rash and foolish part be played by ours: thus much, O ye Consuls, I thought good in our behalf and yours both, to give you notice of before hand. As for me, I am minded presently to go from hence home, lest I being here seen, might be thought in some word or deed accessory unto them, and so culpable. Having made this speech he departed. When the Consuls had declared in the Senate this thing so doubtful; and yet proceeding from the mouth of so sure and certain an Author: behold, the credit of the man (as commonly it is seen) rather than the likelihood of the matter, caused them to be wary and circumspect. Yea, although there was no such need or cause at all. Whereupon the Senate made an Act, that the Volcians should be jogging out of the City. And divers cryers or Bedles were sent out sundry wayes, to command them to avoid and be packing before night. At the first, the Volcians were only much affrighted, and ran every man to and fro into his Inn to fetch away his things: But afterwards in the way homeward, they began to think more and more of it, and to grow melancholy: thinking it a great indignity, that like polluted and polluted persons, they should be driven from the Games, on festival holidays, discarded (as a man would say) and excommunicate out of the company both of God and man. Thus as they went along all on a row, as it were in one continued and joynt train, Tullius (who was gone alone as far as the Ferentina head) received the worst and chief of them, as every one came, and entertained them with complaints and words of indignation, and drew both them who willingly gave ear to his words, so fitly framed and tending to stir more coles, and also by their means the rest of the multitude, into a plain field, lying hard under the high way side. Unto whom assembled together as it were to hear a sermon, he thus began to speak: Admit (quoth he) you could forget the old wrongs and abuses offered you by the people of Rome, the losses and overthrowes of the Volcan Nation; yea, and all the other quarrels whatsoever; how can ye put up this dayes (pightful reproach and dishonor received at their hands: who to our great disgrace and shame, have begun their solemn Games? Perceived you not how they have triumphed over you to day? how as ye departed, ye were a spectacle and pageant to all men, citizens and strangers, and to so many neighbour nations adjoyning: how your wives and children were brought as it were in a show, to make them sport and to laugh at what conceit was in their heads (think ye) that heard the voice of the Bedle? what thought they that beheld you as you did lodge? what imagined that they that happened to meet this ignominious troop as they marched? Even this & no other, that there was some wicked sin among us, not to be named, whereby we should as malefactors, have been flayed and polluted their games if we had been present at the sight of them, & have committed some heinous act, that would require by some satisfaction or sacrifice to be purged; and for that cause were driven from having any conversation, fellowship, and society of good and godly men. Over and besides, how can you chuse but think of this, That we enjoy our lives (still, only because we halted our remove, if this may be called a remove, and not rather a plain taking of a flight and running away.) And yet you reckon this no enemy City, where, it ye had stayed but one day longer, you had dyed for it every one. Defiance is given already, and war denounced against you: but if ye be men indeed of courage, to their great cost and mischief that have denounced it. Thus being of themselves kindled enough with indignation, and by their words enflamed and set on fire, they went every man his way from thence home: and so effectually solicited each one the people where he dwelt, that in fine the whole nation of the Volcians revolted and rebelled. To manage this war, were chosen General commanders by one consent of all the Cities, Accius Tullius and Cn. Martius the banished Roman: in whom of the twain they reposed greater hope and this their hope failed them not. So as it soon appeared that the puissance of the state of Rome, consisted more in the dexterity of good Captains, than in strong armies of soldiers. For first he went to Circioles, from whence he expelled the Roman Coloners, and delivered the City clear and free unto the Volcians. Then by croise wayes he passed into the Latin street, called Via Latina: and regained from the Romans, these their Towns newly gotten afore, Saricium, Longula, Pollostia and Coridi. After this he wan Lanuvium again, and so forward he forced Corbio, Viteba, Trubi, Labinus, and Pedum. And last of all from Pedum, he marched on toward the City of Rome, and at Cluvia Fassa, five miles off, he encamped and foraged the territory about, sending with the foragers certain guides, to keep them from spoiling and doing harm in the Nobleness Lands: were it that he were more pightful to the Commons, or that thereby some discord might arise between the Commonalty and the Senators: which doubtles had soon grown, so mightily had the Tribunes already by their complaints and accusations, provoked the Commons forward (who of themselves were shrewd enough) against the heads and Magistrates of the City, but that the fear of forraign dangers, the greatest bond of civil concord that can be, held them in and knit their hearts together, were they never so jealous, suspected, and hateful afore one to the other. Herein only was all their difference, that the Senate and Consuls, reposed hope in nothing else save only in war: the Commons on the other side were desirous of any thing whatsoever, but war.

Now were S. Nautilus, and Sext. Furius Consuls: who as they were surveying and mustering the legions, and disposing of a good Corpus de guardapoon the walls and other places wherein they thought it expedient to keep a standing watch and ward: behold a mighty number called and cried hard for peace, and with shew sedition clamors, put them in exceeding fear: yea, and afterwards forced them to assemble the Senate-house together, and to propose concerning the sending of certain Embassadors to Cn. Marius. The Lords of the Senate seeing evidently the commons hearts to fulfithem, accepted and granted the motion propounded. Whereupon were Orators sent unto Marius to treat for peace. At whose hands they received this heavy and stout answer: "If to be the Volcians had their Lands restored to them again, then there might be some parle and treaty of peace: but if they will needs at their pleasure still enjoy that booty which by war they have gotten, then would be in remembrance of private wrongs done unto him by his country-men, as also of the friendship and courtesy shewed him by strangers that had given him entertainment, do his best to make it known unto the World, that his courage and itomack is incensed, and not abated and quailed by his banishment. Then were the same Embassadors sent again the second time, but they might not be admitted once to set foot within the camp. It is reported moreover that the very Priests in their Pontificatus, in their rich vestiments and goodly ornaments, went with supplication to the tents of the enemies, and turned his heart no more than the Embassadors had done before them. Then the dames of the City came flocking all about Veturia the Mother, and Voluntia the wife of Coriellanus. Whether this proceeded from any publick Council and was done in Policy, or came only of womens fear, I find but little in any records. But howsoever it came about, this one thing is certain, they perswaded so effectually with them, that both Veturia an aged woman, and also Voluntia with her two little daughters that she had by Marius, went toward the enemies camp, to see if women by their prayers and tears, might save the City, which men with spear and shield could not defend. When they were come into the camp, and word brought to Coriellanus, that there was an exceeding great train of women thither arrived: at the first he, as one that had relaxed, neither for that publick Majesty in the Embassadors, nor yet at the religious reverence, which he both conceived in mind, and saw with his eyes in the clergy, stood much more stiffly bent against the tears of fifty women. But afterwards one of his familiar friends, who had seen and known Veturia there, mourning and bewailing exceedingly above the reit, as the flood betwixt her daughter in law and her little Nephews: "If mine eyes be matches (quoth he) and deceive me not, here is your mother, your wife, and children. Whereat, Coriellanus, turning like a man well near beside himself, arose from his seat, and ran to meet his mother, and to embrace her. But the woman falling in stead of prayers into a fit of choleric: "Let me know (quoth she) before I suffer thee to embrace me, whether I am come to an enemy or to a son, whether I be in thy camp as a captive prisoner, or as a natural mother. And have I lived indeed so long, and rubbed on still in this miserable old age of mine for this to see thee fifth M a banished man, and after that to become an enemy? Couldst thou find in thine heart to waste and spoil that country which bred thee, which fostered thee, and brought thee up? And be it that thou hither marched with a cruel intent and full of threats, would not thine anger and fell wrath slack, when thou didst set foot within the borders and marches thereof? And being come within the sight of Rome, arose not this in thy mind and thought, Within those walls yonder is my house, there are my house-holds, my mother, my wife, my children? Why then, belike it I had never been a mother, and born a child, Rome had not been assaulted. And if I had no son at all, I might have died well enough in my native country, whiles it remained free. But as for me, neither can I suffer ought, more for thy dishonesty and shame; nor more to mine own calamity and misery than this: and most wretched cause though I be, yet long time to I N cannot continue. But for thee here, look thou well to it, I advise thee, and have pity of them, who if thou go on as thou beginnest, are like to feel untimely death, or endure long captivity. Then his wife and children hung about him, and clipped him: wherat the women fell a weeping on all sides, bewailing their own case and the fate of their country. So as at length the man was overcome. And after he had taken them in his arms likewise, he let them go: and himself dislodged and removed his camp backward from the City. When he had withdrawn the legions out of the territory of Rome, he gave himself, men said, such hard and displeasure for this action, that it cost him his life: and murdered he was, some report one way, some another. But I find in Fabius a most ancient writer, that he lived until he was an old man: who reporteth this of him: That oftentimes in his latter dayes he used to utter this speech, A heavy case, and most wretched, for an aged man to live banished. The men of Rome envied not those women their due duty, served praises. So free was the world in those dayes, from depraving and detracting the glory of others. For in memorial hereof to all posterity, there was a Temple built and dedicated to Fortuna Mulieribus, i. Womens fortune.

After all this, the Volcians joynd the Equians unto them, and returned into the territory of Rome. But the Equians would no longer abide Acim to be their Commander. And upon this

A this strife between the Volcians and Equians, whether of them should appoint a General over the army raised jointly of them both, first they grew to a mitying, and afterwards to a cruel battle. Such was the good fortune of the people of Rome, that two armies of their enemies, were thus by civil discord and contention, no less mortal than obstinate, overthrown and brought to naught. Consuls then, were T. Sennius and C. Aquilius. To Sennius were allotted the Volcians, and to Aquilius the Herniks (who also were but and up in arms) for their several Province. That year were the Herniks vanquished, but with the Volcians they fought to, as they departed on even hand going and taking the like.

After them were Sp. Cassius, and Proculus Virginius made Consuls. Then was there a league concluded with the Herniks, and two third parts of their Lands were taken from them. Whereof the one moiety, C. Cassius the Consul was minded to distribute among the Latins, the other among the Commons. To this donation he laid out also a good portion of ground, which being Commons by right, he found much taste, that it was in the tenure and possession of private persons. This act of his made diversie of the Senators, namely, such as were great landed men and interested therein, to startle for fear of hazarding their estate. Over and besides, the Senators all in general were in great perplexity, lest that the Consul by this largess, should rise by popular favour to such greatness, as might prejudice their free holds, yea and endanger the very main chance of publick liberty. And this was the first time that the law Agrovia was published: And to forward unto this present hour, it was never debated of, but with exceeding great stir and troubles of the State. The other Consul withstood this largess, with the general consent of the Senators, and without contradiction of some Commons: who at the very first began to dislike, and utterly abhor, that the donation was so common, and from the natural citizens, extended to their allies and confederates. Moreover, they might offend them even the Consul himself Virginius, openly in his solemn Orations before the people, to deliver by way of prophetic, and as it were to prognosticate, "That this was a pitiful largess of his brother Consul, and that those grounds would in the end embroil the Latins therewith, and that it was the very high way to set up a Kingdom again. For to what other intent (I pray you) were their allies, and the nation of the Latins associate in the same? To what purpose either, was a third part of the Lands won by conquest, given again to the Herniks: profess themselves but a while before, but that these nations might have

C. Cassius to be such another C. Claudius of their allies as Coriellanus was. And thus by disavowing and crossing the law Agrovia, he became now to be popular and gracious with the people. Then both Consuls thrived much, who might please and gratify the Commons most. Virginius, by giving out that he would maintain and infer the Lands to be divided, so they were assigned to none but to the citizens of Rome. Cassius again, who in the largess of the Lands, seemed to Court and insinuate himself with the Latins and thereby was of the citizens less regarded and reputed to the end, that by some other benefit he might regain the hearts of his countrymen, was of opinion, and made a motive, that the money which was received for the Stilian can, should be repayed unto the people. But the Commons refused and abhorred that, as a very bribe and ready bait for a Scepter and Crown. So greatly were all his gifts, for the deep rooted suspicion and jealousy of his aspiring to a Kingdom, loathed in the conceits of men, as if they had flowed in wealth, and been rich enough. And for certain it is recorded, that so soon as he left his Office, he was condemned and put to death. Some report, that his own father did the execution: and that upon examination privately had at home within his house, he finding him faulty, whipped him first, and to killed him, and conferred the goods and chattels of his son, as a Decuria to Ceres, wherof a Statue or Image was made, with this Inscription or Title, Given out of the house of Cassius. I find in some records (which foundeth nearer to the truth) that he was by the Quetors of Celo Fabius, and L. Valerius, indicted of treason, and being convicted, was by a verdict of the people condemned, and his house by order from the whole City, rased and pulled down. And at this day, it is the voyd yard that lieth before the Temple of Tellus. But howsoever he had his tryal and judgement, privately or openly condemned he was when Srr. Cornelius and Q. Fabius were Consuls. Long continued not the peoples anger and spite against Cassius. So sweet was the law Agrovia in it self, that when the Author and Upholder thereof was out of the World, they longed to have it on foot again. Which desire of theirs was the rather set on fire, through the pinching niggardie of the Senators, who having that year subdued the Volcians and Equians, kept the soldiers sitting, and defrauded them of the spoil. For what prizes soever were gotten from the enemies, the Consul Fabius sold and brought into the Exchequer or Chamber of the City.

Now was the name of Fabius already odious to the Commonalty, for the last Consuls take yet obtained the Senators so much, and held their own so, as Celo Fabius was created Consul with L. Aemilius. This made the Commons more malicious and bent to mischief. And edition at home caused war abroad. For rain war restrained civil discord for a while. Both Senators and Commons with one accord, under the conduct of Aemilius, fought fortunately with the rebellious Volcians and Equians, and defeated them. Howbeit more enemies perished in the life, than were slain in the battle: so hotly the horsemen pursued them when they were on the fire, that they were not able to stand, and gave not over. The time year was the Temple of C. Cassius conscripted in the Ides of Quinctilis. It had been vowed afo. e. time in the Latin war by Posthumus the Dictator. His son was created Dumvir, for that purpose, and dedicated it.

This year also the Commons hearts were set upon the law Agraria, and longed afresh after the sweetness thereof. The Tribuns of the Commonalty graced and credited their popular authority, with propounding a law as popular and acceptable to the people. But the Senators supposing verily that the multitude was furious and outrageous enough, and too much of themselves, without any hire and reward, stood in great dread and horror of these largesses, as the very allurements and provocations of rash and heady attempts: the stoutest champions of their side to withstand the law, were the Consuls. That part therefore and State of the City had the better hand, not only this present year, but for the next ensuing. For they chose M. Fabius Celer his brother, for the one Consul, and L. V. Ferius for the other, a man of the twin more odious in the eyes of the Commons, in regard of his late accusation of Sp. Cassius. In which year also there was strife and much ado with the Tribuns. But both law and law-makers with their glorious bragging and vaunting of their goodly donative, which they could not effect, proved vain and came to nothing. Upon this, the name of Fabij, who after three Consulships together one after another, by them born continually without intermission, were inured and tried in the broils and contentions of Tribuns, was in great request and reputation: and in their house and family remained still for a good while after, that dignity, as an honor well and worthily bestowed upon them. Then began the Veientian war, and the Volscians likewise rebelled. But for any war abroad whatsoever, they had strength enough and to spare, if by jars at home among their own selves they had not abused the same.

Besides this disquietness and affliction of all mens minds, occasioned by these dissensions, there happened (to amend the matter well) prodigious, and strange tokens from Heaven, daily in a manner threatening both in City and Country the heavy hand of God. And when as the soothsayers and wizards were sent out unto, to search forth the cause of Gods wrath and indignation both in publick and private, as well by inspection of the inward of sacrificed beasts, as by aspect of birds and souls, they could assign it to nothing else but this, that there was some error committed in their sacrifices and divine liturgie. Those fearful and prodigious signs proceeded still so far, that one Oppia a vestal Nun, convicted and condemned of incest, suffered death.

After this, followed Q. Fabius and C. Terentius Consuls. In which year the discord at home was nothing leis, and the war abroad far greater. For the Æquians role up in arms: the Veientians all entered the confines, and made much spoil. And whilst they were more and more careful about these wars what order to take, Celer Fabius and Sp. Ferius, were made Consuls. By this time the Æquians assaulted Ardea a City in Lavinium, and the Veientians having spoiled themselves with prizes and booties, made great cracks that they would give an assault upon the very City of Rome. These fearful news, which ought to have abated and taken down the stomacks of the Commons, made them much more fierce and fell, and they returned of themselves unto their old biases of refusing warfare: but Sp. Licinius their Tribune, thinking now the time was come to enforce upon the Senators the law Agraria, upon this exigent and extreme point of necessity, had taken upon him to stop the levying and setting out of an army. But he drew upon his own head the whole hatred and displeasure of the Tribuns themselves and their authority. For the Consuls opposed themselves against him no more bitterly than his own companions in office: by whose assistance the Consuls went through with the matter. And for two wars at once, there were enrolled two armies. The one under the leading of Fabius, against the Æquians, the other, against the Veientians commanded by Ferius. Against whom there was nothing done worthy of remembrance. As for Fabius, he had somewhat more to do with his own men than with his enemies. That man himself alone was he, that being Consul upheld the Common-weal, which his army for hatred of their Consul, had as much as in them lay, utterly betrayed. For when as he (above many other warlike feats and parts of a right worthy General, whereof he shewed singular proof, both in preparation, and also in managing of the war) had so marshalled and ranged his battail, that with sending out the horsemen only, he disordered and brake the ranks of his enemies host: behold, the footmen would not follow on after that disarray: neither, when the exhortation of their leader whom they hated, prevailed not, could their own shame at least-wile, and the publick dishonor for the present: no, nor yet the imminent danger like to ensue (in case the enemy had taken heart again and made head) force them to amend their pace one jot, and make more speed. Neither could he possibly make them (if to do nothing else) so much as to march still in battail array: but full against his commandment they retire with their ensigns: and as men fory in their hearts and ill paid, (he that had seen them would have said they had lost the field) cursing their General one while, and the valiant service of the horsemen another while, they return to their Tents. Neither wist the General what way to remedy this so pestilent an example and dangerous precedent. Thus we may see, that brave men, of singular and excellent wits, have been more to seek and fail in their skill, how to govern a subject than to vanquish an enemy. The Consul returneth to Rome, having purchased more hatred of his forward and stubborn soldiery, than won honor by his martial prowess. Nevertheless, the Senators prevailed so much that the Consulship kept residence still in the name of the Fabij. So, they created M. Fabius Consul, and joyn with him Cn. Manlius for his colleague.

This year likewise, had one patron and maintainer of the law Agraria, to wit, Tiberius Pontificius a Tribune. He taking the same course, and following the steps of Sp. Licinius, hindered the

A the matters for a while. And when the Senators were herewith disquieted again, then Clodius arose up and said, "That the year before, the Tribunes power was overmatched, and the neck of it broken in proof, only for that present, but in example for ever hereafter: so much as 'as it was well seen then by experience, that of it felt even among their own selves it fell apieces: and never will there want at any time one good Tribune or other, that would be glad to get the start and victory of his fellow-yea, and the favour also of the better part for to purchase the good of the weal-publicke. And that there would be more Tribunes, if more were needfull, ready to assist the Consuls: and it there were but one. even that, one were sufficient to stand against all the rest. So that the Consuls and LL. of the Council would but do their endeavour, to win unto the State and Senate, some certain of the Tribunes, if they might not compass all. The Senators being thus schooled and taught their lessons by Appius, both all ingenerally would courteously salute and friendly intreat the Tribunes, and also in particular as many of them as had been Consuls, according to that interest that each man had in any one of them privately, partly by favour and friendship and partly by countenance and authority, prevailed so with them, that they were willing and well content to enfore the Tribunes authority to the good and safety of the Common-weale. So by the help of foure Tribunes, against one that hindered the good of all, the Consul took matter of the soldiery. Then set they forward on their voyage to war with the Veientians: unto whom from all parts of Hærutia they came to aid and succour, not so much for any love that they bare to the Veientians, as in hope that the pusillanerie of Rome through intestine and civil dissention, would decay and come to nought. For in all the Diets and Assemblies of the States of Hærutia, the Princes and Peers gave it out and laid, That the power and greatness of the Romans was everlasting, if through mutual discord they warred not so among themselves: which hath been found the only bane of wealthy and flourishing Cities, where y^e mighty Empires became mortall and subject to a final end. "Which mischief (say they) this long time hath been prevented and delayed, partly through the sage advice and prudent government of the Senate partly by the patience and long sufferance of the Commons: but now they are come to a great extremity. Divided they are, and of one City become twain: each part have their severall Magistrats and laws by themselves. At the first, however they were wont to be at odds, and to fall out at the muttering of soldiery, yet in war they would hold together, and obey their Captains. Howsoever they tarred at home in the City, were they State never to far out of order, yet so long as martial discipline was on foot and took place, they might be reclaimed, and all troubles staid. But now, the former use and custom of disobeying Magistrats within the City, is taken up by the Roman soldiery in the very Camp. For no longer since than the last war of all, in the time of battell and conflict, their whole Army agreed of their own accord not forced by any extremity that they were put unto, for to give the Veientians as much as in them lay, even after they had lost the field, the entire victory and honour of the day. For they abandoned their ensigns, left their General alone in the skirmish, and against his will, retired themselves into the Camp. And surely, if they hold on still this course, Rome may be won by means of her own soldiery: there needs no more to do, but to proclaim

E "and make: shew of war: For even the very detinies and gods themselves would perforce all the rest. Upon these hopes and deep persuasions, the Tuscan, who afore were wont otherwise: to have the better, and sometimes to take the worse in their wars, put themselves in arms. The Roman Consuls likewise were in feast of nothing else so much, as of their own power, their own force and weapons: being affrighted at the remembrance of that foul and shameful example, and that lewd part played in the last war: lest peradventure they should put it upon this point of hazard, as to be in danger of two battels at once. And therefore in doubtfull and perilous a case they held off fight, and kept themselves within their Camp, if haply time and space would assuage their anger, bring them into the right way again, and reclaim them to good and reasonable order. The enemies hereat, as well Veientians as the other Tuscan, made the greater hate, and were more sharp set, and provoked them to the field: first by riding up and down before their Camp, hard at the gates thereof, braving and challenging them forth, at the last seeing they could not prevail, they left to rating and railing one while upon the Consuls themselves, another while upon the whole Army, in these and colour of civil dissention to cloak their "and a proper device to save their cowardice, and under a colour of civil dissention to cloak their "fearfulness: and the Consuls forthwith mistrust more the faithfulness and loyalty of their soldiery in service, than they doubted their valour and sufficiency of service. Many, here is indeed a "new kind of mutiny. What? Armed men to hold their peace, and sit still? Hitting them in their "teeth besides, with their new start-up rising, and late spring-bale beginning, letting fly against them "lies and truths, one with another, and spured not. For all this foule stir they kept flourishing and reviling them under their very trench, and hard at their gates, the Consuls themselves were not one jot troubled. But the foolish and ignorant multitude what with anger, and what for shame of their reprobate will terms, was much displeased: and one whilst wholly gave over to regard and think upon home troubles and dissentions, and had rather than their lives be revenged of their enemies: Among again, they would not in any case gratifie the Nobles and Consuls, nor with them good offices. Thus the hatred both against the enemies without, and the Consuls, within tore together in their hearts: untill at length forrain occasions got the mastery over them: so proudly, to insolently the enemy scorned and made a game of them. Whereupon they came thick by troops H to the Generals pavilion, calling upon them for to fight, requiring to put forth the banner and signall of battell. The Consuls laid their heads together, and as taking good advisement, conferred on the matter a good while. To fight they were most willing and desirous: but this desire was to be kept back and dissimiled, and thereby augmented: to the end, that by holding off by opposing themselves, and making some stay, they might let the souldiers on, and being once set on it, they might make them follow more eagerly at once. In conclusion, this answer was returned unto them: That they made too much haste: it was not yet full ripe, nor the time come, to give battell: they must hold themselves contented, and keep within their tents: proclaiming moreover, that no man be to hardy as to fight: and whosoever attempted it, without their warrant and commission, they would proceed against him with all rigour, as a professed enemy. Thus were they dismissed. And the less willing they thought the Consuls were, the more eager were they, and let upon a battell. The enemies besides, when they had intelligence, that the Consuls were not disposed to fight, and had taken order to the contrary, were incited and inflamed to much the more. For now they supposed they might brave it, and insult upon them safely without danger. For why? The Consuls durst not: truth the souldiers with weapon in hand: "now were their mutinies cometo the height, and to break forth in extremities: now and never before the Roman Empire and Dominion was at an end. Presuming confidently upon this ground, they run together unto the gates, redoubling a thousand villanous and opprobrious terms, and much ado they had to forbear afflicting the camp. Now could the Romans on the other side hold no longer & endure this continually and indignity, but came running from all parts of the camp unto the Consuls. And now not leisurely as before, make they request, and by mediation of their chief centurions: but all at once on every side piled them with outcries and clamors. Now was the matter come to ripeness, yet slow were the Consuls still and hold off. Then Fabius, seeing the tumult increased & that for fear of a mutiny his brother Consul had yielded already, aulcidence to be made by found of trumpet and thus he spake: "I know full well O M. Minius, that these fellows are able to win the victory: but that they will go to do I know not; and they themselves have caused me to doubt. I have therefore let down my rest and fully resolved not to give the signal of battell, unless they swear to return out of the field with victory. Once did the souldiers in battell deceive a Consul of Rome: but the gods in heaven shall they never deceive. Then M. Flavius, a Centurion, one of the foremost that called for battell to instantly, "Return will I (quoth he) O M. Fabius victor out of the field: and if I fail, then I beseech rather Jupiter, Mars, Gracchus and other gods to make me a fearful example & show thee their wrathfull displeasure upon me. The same oath after him took the whole army, every man against himself. Thus when they had sworn in the trumpet sounded. Then buckled they themselves toward battell, full of anger, full of hope. Now they bid the Tuskans revile and rail their fill: now being at all points armed, they wished they had afore them man to man their enemies, those that were so lively and lusty with their tongues. Right valiantly bare themselves that day, as well the Commons as the Nobles. But the name of the Fabii, the Fabii I say, passed all the rest and won the spurs. Who in this piece of service purposed to gain again the hearts of the Commons, which in many civil contentions, were set against them. And so they embattelled themselves. The enemies likewise, both the Ventians and also the Tuskans legions were nothing behind, as making almost free reckoning that they should be fought withall no more than the Equians had been. Nay they were in hope of some greater disorder amongst them, and that, considering they were so malecontent, and the occasion to doubtfull they would play a more shameful part and shew their leaders a beastly cast. But it fell out otherwise. For never in any other war afore, gave the Romans a hotter charge upon the enemies: so much had they of the one side with pittefull taunts and reproaches nettled them, and the Consuls on the other side with their long delays what them on. Scarce had the Tuskans any time to put themselves in battell array, but at the very first encounter and shock, calling their javelins carefully from them (I know not how) rather than leysling and charging them against the enemy, they came presently pell-mell to hand-strokes, and to deal with their swords, which is the cruellest fight of all other. The Fabii among the foremost in the forefront fought valiantly, shewing their countenance a brave fight, and a noble example to follow. Where Q. Fabius, who had been Consul the third year before, the leader and forwardest of them all, whiles he advanced himself and rushed amongst the thickest of the Ventians and scuffled with many of them together, was not aware of his deadly enemy so near: but behold a certain Tuskans, a mighty man of strength and skillful at his weapon, ran him through the breast with his sword. Which was not so soon drawn forth of his body, but Fabius fell down headlong upon his wound and died. Both armies felt the fall of that one man: and therewith the Romans retired. With that M. Fabius the Consul leaped over his body as it lay along, and holding forth his target between: "Why, souldiers (quoth he) is the oath ye took to run away and retire thus in, to the Camp? And are ye more afraid indeed, of these most dastardly enemies, than of Jupiter and Mars, by whom ye swore? But I, who was not sworn at all, will either make return with victory, or else O Q. Fabius, fighting here by thee. I will live and die by thy side. To whom, C. Fabius, who the year afore was Consul, replied again: "Think you brother, with these words to make them to fight? Nay, the gods are they that must do it, by whom they have sworn. And let us like noble Knights, and for the honour of the Fabian house,

A "stir up and animate our souldiers by fighting rather than by exhorting. Thus rode the two Fabii with lance in rest into the forefront, and drew the whole battell with them. The fight of one side being thus renewed, Cn. Manlius the Consul in the other wing betisred himself, and did for his part as valiantly: Where hapned almost the like fortune. For as in the one wing the souldiers followed Q. Fabius, so in this they cheerfully went with the Consul himself Manlius, chasing the enemies afore him as discomfited. And when he was fore wounded, and thereupon gone out of the battell, his men supposing him to be slain, drew back, and had indeed lost ground and given way to the enemy, but that the other Consul with certain Cornets of horsemen, galloped again into that quartex, and cried aloud that his fellow Consul was living: and that himself who had defeated the other point, was ready with victory to assist them, and so upheld the middle of the Army, that now began to shrink. Manlius also, to encourage his men, shewed himself in open fight. Thus the knowledge and presence of the two Consuls made the souldiers take heart afresh. Here withall besides, were the enemies battalions the thinner and weaker, because they trusting upon their exceeding number, had drawn out those that were to serve for succour and supply, and sent them away to assaile the Camp. In the surprising whereof, finding no great ado and small resistance, whiles they had more mind to stile it a pillage, than to fight for the victory, they lost time. In the mean space the Roman Triarii, who were not able to hold out the first assault and entrance, having dispatched to the Consuls certain messengers, to give knowledge in what terms they stood, cast themselves round in a ring, and retired themselves to the Prætorium or Generals lodging, and of themselves alone, made head and renewed the fight. Likewise Manlius the Consul being ridden back to the Camp, at every gate set certain souldiers in guard: and so enclosed them within, that they could not get forth. The Tuskans being in this desperate state, fared more like madmen than hardy souldiers. For when as they ran here and there every way, according as they had any hope to find issue and to escape, and had madeundry offers and attempts in vain: behold one troop of tall fellows in a body, made no more ado, but knowing the Consul, who by reason of brave and goodly armour was a fair mark, charged upon his own person. The first volley of their throw was received by those that stood about him, but their violence afterwards could not be endured. The Consul himself was wounded to death, and fell down in the place, and all the rest were discomfited. Whereupon the Tuskans took more heart unto them, but the Romans were so distressed, that they ran all about the Camping great fear. And in extrem jeopardy had they been, but that the Lieutenants caught up the Consul's body, and made passage at one gate for the enemy. Through which they rushed forth and discharged disorderly, untill they light upon the other Consul presently afore his victory: where they either fell again upon the edge of the sword, or were fastened and put to flight. This brave Victory thus achieved, was heavy yet and sorrowful for the death of two noble personages. And therefore when the Senate had decreed a Triumph, the Consul returned this answer: "That willingly he could allow thereof in regard of the passing good service performed in that war, to see an Army might triumph without a General. But as for himself, seeing that his house grieved and mourned for the death of his brother Q. Fabius, and that he

B "Common wealth was half fatherless as it were, for the loss of a Consul, he would not accept the Law itself deformed and foully blemished, both with publique and private sorrow. This Triumph, thus by him refused, was more honourable than all the Triumphs in the world. By which we may see that glory despised in the time returneth otherwhiles in greater measure. Then solemnized he with great honour the souldiers upon another, fitt of his fellow Consul, and then of his own brother. And he himself made the funeral Oration for them both. But so as in yielding unto them their due commendations, he went himself away with the greater pain. And not unmindful of that rule which he had learned in the beginning of the Consulship, namely, to win again the hearts and love of the Commons, he divided the cure of his hurt and wounded souldiers among the Senators. With most of them the Fabii were charged, and if none were they better tended and looked unto than others. Whereupon the Fabii now waxed popular, and that, for no other policy and intent, but only to do the Common wealth good: and therefore with the favour and good will of the Commons, as well as of the Nobles, C. Fabius was created Consul with T. Virginus. Whole principal care above all was this, even before war, before battles, before all things else, that seeing now in some measure there was good hope of concord begun already, the hearts of the Commons might be perfectly linked and united together with the Nobles, and that, with all speed possible. In the beginning therefore of this year, before that any Tribute of the Commons should prefer the law Agrois, he thought good and gave his advice, that the Nobles should prevent all, and go in hand first themselves to perform their part, and shew their bounty: namely in parting the lands gotten by conquest, and freely bestowing the same as equally as might be among the Commons. For it was meet and require that they should be possessed thereof, whose sweat of brows, nay, whose blood had paid for the purchase. But the Senators could not hear of that ear, but misliked of the motion: yea, some of them complained and said, that the lively spirit, and courageous disposition of C. Fabius, which sometimes he had, was now by reason of excessive glory, grown to be toytill and full of vanities. And there an end of civil factions for a time.

C But the Latines were much troubled with the incursions and irrodes of the Equians. Thither was Cato with an Army, who invaded and overran the very country of the Æquians, foraging and spoiling as he went. The Æquians thereupon retired, & put themselves into their towns, and kept close within the walls, whereby there was no memorable field fought. But at their enemies the Veientians hand, they received an overthrow, and that through the rashness of the other Consul: and had not Cato Fabius come to the rescue in good time, the whole Army had been utterly lost. From that time there was neither war nor peace with the Veientians: but their dealing was much what after the manner of robbing. For when the Roman Legions were abroad, they would leave the field, & take to their Cities: when they perceived the Legions were removed and gone, they would make excursions and waste the country. Thus plaid they mock-holiday, and dallied with them, shifting off war with quietness, and quietness again with war, by turns. So as the Romans could neither all wholly rest careless and secure for them, nor yet go through-fitch, & make an end once for all with them. Besides, other wars were either presently at hand, to wit, from the Æquians and the Volscians, who could no longer sit still, till until their fresh grief, and pain of the last defeature was over-past; or else the Sabins, never other but enemies, yea, and all Hetruria, were like all shortly to rise and take arms. But the Veientian a continual enemy, rather than dangerous, provoked them to anger with reproachful taunts, often than with any great peril or hurt. And yet as little as it was, it might not time be neglected, nor gave them leave to be employed in the mean while elsewhere. Then came the whole house and kindred of the Fabii unto the Senat, in the name of them all spake the Consul in this wise: "My Lords of the Senat, the Veientian war had need rather of a resident garison, as ye know well enough, to keep the frontiers, than great forces for expedition. As for yonise ye to other wars, let the Fabii alone to deal as private enemies with the Veientians. We dare undertake and warrant, that the State of Rome shall receive no dishonour nor danger there. We are fully minded and resolved at our own proper cost and charges, to maintain and manage that war, as appropriate and peculiar to our name and family: the City shall be charged neither with men nor money there. Great thanks were given them for this their forwardness. The Consul being come out of the Senat house, was attended home with the whole generation of the Fabii who stood at the porch of the Council Court, expecting the Senat's decree. And being commanded to be ready in armor well appointed the next day, and to give attendance at the Consuls door; they departed from thence home to their own houses. The bruit hereof spread all over the City. All men extoll the Fabii up to the skies, saying, "That one family had taken upon them the whole burden of the City. The Veientian war now is become (say they) a private charge, and requieth the power and force only of that private persons could make. Or that there were two such families more in Rome of that rock-like and valour: that one of them might take the Volscians in hand, and another the Æquians. Surely all the nations bordering hereabout might soon be subdued, and the people of Rome sit still the while and rest in peace. The day following, the Fabii armed themselves, mounted on horseback, and repaired to the Rendevous aforesaid, as they were commanded. Then came the Consul forth, clad in a rich coat of arms, and standing in his porch, beheld his whole blood and lineage armed and marshalled in order, and being received in the midst of them, caused the guidons and Cornets to be advanced. Never marched three along the City an Army either less in number, or more renowned for their fame and the admiration of men. Three hundred men of arms they were and six, all nobly defended, of one flock, of one race and name all. And of all them there was not one that a sage and prudent Senat would have refused at any time as insufficient, to be a Leader and Commander in the field. Thus furnished with the force and strength that one only Family could make, they advanced forward, threatening and menacing the ruin and destruction of the Veientians. There followed a number and multitude of Citizens: one private company by themselves of kinsfolk, allies, friends, and fellows, casting in their minds no mean matters, neither of hope nor fear, but all exceeding measure and surpassing another. Of the common people, moved with a careful regard, and astonished again in a favourable applause and admiration of their enterprise, crying with one voice, Hold on right valiant Knights, March on a Gods name in happy hour! God grant lucky speed, answerable to your magnanimous attempt and designments: and look for, at our hands from henceforth, Consulships, triumphs, all rewards and honourable dignities whatsoever. And all the way as they passed along the Capitol, the Capitane and other Temples, they besought the gods, as many as were presented to their eye, as many as they could conceive in their minds, to vouchsafe that Squadron to be attended upon with good success and fortunate felicity, and soon to return home again in safety to their native country and loving parents. But, alas the while, in vain were all these prayers made. Then set they forward on their journey, leaving Jove Church on their right hand, taking the ungracious and unlucky way, from the gate Cermentalis, until at length they came to the river Cremera. That was thought a convenient place to fortifie in, and there to plant a garison. After this were L. Æmilius and C. Servilius made Consuls. And so long as they adventured no farther than foraging the Country, the Fabii were good enough, not only to defend their hold and fort: but all their frontier parts and marches where the Tuscan Territory adjoyneth to the Roman, they so coursed and traversed, between the one confine and the other, that they kept all their own in safety, and mightily endamaged the enemies. Then furcised they a while, but it was not long from wasting and spoiling. By which time both the Veientians had gathered Cato Fabius the Consul, to the Lords of the Senat.

The lineage of the Fabii after so much a war with the Veientians in their own persons, and at their proper charges.

* At this day Papa was.

A power out of Hetruria, and assaulted the fort of Cremera, and also the Roman Legions, under the conduct of the Consul L. Æmilius, encountered the Tuscan in open field. And yet the Veientians had hardly time enough to put themselves in order of battell: so suddenly at the very first skirmish, whilst the files were entering into array under their colours in the vanguard, and the succours and supplies a placing and disposing in the rearward, a Cornet of Roman horse charged them so hotly on the flank, that they had not room and space, either to begin fight, or to keep their standing sure. Thus were they discomfited, and chased back as far as Saxa rubra, i.e. Red rocks (for there they were encamped) where they humbly craved peace. Which when they had obtained (see their inbred inconstancy so naturally engrained) they were weary of it, and repented thereof. Before the Roman garison could be withdrawn from Cremera. And so the Fabii once again skirmished with the Veientian Nation, without preparation of greater war. Neither made they inrodes only, and sudden violent incursions into the Territories: but sundry times they encountered with banners displayed, and joined battell in plain field. And that one house and kindred of the Roman people carried oftentimes the victory away from that most mighty and rich City (in those daies) of all the Tuscan. This took the Veientians at the first for a foul disgrace and indignity. But afterwards they deviled to lay trains, as occasion should serve, and entrap their fierce and hardy enemy: and well paid they were and rejoiced, that the Fabii upon the good success that still followed them, were become more bold and venturesome. And therefore divers times when the Romans were abroad a plundering, they would drive cattle in their way but yet so, as they might seem to light upon them by chance. The rustic peasants made shew as if they fled out of the Country, and left the fields waste: yea, and the companies of soldiers lent out to restrain and keep their spoiling, made shew of running away, pretending often they were afraid than they had cause indeed. So as now the Fabii by this time let to fight by their enemies, and thought to well of themselves, that they beleaved verily their power was invincible, and might not be withstood in any ground, or at any time whatsoever. This conceit and hope of theirs let them so aloft, and made them so bold, that clyping upon a time cattle far from Cremera (for there was a large plain between) although here and there they might descry armed soldiours of their enemies, yet from their fort they ran down, with bridle in their horse neck. And when unadvisedly without foresight, they were past the ambush, which was laid covertly about the very way that they were to pass, and were stragling here and there disorderly, driving the cattle away, which gadded in and out, as their manner is when they be scared and affrighted, then suddenly start the enemies all at once out of the ambushment: so as both before and behind, and on every side they were beset and environed with enemies. At the first the very houting and outcry they made round about terrified them: afterwards flew their shot from all sides. And as the Tuscan gathered themselves together, the Fabii were soon hemmed within a round battallion of enemies, standing armed thick and close one to another: and the nearer the enemies approached about them, in so much less room were they enforced also to cast themselves into a ring. Which, considering their arraies were thrust so thick together in so straight a compass, made their small number appear the less, and the multitude of the Tuscan to carry a greater shew. Then forbearing to fight as they first intended, one every hand alike, and with all at once, they made head to one only place. Thero they endeavour with might and main, body and armour: and with a pointed partel wedgewise pierced through and made themselves passage. And they took the way that led to a little hill, rising up with an easy ascent. From whence at first they made resistance only and kept their ground: but soon after, when by reason of the vantage of the hill, they had some time to breath themselves, and to take heart again after so great a fight, they forced the enemies also to give back that were mounting up the hill. And as few in number as they were yet by the benefit of the ground they had gotten the better, if the Veientians had not set a compass about the hill side, and gained the very top and pitch thereof. Thus became the enemy again to have the upper hand. And so were the Fabii slain every man, and not one of them escaped, yea, and their fort overthrowen. And sated, Three hundred and six there were that died, as all writers do agree. One only of the name was left behind at home, well near fourteen years of age, for to renew and encrease, as out of a flock, the name of the Fabii, and to prove in time to come the greatest prop and pillar that the people of Rome should have in their dangers and extremities many a time both at home and abroad.

But ere this heavy loss and overthrow hapned, C. Horatius and T. Menenius were Consuls. Meneius was sent forthwith against the Tuscan, puffed now up with pride for this their victory: with whom then also he fought unfortunately and sped but ill. For the enemies surprised and got the Janiculum, and the City had surely been besieged, (considering that besides war they were greatly distressed for want of victuals, for the Tuscan were passed over the Tiber) but that G. Horatius the Consul was called home from the Volscians. And so near approached the enemies in this war and pressed to the very walls, that first there was a skirmish on even hand at the Temple of Spes: and another again at the gate Collina. Where albeit the Romans got but very small odds of the enemy, yet did that conflict upon a little recovery of wounded courage prepare the soldiours to better service in the battels ensuing.

Now were A. Virginius and Sp. Servilius created Consuls. The Veientians after this late defeat, came no more into the field, yet they robbed and wasted still. And from the Janiculum as from

from a fortrets and place of safe retreat, they would make excursions out into the Territory of the Rome all about, and neither cattle nor country people could any where be in safety for them. But afterwards, they were overtaken themselves in the same wile that they had caught the Fabii with. For as they followed after certain cattle, which were driven forth here and there of purpose to draw and train them abroad, they were plunged themselves headlong into an Ambuscado laid for them. And the more they were, the greater was their slaughter. Upon this foil, their cruel and fell anger gave the occasion and overture of a greater overthrow. For having crossed the Tyber in the night season, they gave the attempt to make an assault upon the Camp of the Consul Scruvilius. But being discomfited, and many of them slain, the rest retired themselves from thence, and with much ado recovered the Janicie. Straight after this, the Consul also passed over Tyber, and encampeth himself strongly under the Janiculum. The morrow morning by Sun rising, so venturesome he was by reason of his fortunate fight the day before, and more for the scarcity of corn and victuals, which drove him to take he cared not how rash and dangerous courses, so they tended to more quick and speedy expedition, full fondly he advanced forward, and marched up the steep hill of the Janicie, and charged the enemies hold: but being let back himself from thence more shamefully than he had the day before repelled the enemies: yet by occasion that his fellow Consul came in the while to refuse, he and his Army both were saved: and the Tuscan enclosed between both hosts, were forced to turn their backs, both to one and the other, and were killed every mothers son. Thus by a rash enterprise (which as good luck was) sped well, the Veientian war came to an end. The City then, as it enjoyed peace, so it came again to be better stored of corn and victual: both for that there was more grain brought out of Campania, and also because the old store that was hoorded up came abroad, by reason that no man now stood in fear of dearth to enfee.

Afterwards upon plenty and ease they began to be busie again, and their heads to work, seeking to broach old troubles at home, since they had none to occupy them abroad. The Tribunes they fell to sollicite and infect the Commons, with their venom and poyson, the Law Agraria: inciting them against the Nobles that gaind it: not in general terms only, but also by touching particular persons. For Q. Confidius and T. Gentius, who were for the Law Agraria, framed an indictment, and sued T. Menenius. And this was laid to his charge, to wit, the loss of the fort and garrison at Cremora: for that, he being Consul lay encamped not far from thence. But of this danger he soon flopped the course, both because the Nobles laboured and took his part, no less than they had done afore for Coriolanus: and also the affection and favour that men bare to his father Agrippa, was not worn out, and clean forgot. The Tribunes used moderation therefore in the penalty, for having commenced a capital action against him, and convicted him thereof, they set a fine on his head of 2000 Affes. Howbeit this cost him his life: for he grew, men say, into such a melancholik fit for shame of this disgrace, that he fell thereupon from grief of heart unto a pining sickness which followed him to his dying day. Then was there another accused and brought into trouble, to wit. Sp. Servilius, so soon as he was out of his Consulship: at what time as C. Nautilus, and P. Valerius were Consuls. In the beginning of whole year the Tribunes L. Cadius and T. Statius, called him straightwaies to his answer. Who sustained the violence of the Tribunes not as Menenius did, by his own intreaty and the prayers of the Nobles, but bare himself confidently upon his own innocency, and the good grace wherein he stood. Blamed he was likewise, and charged for the battel with the Tuscan at Janiculum. But being a man of an hot spirit and stout courage, as he carried himself before in the publike danger, so now in his own private peril, by refusing in a bold and stout speech that he made, not only the Tribunes, but also the Commonalty, and calling in their teeth and reproving them, for the condemnation and death of T. Menenius, by whose fathers means the Commons being in times past restored, had obtained first those very Magistrats and Laws, whereby at this day they exercise such rigour: he went through all his troubles, and with much boldness avoided the present jeopardy he stood in. The testimony of his Colleague Virginius stood him in great stead, who produced forth as a witness. N made him partner with himself in all his worthy acts. But that process of judgment which passed against Menenius (so altered were they now, and repented therefore) did him much more good, and struck it dead here.

When this broil and contention was ended at home, the Veientians war began abroad: to whom the Sabins also had joynd their power. Whereupon the Consul P. Valerius, with the aid of the Latines and Hernicks, was sent out with an Army to Veii: and incontinently he set upon the tents of the Sabins, as they lay encamped under the walls of their confederates, and put such a terrour amongst them, that whilst they ran forth scattering by bands and companies, some at one gate some at another, to repell the violent assault of the enemies, it hapned that the gate which he first advanced his ensigns against, was won. And within the trench small fight there was, but O more man-slaughter. The tumult and noise hereof was heard from out of the Camp into the City. And the Veientians in great fear ran hastily to their weapons, as if Veii had been surprised. Some make speed to succour the Sabins: others do what they can to assail the Romans, who were wholly busied about the pillage of the Camp. For a pretty while they were put to some trouble, disordered, and withdrawn from their purpose: but afterwards they themselves advanced their banners, and made head against the one side and the other. The horsemen withall, sent in by the Cons,

A brake the Tuscan array, and put them to flight. And thus in one hour two armies were defeated, two most puissant nations, and nearest neighbours to the Romans vanquished. Whilst these exploits were performed about Veii, the Volcians and Aequians had encamped themselves in the Country of Latium, and harried the marches thereof. Whom the Latines of themselves, with the help only of the Hernicks, and without any Leader or aid at all from the Romans, forced to abandon their tents: and besides the recovery of their own goods again, at hieved a great and rich booty. Norwithstanding all this, the Consul Nautilus was sent from Rome against the Volcians. They were not well pleased, I believe, with the manner of it, that their allies should wage war at all with their own power and direction, without the Army and conduct of the Romans. He feared not to work all the mischief he could, all abuse and might possible against the Volcians: yet could not they be brought to fight a field. Then succeeded L. Furius, and C. Manlius, Consuls. To Manlius fell the charge of the Veientian Province. Howbeit, war there was none at all. But at their own sence, a truce was granted unto them of forty years. And they were enjoined to find corn and souldiers pay. Peace was not so soon procured abroad, but presently ensued discord at home. For at the instigation of the Tribunes, by occasion of the Law Agraria, the Commons were set a madding. But the Consuls skared neither with the condemnation of Menenius, nor yet with the peril wherein Servilius stood, refilled all they could. And when the Consuls were once out of their Office, Gentius a Tribune laid hold upon them, and arrested them and L. Aemilius with Opter Virginius enter their Consulship. In some Annals or yearly records I find Popilius Julius Consul instead of Virginius. But in this year, whoeever then were Consuls, Furius and Manlius being indicted before the people, went about arrayed in vile apparel and mournful weed to the younger sort of Senators, as well as the Commons perfwading, advising, and warning them to forbear and refuse all dignities and offices of state, yea, and all charge of Common-weal. And as for the Consuls rods born afore them, their purified robes with purple, and chair of state, they should esteem no otherwise of them than of the pageants carried in a funeral pomp. And that with these gorgeous ornaments and ensigns they were but destined to death: much like to beads adorned with sacred white ribbands and labels, appointed to sacrifice. But if the sweetness of a Consulship were such, let them consider now withall, and perfwade themselves, that it is become private and overweighed with the power of the Tribunes: and that the Consul, as if he were the Tribunes sersant, must do all at his beck and command. For if he quethched never so little, if he seemed to regard the Senators, or make account of any thing else in the whole State but of the Commonalty, let him feel before his eyes the exile of C. Marius, the judgement and death of Menenius. The Nobles incensed with these speeches, from thenceforth began to consult and confer together, not openly and in publike council, but privately, and apart from the privy of many. And when they were resolved once upon this point, that those accursed parties now in trouble should be enlarged one way or other, by hook or crook: then the cruellest advice, and hardest course that could be delivered best pleased them and for to put in execution the most audacious designsments whatsoever, there wanted not one or other to give counsel. Well the law day of trial came, and when as the Commons gave attendance devoutly in the Forum, in great expectations of the sequel and issue, they began at first to marvel much, that the Tribunes Gentius came not down in place: and suspecting somewhat because of his long tarrying & delay, they imagined that he durst not for the great men and chief Magistrats of the City: and so they complained, that the common cause was forsorn and betrayed. At the last, they that kept about the door & porch of the Tribune his house, brought word that he was found at home stark dead. Which news being once noised through the assembly, mark how an Army is perplexed and scattered when their General is slain, even so in all the world the Commons slip and every one, some one way some another. But above all others the Tribunes were in bodily fear, being thus by their fellow taught how little help or none at all, their sacred and redoubted Laws afforded. The Nobles could not dissemble their joy, nor use it with moderation, but shewed it excellently: and so little repented any one of them of the fact committed, that they avowed it, and took it upon them, and would not seem culpable in the action: but gave it out in plain terms, that the Tribunes by foul means were to be ramed & their wings clipped in a mischief. Upon this their victory, so shameful a precedent in times to come there went out an edict for the publishing of a mulct: and whilst the Tribunes were in this feare dunned, the Consuls without any contradiction, went through with it clear. But then were the Commons much more offended at their Tribunes: hence and sitting still then at the Consuls rule and imperious government: saying, "Farewell freedom now, farewell liberties and all: now is the old world come again, and the Tribunes authority is both dead and buried together with Gentius. Now they were to go in hand and bethink themselves of some other course, how they might withstand the Senators proceedings: and seeing they were destitute of all other help to rely themselves upon, the only way was for the Commons to trust to themselves, & stand upon their own guard. Whereas therefore, there gave attendance upon the Consuls 24 Lictors or Vexers, Commoners all no better, none more contemptible and base minded if they met with those that would fear them at naught: they might thank themselves only, and their own timorous conceits & imaginations, that such things were so dread and terrible. Thus having animated & provoked one another with these speeches: there was a Sergeant sent from the Consuls to one Valerius Publilius a Commoner, who because he had been been a Leader in the field of certain bands, pleaded his immunity for being a common souldier again. Volero calleth for help to the Tribunes: but there being no man to relieve him, the Consuls commanded the man to be stripped out of his cloaths, and the rods to be made ready for to scourge him. Then quoth Volero, "I appeal unto the people, seeing the Tribunes had rather have a Citizen and freeman of Rome beaten with rods in their preference, than be murdered themselves by "you in their beds. But the more fiercely he cried on till, the more cruelly fell the Lictor to cut and slice his apparel for to uncase him. Then Volero being himself the stronger man, and assisted withall by some whom he called unto him, thrust the Sergeant from him: and where he perceived the mainest out-cry and loudest noise of his adherents, that fumed and chafed in his behalf, thither retired he, to shroud himself among the thickest, crying: "I appeal and beseech the "Commons of their protection and succour. Help Citizens, help fellow-souldiers. Never fail

"and wait for the Tribunes, until they come, who have themselves need of your assistance. Hereat at folk were raised and gathered together, and addressed themselves as to a Battell. A foul piece of work was trowed, full of exceeding danger, and like it was, that no man would have had regard either of common law or private honesty. When the Consuls in this so great a broil and storm of outrage came in, to prevent further mischief, they knew soon by experience how slenderly guarded against danger, the Majesty of Rulers is, where force is waning. For their Lictors were beaten, misused, and ill intreated, their rods broken all a peeces, themselves driven out of the Common place, and forced to take the Senat house, doubting how far forth Volero would proceed in the train of his victory. But when the riot was well appeased, they assembled the Senators together, and complained there of their injuries received, the violence of the Commons, K and the audacious presumption of Volero. After many opinions and sharp censures delivered among them, the Ancients and Elders prevailed at length, who thought it not good to let the anger of the Nobles against the head-strong rashness of the Commons. And the Commons so highly favoured and embraced Volero, that in their next election they made him their Tribune for that year, wherein L. Pinaris and P. Furius were Consuls. Who contrary to all mens expectation, that thought verily he would have exercised his Tribuneship in molesting and vexing the Consuls of the former year, preferred the publique cause before his own private grievance, and gave not the Consulso much as one foul word. Only he preferred a Law unto the people, that the Magistrates of the Commonalty might be created in a ward-Leet, or Assembly of the Tribes L and Wards. Thus under a title, which at the first sight seemed nothing hainous, passed a matter of no small consequence, but such as abridged the Nobles of all power and authority, to create Tribunes whom they would, by the suffrages and voices of their vassals and favourites. But when the Senators redified with all their might, the going forward of this Act most pleasing and plausible to the Commons, and yet none might be found of the brotherhood of Tribunes, that by the authority either of Consuls or of Senators could be brought to joyn in his way by their negative voice, which was indeed the only means to cross it: the business, notwithstanding in itself so weighty to wield, and so hard to be compassed, held out with much debating the year through. The Commons then made Volero Tribune again. The Senators on the other side, supposing the matter would now come to a final trial once for all, created for their Consul Ap. Clau- M dius, the son of Appius: who even for the old contentions maintained by his fathers, who was both hated of the Commons, and also hated them again: and he had for his companion in government T. Quintius. At the very beginning no matter was treated of before that Law. But as Vol- ero was the first deviler and breacher of it, so his fellow Leilius was the more earnest and hot maintainer thereof, as he came more fresh unto it. The stoutest he was besides, by reason of his great military glory, for that in those days there was not a taller man of hands, nor more active than he. Now, when as Volero went straight to the substance of the Law in hand, without any circumstance of words, and forbore to inveigh against the Consuls person, Leilius began his speech with challenging Appius and his house, as most proud, and cruelly affected to the Commonalty of Rome: avouching earnestly, "That the Nobles had made, not a Consul, but a butcherer N
"mentor, to afflict and mangle the Commons: but being a rough-hewn souldier, and not used "to make Orations, his tongue could not frame to express his mind as freely as he would: and "so his utterance failing him: Since that (quoth he) O Quirites, I cannot so readily deliver that "in my speech, as I can make that good indeed which I have spoken: Be you here to morrow, and "in this very place I will either get this Law enacted, or I will lie in the dust and die for it before "youall. The next day the Tribunes were gotten into the Temple or hall first. The Consuls and Nobility abode still in the assembly of the people, for to hinder the passing of the Law. Then commanded Leilius all the rest to avoid and depart, but those only that were to give their voices. The young Gentlemen of the Nobility flock still, and gave no place to the Tribunes Officer. Then willed Leilius some of them to be attached. But the Consul Appius replied again, O
"That a Tribune had authority over none but Commoners: forasmuch as he was a Magistrate,
"not of the people, but of the Commons. Neither could himself, of his absolute power (Consul
"though he was) oberving the custom of his ancestors, command any man to avoid: for that the "usual form of words ran thus, May it please you my Masters, O Quirites if you think good so depart.
Soon was he able, thus laying the Law unto him, by way of scorn and contempt, to outface Leilius, and put him down. Whereupon the Tribune chafed, and set into an heat, sendeth an

A Officer to the Consul: the Consul likewise, a Lictor to the Tribune, crying often aloud, that he was but a private person without command, without Magistracy. And doublets the Tribune had been hardly used, but that both the assembly rose up in a rage, and took part with the Tribune against the Consul: and also there was a concourse of the multitude, raised out of all parts of the City into the Common Hall. Appius notwithstanding stood stiffly to it still, and abode the brunt of this tempestuous storm: neither had this broile laid without some bloodshed, in case Quin- tius the other Consul, had not let some of the Aldermen that had been Consuls, to get his brother Consul by force (if otherwise it might not be) out of the Hall, whilst himself was in hand,
"one while with the Commons, to appeale their iury, by way of intreaty and with fair words, B "otherwhiles besought the Tribunes to break up the assembly, perswading with them to take "more leisure in this their heat and anger: for that time and place would abridge nothing of their "power, but would joyn counsel and advice thereto: concluding withal, that both Nobles should "be ruled by the people, and the Consul ordered by the Nobles. Hardy and with much ado were the Commons quiered by Quintius, but far more trouble had the Nobles to still the other Consul.
At the length, when the assembly of the people was dimissed, the Consuls called the Senat together. Where after much variety of opinions, proceeding from fear and anger, according as the one or the other swayed among them: look how much longer time they had to reclaim their mind from violent courses, and largely with deliberation to consider of the matter: so much the more their hearts went against all contention, and farther true: inasmuch, as they yielded Quintius C hearty thanks, that by his travel between parties, the discord was well allayed. And to Appius they were petitioners, "That he would be content, that the majesty of the Consul might be no great"er than would stand with the unity and concord of the Citizens. For whilst the Tribunes for "their part would needs have all, and the Consul on the other side draw all to them: between this
"this pin-kning and haling there was no strength left in the midst: and to conclude, the Common"weal was rent, torn, and dimembred between the rulers thereof: who strove rather for the managing and rule, than for the safety and preservation of the State. Against whom Appius replied "with a solemn protestation before God and man, and said, "That the whole publike was aban"doned, forlorn, and betrayed by nothing else but foolish fear: that the Senat wanted not a Con"sul, but the Consul wanted Senators: who now yielded to harder conditions than they had be-D "fore time in mount Sacer. Howbeit overweighed at length by the general consent and accord of the Nobles, he was content: and so the law passed quietly, was by royall consent authorised. Then and never before were the Tribunes created in a congregation of the tribes, and by their voices, Piso writeth, that there were three more made to the other, as if there had been but twain before:
and he nameth also the Tribunes, to wit C. Saccius, L. Numitorius, M. Duellius, Sp. Licinius, & L. Me- celius. Then had the Volscians and Equians, between the civil edition of the Romans, & the beginning of war, harried & wasted the country: that in case the Commons had made an infirmition, they might have retired to them as to a sure place of retreat & refuge. But when all was hushed & matters compounded between the Nobles and Commons, they removed their camp backward.
Appius Claudius was sent against the Volscians: and to Quintius fell the Province of the Fi- E quians. The same rigorous severity continued Appius till in warfare, that he used at home in the City: but so much more freely, for that he was not curbed nor held in by the Tribunes. The Commons he hated, more than his father had done afore, seeing he was overwaxed, and had taken the foil at their hands: and being the only Consul, opposed against the Tribunes power, yet managed his head, the law passed clear away, which the former Consuls his predecessors, with less ado, not with so great hope and expectation of the Nobility, had ever hindered and laid. This his anger and indignation gave an edge to that fell stomack of his by kind, for to plague and punish his souldiers with imperious and lordly command. But so let they were to spurn again and disobey, that by no forcible means they could be tamed doing all things that they did lazily slowly, forwardly, and fubbornly. Neither bathed they for shame, nor stood in awe for fear. If his will was they F should march on apace, they would on set purpose go far and slowly: If he encouraged them in proper person to intend their business, they would all of them slack their former fever, wherein to they were entred of themselves: whilst he was in place, they would hang down their heads and look on the ground as he passed by they would secretly curse him in their hearts. So as that invincible stomack of his against all hatred of the Commons, would now and then grieve hereat.
And when he saw that all the shrewdness and rigour that he used was in vain, and that now he could do no good with his souldiers, he fell to checking the Captains and Centurions, saying, They had spoiled and marred the Army, terming them Tribunes of the Commons, and other-whiles in taunting-wise nicknaming them Voleros. All these doings were the Volscians aware of, and therefore were they more eager and forward, hoping that Appius should find the Roman G Army as forward and disobedient, as they had been against Fabius. And to say truth they were more crooked and impy with Appius than with Fabius a great deal. For they were not only unwilling to have the victory as Fabius his Army was, but also desirous to lose the victory and be overcome. Being brought forth and set in battell array, they shamefully rook their heels and fled into their tents: and never made head and resistance, before they saw the Volscians with banners displayed, advancing against the munitions of their Camp, and a foul slaughter committed upon the tail of their reeward. Then were they driven perforce to fight for very necessity, that the enemy thus far forth Victor, might be kept from the Wall and Trench: and yet so, as it was very apparent, that the souldiers passed for nothing else, but only to save the Camp for being won: for some of them rejoiced at their own loss and delectation. Whereat, the stout stomach of Appius was nothing daunted nor his heart broken: but he minded to deal cruelly with them, and thereupon summoned a general assembly. Then the Lieutenants, Marshals, and Colonels, came running unto him, advertising him in no case to try matters, and to enforce his authority. The very ground and strength whereof resteth wholly in the accord of obedient people: adding moreover, that the souldiers commonly gave out, that they would not go to the assembly: but rather they might be heard every where, calling upon them aloud, to dislodge and remove out of the territory of the Volscians: moreover, that the enemy now Master of the field, was but a while since advanced to the gates and rampier, and well near possessed of them: whereby they were not only to suspect, but might evidently see before their eyes some great matter toward of dangerous consequence. Whereupon at last he was overruled, and (forasmuch as his souldiers thereby should gain nothing but delay of their punishment) remitted the assembly for that time: and after proclamation made to set forward in their journey the next day, and to depart in the morning very early, he caused the trumpet to sound the remove, and to march away. The Army being gone out of the Camp, and ready to be set in order of a march at length, the Volscians who were gotten up by the same sound of the trumpet, plaid upon the tail of the renews: the noise whereof passed from thence to the vanguard, & so disordered the emigns, so troubled the ranks by reason of that fright, that neither could the direction and commandment of the Captains be heard, nor the Army be brought into battel array. No man minded any thing at all but to run away, and disorderly in great numbers, they fled back over the dead carcases and armors that lay on heaps, and to escape: and never lay they their flight, until the enemy gave over the chase. At the last, the Consul having called his souldiers together that were run away so scattering (for with all the speed that he made after to call them back, he could not reclaim them) encamped without his enemies ground in a place of security. Then he called them all together to an assembly, and inveighed bitterly, and not without just cause, against the whole Army, as having betrayed the discipline of war, and forsaken their colours: asking every one of them what was become of their banners? And what they had done with their weapons? And as many souldiers as were unarmed as many ensign-bearers as had not their ensigns, the Centurions also, and those that received double allowance, and forsook their bands and companies, he caused to be scourged with rods & to lose their heads. The whole number besides, were by lottised, and every tenth man as it fell out, executed. But contrariwise, in the expedition against the Æquians, the Consul and his souldiers, strove to exceed one another in civility and kindness. Quintus was by nature mild and cheerful, and the cruelty of his brother Consul, that never sped well, made him take more joy in that his gentle disposition. Whiles the General and his Army comforted thus together, the Æquians durst not confront them, but suffered their enemies to range all abroad and forage the country: so as in no former wars got they greater booties from them: and all was bestowed among the souldiers. Over and besides their garments, they had their due praises and solemn commendations, wherein souldiers take no less delight than in rewards and gifts. So that Army returned home better affected to their General, and also to the Nobles for their Generals sake: reporting that the Senate had given to them a loving father, but to the other Army a lordly master. This year thus spent with variable fortune abroad in war: with grievous discord as well at home as abroad, was above all most memorable and famous for the Tribes-Elect. A matter of more note, in respect of their victory that entered into the action, than of consequence, in regard of commodity that grew thereof. For the very Elect it self lost more credit by excluding the Nobles out of that assembly, than either the Commons got strength, or the Nobles did forgo thereby. But more trouble some was the year following, whiles T. Claudius and T. Æmilius were Consuls, both for the variance of the three States about the law Appianæ, and also for the arraignment of Appius Claudius, Whom, being a most bitter adversary of that law, and a great maintainer and upholder of those that possessed and held the common lands, as if he had been; or a third Consul, M. Duellius and C. Sicius arrested and ended. Never before that day came to the bar, a person to be tried before the people, so odious unto the Commons: charged with so many wrongs done of his own, so many of his fathers afore him. In regard whereof they were highly displeased and offended with him, The Nobles likewise had not lightly laboured so earnestly nor strained themselves so much for any one as for him. Who being the patron and protector of the Senat, the mainstainer and upholder of their port and dignity, a man ever opposed against all the trouble some broils of Tribunes & Commons, was in no way delivered as a friend to the Commons in their anger and only for that he had overthrew and pushed himself in heat of contention. But of all the Senators it atewer, Appius Claudius of himself alone was he that cared not a rush, either for Tribune or Commoner, nor yet for his own arraignment. No mending threats of the Commons no earnest prayers of the Senators could once make him. I say, not to change his apparel and in humble manner to seek and crouch unto men for to be good unto him: no nor so much, as when he came to answer for himself before the people. one with to no thing and let fall (as it were) that rough and sharp kind of speech that he was wont ordinarily to use. He kept the same frowie countenance still, the very same frowardness and crabbedness of visage, the same spirit of boldness in his apology and defence. Inasmuch, as many of the Com-

Plautus faith, they shold be Ballinado, wide Carol, Sig. de panu.

Quintus beloved of his foot diers.

Appius Claudius was weighed at the bar.

A Commons were no less afraid of Appius standing prisoner, there arraigned at the bar, than they had been of him, sitting as Consul in his ivory chair of estate. In pleading of his cause, he spake briefly and at once to the point, with the same accusatory spirit that he had ever used in all his pleas and actions. With his boldness and resolute contancy, he so amazed both Tribunes and Commons, that they themselves deferred the day of giving sentence, and suffered afterward the suit to hang and depend till undetermined. But not long after, even before the Law day appointed was come, he sickned and died. Whole funeral praises when as the Tribunes went about to hinder, the Commons would not suffer, that the death of so worthy a man, should be defrauded of the due honour and solemn obsequies, and gave audience as quietly and attentively to the commendation of the man now dead, as they did afore to his accusation while he was alive: and with a goodly train attended his corps to the grave.

Ap. Claudius dieth.

The time year Antius the Consul made a voiage with an army against the Æquians, and seeing he could not train the enemy forth to fight, he made a bravado to assail the Camp: but there fell such a terrible storm and tempest from heaven, with hail and thunder-claps that he was disappointed of his enterprise. And that which made it more strange and wonderful, he had no sooner founded the retreat, but the weather proved so fair and calm again, that he made some trouble and matter of conscience, to give a second assault unto the trench, as if it had been defended by the special power and providence of God. So, all the heat of war turned to the waiting only of the Commurey. The other Consul Æmilius warred with the Sabines. And elsewhere also, became the enemies kept within their walled towns, the Territories were spoiled. But afterwards the Sabines raised with the sifting, not only of their villages and hamlets, but also of the good towns and burroughs, whereof in those parts there were many, and those well peopled, encountered the foragers: and after a doubtfull skirmish, they departed alunder, and the morrow after raised their Camp, and retired themselves back into a place of more security, which the Consul taking for a sufficient argument and proof, that the enemies were defeated, left them to, and dislodged likewise without any end of the war.

During these wars, and whiles discord continued in the City at home, were T. Numitius Priscus and A. Postumius created Consuls. Now seemed it that the Commons would no longer abide the deterring of the Law Appianæ. And as they were about to put it to a venture and to try the utmost by extremity they took knowledge partly by the smoke and flame of the villages on fire, and partly by the running away of the villagers, that the Volscians were near at hand. Which occurrence repelled and kept down the sedition which was now come to ripeness, and ready to break forth. For the Consuls forced by the Senate immediately to the war, by taking the servicable youth with them out of the City, reduced the rest of the Citizens to more quietness. And the enemies verily made no further attempt, but after they had given a false alarm, and let the Romans in a foolish fear, diminished away as speedily as they could. Then Numitius went to Antium against the Volscians, and Postumius against the Æquians: where having well-near received a great loss and defeat by a train laid for him: such was the prowess and manhood of the souldiers, that they recovered all again, which by the negligence of the Consul had like to be lost. But better was the conduct and government of the Army against the Volscians. For there, at the first skirmish the enemies were disarranged, put to flight, and chased as far as to Antium, a City (for that time) of right great puissance and importance. The Consul durst not assault it, but went from the Antates Coma, another town, but nothing to wealthy. Whiles the Æquians and Volscians thus assailed the Roman Armies and kept them occupied, the Sabines were once robbing and spoiling to the gates of the City of Rome. But within few daies after, they themselves received more damage than they brought, by occasion that both Consuls with two armies were entred in great anger into their Consoles. In the end of the year some peace there was, but disquieted, as at times before, with the variance between the Nobles and Commons. The Commons in a peevish and angry fit would not be at the Election of the Consuls. So by the Senators only and their followers, there were elected Consuls, T. Quintius and Q. Servilius. The like year to the former these Consuls had sedition, and trouble some in the beginning: but afterwards upon certain war, quiet and still. For the Sabines with a running Camp having pulled over the plains of Cressiminius, and put all to fire and sword about the river Anio, were chased back, well near from the gate Collina and the walls: howbeit they drove away with them exceeding great booties both of people and cattell. Whom the Consul Servilius followed hard with a power ready to bid battell, but could not overtake their main army in any even ground meet to pitch a field in. Howbeit he foraged and waited the Country all about, so as he left no corner clear that felt not his fingers, and returned with purchase of many rich prizes of all sorts.

Likewise among the Volscians they sped well and had lucky hand by the good demeanour both of captain and souldier. First they joyed battell upon a plain, and fought with very great slaughter, and exceeding much bloudshed on both sides. And the Romans (who for their small number were more apt to feel the loss) had lost ground and diminished, if that the Consul by making a lie for a vantage, and crying that the enemies fled from the other wing, had not encouraged and renewed the battell afresh. And so by giving a new charge, whies they thought they had the better, they got the better in very deed. The Consul fearing again, by pressing too hard upon the Army, to enforce them to turn and make head, founded the retreat. Few daies passed between between, wherein they retired quiet, as though there had been a secret truce agreed between them. In which mean space, a great sort of people from all parts of the Volscians and Equians repaired to the Camp, thinking verily, that if the Romans were aware of them, they would depart in the night season. Whereupon, at the third watch they came to make an assault upon their Camp. Quintus after he had quieted the tumult, which upon this sudden alarm arose, and given commandment that the soldiers should keep themselves within their pavilions, brought forth a company of Heriicks to guard the gates, and caused certain cornetiers and trumpeters on horseback to wind and sound before the trench and countercarpe, and so to hold the enemy in suspense and expectation untill day-light. The rest of the night all was quiet within the Camp, that the Romans had time enough and good opportunity to take their repose and sleep. I shew of footmen in their harness, whom the Volscians imagined to be more than they were, and all Romans: the neighing besides, and noise that the horses made by reason of their strange riders that they were not used unto, and the sound also of their trumpets and horns that made them to set up their ears, and to stamp and fume outrageously, amused the enemies waiting ever when they would charge upon them. When it was day, the Romans being in heart and fresh, as having slept their fill, came forth and embattelled themselves, and at the first shock discomfited the Volscians, wearied with long standing and overwatched withal. And yet the enemies rather gave ground and retired themselves, than seemed to be driven from their standings, because they had at their backs certain hills, whereunto they might retire behind the Principia, and not break their ranks, and to save themselves. The Consul seeing he was come to a place of disadvantage, K made a stand. The footmen hardly would beaied, calling and crying to the Consul to follow upon them seeing they were discomfited. The horsemen were more eager, riding all about the Consul and with open mouth cried out, that they would advance before the enigma. Whiles the Consul held off, in aammering what to do, for as he was assured of the valour of his soldiers, so he little trusted the ground: to day all at once let it be a show, that they would set forward, come what would: and as they cried, did they in good earnest. And pitching their javelins in the ground, that they might more nimbly get up the steep place, they took their full career, and ran up the hill. The Volscians having in their first brunt spent all their darts, and other shot which they had let lie, and made no spare, took up stones that lay under their feet, let drive at the Romans as they climbed up, and so thick and threefold they bestowed them that they annoyed them L fore, and beat them down the hill. Thus the left wing of the Romans was well-near over-charged, had not the Consul at the point, when as they were ready to retreat, blamed them first for their rashness, and then for their cowardice, and made them for very shame to shake off all fear. First they stood to it stoutly, and kept their ground, and after, as their strength served them, considering the vantage of the place which the enemies had gotten, they adventured to set foot forward, and won ground with a fresh front and outcry. And taking their career again the second time, they strain all they can, and at length overcame the disadvantage of the place. Now when they were almost at the point to win the very pitch and ridge of the hill, the enemies turned back. Whiles they ran on heaps in disorder, both they that fled, and they that followed, hapned both at once in one company into the enemies Camp, which in that fright was won. The Volscians, as M many of them as could escape, ran as fast as their legs would carry them to Antium. And to Antium likewise was the Roman army conducted: and after a few daies siege, was furnished upon no fresh and new force of assault, but for that presently upon their unfortunate conflict and loss of the Camp their heart were done, and utterly failed.

The Third Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the third Book.

Seditions about the Law Agraria. The Capitol taken and held by banished persons and slaves. They were slain, and it recovered. A survey and Censment was taken twice. In the former there were found of Roman Citizens 134214, besides orphan children, and such as had no children at all, as well then as women. In the other following there were 134319. Upon a great overthrow received in the war against the Equians, L. Quintus Cincinnatus was made Dictator: and being in the country at his farme busied about his husbandry, was sent for to the conduct of that war. He vanquished and subdued the enemies. The number of the Tribunes of the Commons, arose to ten, thirty six years after their first institution. The Laws of Athens were let from thence by Embassadors, sent for that purpose: to the establishing and publishing whereof, there were ten personages elected in the room of Consul: which were called Decemvirs, without any other Magistrates: and thus hapned in the three hundred and second year

A year after the foundation of Rome. And as the Government of the state was transferred from Kings to Consuls: so was it now from the Consuls to the Decemvirs. They having propounded tables of laws, and born themselves modestly in that high dignity, were therefore by the consent of the people, permitted to remain still in office the second year. But after they had committed many insolent parts, they would not give over their room of Magistracy, but held it still the third year: until such time as their obstinate and intolerable rule came to an end, occasioned by the filthy lust of Appius Claudius: who being inamour upon a Virgin, suborned one to make claim unto her as his bondslave, whereupon her father Virginius was driven of necessity to catch up a knife from a butcher's stall next by, and to kill his daughter: as having no other means to save her from the hands of him that purposed to abuse her body unlawfully. The Commons upon this foul example of filthy lechery, made an insurrection, and took the mount Aventine for their hold, and compelled the Decemvirs to leave their place, and give over their government. Of whom, Appius and one of his Collegues (which two had principally deserved punishment) were committed to prison, and there kept, the rest were driven into banishment. This book containeth besides the victorious wars against the Sabines, Volscians, and Equians. And the unbest arbitrement or award of the people of Rome, who being chosen Arbitrators between the Atracians and the Aricins, awarded to themselves the Land whereabout the strife and controversy was.

The third Book of T. Livius.

C After the winning of Antium, T. Emilius and Q. Fabius were created Consuls. This was that Fabius that only remained alive of all the name that perished at Crimera. Now had Emilius in his former Consulship perswaded to distribute certain Lands among the Commons. And therefore in this year likewise, both the favorers of the law Agria were in good hope of the foresaid law: and also the Tribuns supposing verily that now by the help of a Consul, that might be brought about and obtained, which oftentimes had been enterprised against the pleasure of the Consuls: took the matter in hand and gave the attempt: and withal, the Consul still continued in the same mind. But the great landed men and many of the Nobles, finding themselves grieved and complaining that the chief and head Magistrat of the City busied himself with the Tribuns suits, and was by large giving away of their men's possessions, become popular and gracious with the people, turned the whole burthen and odious heavy load of this action, from the Tribuns upon the Consul his head. And a cruel broil was toward, had not Fabius, by a device and policy to neither party offensive, made an end of the matter with expedition. For whereas there were certain Lands gotten by conquest from the Volscians the year afore under the conduct of T. Quintus: "There might (said he) a colony be brought to Antium, a City near adjoyning, very commodious, and feared by the Sea side: so should the Commons without any grudging, or complaints of the possessors of Land-lords, be seized of Land, and the City left in quiet and Unity. This opinion of his was accepted of all hands. And they created three especial officers or Triumvirs for the division of the said lands, to wit, T. Quintus, Ant. Virginius, and E. P. Furius. Then proclamation was made, That whosoever would hold any of the Land, should give up their names in writing. But plenty, as the manner is, soon caused lothing: for there were so few that presented themselves, that to make up the full number of the inhabitants, they were faine to adjoyne unto them certain Volscians. The rest of the multitude had rather (as it seemed) to keep a calling for Land at Rome, than be possessed of Land elsewhere. The Equians charged peace of Q. Fabius, who was come against them with an army: and they themselves by making a souldan inroad into the territories of Latium, cancelled the fame and made it void. But the year next following, Q. Servilius (for he was Consul with Sp. Posthumius) being sent against the Equians, kept a standing camp in the Country about Latium. But by the reason of a contagious disease or a plague, that raigned in his army, they were of necessity forced to keep quiet within their tents. So their war was deferred unto the third year, when as Q. Fabius and T. Quintus were Consuls. And forasmuch as Q. Fabius, had upon his victory before granted peace to the Equians, he had an extraordinary commission directed unto him for the rule of that Province. Who being thither gone with full assured hope, that the very fame of him, and noise of his army would quiet the Equians, sent Embassadors to the Council of that Nation, with this message: "Q. Fabius the Consul saith, that as he carried before peace from the Equians unto Rome, so he bringeth now war to the Equians from Rome: having now his sword in the very fame hand, which he gave unto them before in friendly manner unarmed. Whole treachery it is and perjury, that is the cause of this, the Gods can witness now, and in some measure will revenge hereafter. Nevertheless, he for his part, however the case standeth, desireth that the Equians would yet bethink themselves of their own accord and repent, rather than stand to the extremity and abide those calamities and miseries that follow war. If they would come in therefore and be fery for that they have done, their submission should be received, and they taken into the safe protection of his clemency, whereof already they had experience. But in case they persist still in their disloyalty, and take pleasure in being forsaken: be they well assured, that they should have the ire and wrath of the Gods more, than their enemies to fight against them. These words so little or nothing at all moved any man there, that the very Embassadors had like to have been very hardly used and evil entreated, yea and an army withal was sent forth as far as Algidum against the Romans. When these tidings were brought to Rome, the indignity of the thing and the shameful manner thereof, rather than any fearful peril otherwise, raised the other Consul out of the City. So two Consular or royal armies approached the enemy in order of battail, ready to try it out presently by the dint of sword. But the day being (as it fell out) wellnigh spent, there cried one aloud from out of the place where the enemy kept ward: "This is to make a shew of war only (ye Romans) and not to war indeed. "ye set your battalions in array against night, forsooth, that now draweth hard on: we had need of more daylight I wis, for the business in hand, and to try this quarrel. To morrow therefore at Sun rising, see on come again into the field, ye shall have fighting fear not, your hands full. The soldiers retired and galled at these words, retired back into the camp until the next day, I thinking the night was long, that kept them from battail and so for that time they refreshed their bodies with food and sleep. On the morrow to soon as it was day, the Roman host being stirring somewhat more early stood ready arranged in array: and at length the Æquians likewise shewed themselves in field. A sharp fight there was on both sides, by reason that both the Roman soldiers fought in anger and deadly hatred; and also the Æquians upon prick of conscience, that bare them witness how they embarked themselves into this danger, and were out of all hope ever to be trusted again, were forced to hazard all upon a cast, and venture the utmost. Yet were not the Æquians able to endure long, the violent fight of the Romans, but were discomfited and put to flight. And being returned within their own Frontiers, the unruly multitude for all this, were never the more inclined to peace, but reproved and blamed their Captains, that they put the trial of the issue to a let field, in which kind of fight the Romans had singular skill, and surpassed them. As for the Æquians, they were better at robbing, spoiling, and foraging, in making incursions and inroads: and a better and safer kind of service it was, here and there in sundry places, to skirmish with forces divided, than reduce all into one gross army, and to pitch a field. Leaving therefore a guard to defend the camp, they went forth, and with such a tumult invaded the confines of Rome, that the very terror thereof reached unto the City. This first, especially coming to suddenly and unlooked for, made the Romans fear the more. For who would ever have doubted and suspected, that their enemies so lately vanquished, and in manner besieged within their own camp, could possibly think upon entering into the lands of others, and to drive booties. Besides the ruttish peasants came in at the gates, crying, and saying, that they were not petty companies, and small handfuls of thieves and robbers; but (such was their foolish fear, augmenting and making every thing greater) whole armies & legions of enemies were at hand, and marched apace with banners displayed full against the City. From their mouths, they that were next made report unto others & as they heard news from they knew not whom, so they let them abroad they cared not how, but even in the carriage they added somewhat of their own and coyned lies good store. Here was running, there was crying alarm & generally such a confusion every where as if the City had been quite lost. By good hap Quintus the Consul was returned from Algidum to Rome, that remedy cured all, andayed the fear. When the tumult was appeased, he rebuked the people for fearing those enemies whom heretofore they had vanquished, and placed good guards over the gates. Then he assembled the Senate, and by the authority and assent of the Nobles, proclaimed Infinitum, or a general cessation or vacation in all courts of law: and went himself forth in person with a power, to defend the marches, leaving Quintus Servilius Pro-consul of the City; but the enemy he found not in the territory all about. The other Consul performed his affairs passing well; who having certain intelligence, which way the enemies would come, set upon them laden with prey, and (by that means marching more heavily in disorder) made it a dear booty unto them even at much as their lives were worth. For few of them escaped the Ambush, and all the pillage was recovered. So the return of Quintus into the City, made an end of the publick Lawless or above-said vacation which lasted over four dayes. Then was a Cense or Assesment list of mens goods and a muster or view taken of the number of Citizens, together with a solemn purging of the people, called Lustrum, celebrate by Quintus. And there were numbered of Citizens 124214, polles, over and above men and women that lived single, or had no children and al orphans besides. And among the Æquians afterward nothing was done worth remembrance: for they betook them to their strong Towns, suffering their territory and villages to be consumed with fire, and spoiled. Thus the Consul, after he had divers times overrun the Country of his enemies, with a cruel army wasting and spoiling as he went, returned home to Rome with great honor and a huge booty. Then were Coss. Asius Posthumus Albus, and Sp. Furius. Some have written them Fisii, who indeed are rightly named Furii. Which I note, lest any man should think they were sundry men, whereas the variety is only in the name. No doubt there was, but that one of the Coss. would war with the Æquians: and therefore the Æquians fought for aide of the Ecetrane Volcians. Which being gladly granted and sent with speed, (such a perpetual hatred bare these Cities always against the Romans) there was great preparation for war in most forcible manner. The Hernicks having an inkling and knowledge thereof, certified the Romans afore-hand, that the Ecetrans were revolted and banded with the Æquians. The Colony Antium likewise was had in jealousy, for that when the Town was lost, many people fled from thence to the Æquians, who all the time of the Æquian war, served in the field, and proved the most hardy soldiers and fiercest of all others. And now when the Æquians were driven into their Towns, a

A multitude being slipped away and retired to Antium, withdrew from the Romans the allegiance of the Colonies and inhabitants there, who were already of their own inclination unbound and not to be traited. But before the matter was come to ripeness, and they entered into any action, the Senate upon intelligence given that they intended only, and were upon the point to revolt, gave the Coss. in charge to send for the chieftemen and head persons of that colony to Rome, and to enquire and learn of them in what terms Antium stood: who being come willingly enough, without any great treaty, and convened by the Consuls before the Senate, made answer to their interrogatories in such manner, that they were sent away more instructed, than at their first coming: whereupon they resolved fully of war. Spurius Furius one of the Coss. to whom that province by lot fell, having taken his voyage against the Æquians, found the enemy (spoiling and waiting in the territory of the Hernicks: and being ignorant what number they were (for that in no one place they were all discovered together) he rashly joined battell, and hazarded his power, being in number and force inferior to the other. And at the first encounter he was driven back, and retired into the camp: and yet was he not pail all danger and insecurity there: for both the night following, and the next day after, the camp was so licitly beset, and so hotly assailed, that he could not dispatch so much as a messenger from thence to Rome. The Hernicks sent word both of the unfortunate fight, and also how the Consul and his army were besieged. With which news they so terrified the Coss. of the Council, that they granted Posthumus the other Consul the solemn commission, I sece to the State, that it sustained no danger and damage. The form of which order and decree, hath been always accounted to signify some great extremity of the Common-wealth. And thought best it was, that the Consul himself in proper person, should abide at home to enrol in the muster book, all those that were able to bear arms: that T. Quintus should beient as Pro-consul or Vice-consul, with a power of condecate Allies to raise the siege and relieve the camp: and for the furnishing of this army, the Latines, the Hernicks, and Colony Antium, were commanded to send unto Quintus, Subitary soldiers (for so they termed at that time, the aids and supplies taken up in haste and on a sudden.) Many attempts were made, much skirmishing, and sundry assaults for certain dayes on each side were enterprised. For the enemies being more in number, assayed in divers places and sundry ways to cut off and diminish the power of the Romans, as not sufficient and able to make head at all turns. For at one time they both made an assault upon the camp, and withal sent out certain of their forces to wait the territory of Rome, yea, and to give the venture upon the very City, if they could eke any good opportunity to offer it self. L. Valerius was left behind to defend the City, and Posthumus the Consul was sent out to refrain and withstand the wailing of the marches. No point of care or travail on any hand was slaked, watch and ward both night and day was let in the City, a good Corps de guard appointed above the Gates, and soldiers bestowed upon the Walls: and (that which was needful in so great an hurlyburly) for certain dayes it was no Term, or interdiction of Law was observed. In this mean while, Furius the Coss. who at the first had quietly endured the siege and made no resistance, suddenly and at unawares sallied out at the broad gate called Decumana, upon the enemies: and whereas he might have chafed them, he made some stay of that, for fear lest on some other side, they would have given assault upon the camp. But Furius the Lieutenant (who also was the Consul his Brother) engaged himself too far, and upon a hot desire of pursuit and following the chafe, neither saw he his fellows as they retired, ne yet the enemies as they came to charge him on the back. Thus being shut out from all the relieves, after many essays made (but all in vain) to make way through unto the camp, manfully fighting he was slain. The Consul likewise hearing that his Brother was environed all about with enemies, returned again to fight: but as he ran more rashly than warily into the midst of the skirmish, he was fore wounded, and being hardly and with much ado saved by those that were about him, he both disfigured and daunted the hearts of his own men, and made his enemies more fierce, lusty, and courageous. Who were so animated and set on fire, both with the hurt of the Consul, and also with the death of his Lieutenant, that nothing afterwards could stand in their way: no force was able to stay them, but that they beat the Romans again into their camp: where they were besieged afresh being now both in hope, and also for strength worse than they were before. So that their main State thus lying a bleeding, had utterly perished, but that T. Quintus with a supply of strangers; namely, a power of Latines and Hernicks, came to the rescue in time: who charging the Æquians behind, whilst they were wholly busied in assailing the camp, shewing them within the Lieutenants head in a great bravery and pride, at the same instant caused a fall out of the camp, by a signal that he gave them a far off, and so inclosed round about a great number of the enemies. Small was the slaughter, but great was the flight and scattering of the Æquians in the territory of Rome: upon whom (stragling here and there and driving their booties aloft) Posthumus, who in divers convenient places had bestowed certain companies and bands of soldiers, ran violently. And as they fled every way in disaray, they lighted upon Quintus as he with the hurt Consul returned with Victory. Then the Consul himself bravely did their endeavour, and had a goodly day of them: and was revenged both for their Consuls wound, and also for the death of the Lieutenant and the Squadrons with him. Many losses and overthrowes were given and taken on each side for certain dayes. But in so ancient a matter as this was, hard it is for a man upon his credit, to set down precisely the certain number either how many fought, or how many were slain. Howbeit Valerius Antias boldly reckoneth the exact numbers, namely, that there died of the Romans in the Hernicks Country 5300, and of the Aequian robbers, who went up and down spoiling and pilling in the territory of Rome, were killed by A. Posthumus the Col. 2400. The rest of the multitude, which laden with spoil fell into the hands of Quintius, were not to quit, nor escaped with the loss of so few men lives: for of them the sword devoured 4000, and to account the number exactly, 200 (quoth he) and 30 just. Then returned they on all hands to Rome, and the forlaid vacation or law-free ended. The skie was seen much on a light fire, and other strange wonders either appeared indeed, or presented to the fearful people vain apparitions, and fantastical illusions. However it was, for to avert the dangers by these prodigious and terrible tokens prefiged, there were proclaimed festival holy days for three days together. During which time all the Churches were replenished with men and women, making supplications and prayers for the favor and mercy of the Gods. The bands and squadrons of the Latins and Hernicks, after great thanks given them by the Senate for their good service in this war, were discharged and sent home. But the Antiate souldiers, 1000 in number, who after the battell was fought came tardy, and too late for to succour, were dismissed in manner with ignominy and shame.

* The first day of August

Then was the great Lect or assembly held, for the Election of Magistrates: wherein L. Eburus and P. Servilius were created Consuls: and on the * Calends of Sexilis (for on that day) began the year then, they entered their Consulship. A grievous and heavy time it was and as it fortuneth, a year of plague and great mortality, both in the City and Country, as well among brute beasts as men. And the reviving of the Country peasants with their cattle into the City, for fear of robbing and spoiling, encreased the contagiousness of the sickness so much the more. For, that confused medley of all sorts of beasts, both annoyed and empoisoned the citizens with the uncouth and ununsual stink, and also filled with sultry heat and overmuch watching the rusticall people, lying pershed together, and thrust up into close rooms and straight lodgings. The mutual recourse one to help and Minister unto another, and the very catching of the disease, let it all abroad. Thus whiles they had much ado to endure these present calamities, behold, to mend the matter, all of a sudden, the Hernick Embassadors bring word, that the Aequians and Volcians having levied a power jointly together, were encamped within their limits: and from thence with a mighty army wasted and destroyed their territory. Now, besides that the small assembly in the Senate-house, was to these their allies an evident token that the City was fore visited with the pestilence; they received also an heavy answer from them, namely: That the Hernicks themselves together with the help of the Latins, should defend their own: as for the City of Rome, it was with the heavy hand and visitation of the Gods, dispeopled by the plague: but in case the sickness decreased in some measure and took up in any time, they would willingly aid their confederates, as they did the year before, and as they had done at all times besides. Thus departed these allies, and for their ill news they brought thither, they carried with them home again a worse answer and message, to wit, That they should by themselves sustain that war alone which hardly they were able to support: if they had the power of the Romans to assist them. Long stayed not the enemy in the Hernicks country, but went forward from thence into the territory of Rome, desolate already (God wot) without the injury of war, and little need there was of calamity that wayes: where meeting with no man at all, no not so much as any one unarmed, and passing over all the Country, disurnished not only of Garrisons to resist, but also of people for husbandry and tillage, at length they came to the third stone, i. within three miles of Rome, to the broad port high way, called Gabina, leading to Gaber. The Roman Col. Eburus, was now departed thither, and his brother Col. Servilius, lay lingering on at the point of death, in small hope of recovery. Most of the peers and principal ancients were infected, and sick in bed, so was the greater part of the Nobles, and weener all the serviceable men of war: so as they were not able to set forth an expedition or voyage abroad, as meet was in so great a tumult, nor so scarce to keep any ordinary fer guard at home for the defence of the City. The Senators, such as age and sickness would permit, took the charge in proper persons of watch and ward. The Adiles of the Commons went the round, and had the charge to see all well & in good order: so that upon them now rested the government of the state, & the Majesty of the Consuls Regiment. Thus when all was forlorn no head to direct, no strength of man to execute; the Tutelar Gods, Protectors of the City, and the good fortune alone that ever waited upon her, preserved the main chance. This madeth the Volcians and Aequians to carry with them a mind and intent, rather to deal by way of robbings and spoilings, than in any hostile manner like professed warriors: for so small hope had they, or none at all, of winning the City: so little heart, so much as to approach the walls, that even the very roofs of houses, which they desired a far off, and the sight of the tombs and graves so neer at hand, turned their minds clean, and daunted their courages. So as over all the camp they began to mutter with themselves, What they meant to spend time idly and sit still without preading a waite and desart Country: within the mortality and purified air and corruption, both of people and cattle, when as they might as well invade those parts that stood clear and found, and namely the rich, plentiful, and fat fields of * Tusculum: and therewith suddenly at once they plucked up their ensigns, and by croos wayes passed through the * Lavican countries, even to the mountains of Tusculum: and thither turned they

A they the whole force and tempest of the war. In the mean season the Hernicks and Latins moved not with pity and compassion only, but also for a very reason, in case they had neither withstood their common enemies, marching to Rome with a cruel army, nor received their benighted friends: joyned their powers together, and let forward to Rome: where not finding the enemies, and following the bruit that went of them, and tracing their treck tracks and footings, they encountered them as they came down from the high Country of Asylum to the vale of Alia: Where they made no living bargain of it, but fought to their lets, so as their deity unto their allies, had but bad success for that present. And in Rome there was no less mortality of citizens by the sickness, than there were Multitudes abroad of their allies by the edge of the sword. For the other Consul, who alone survived hitherto, now died. There sent this line also, other noble personages, M. Cicerius, Titus Virginius, Angurs, and Ser. Sulpicius the Curio Aemilius. But among the base and common sort, the violence of the disease raged and spread, I know not how far. The Senate now destitute of all help and comfort of man, moved the people to devotion, to their beads, and prayers unto the Gods. And commandments were given to all men with their wives and children, to go in procession, to pour out their supplications, and crave mercy at Gods hands. Thus being by publick authority called forth to perform that which every man was forced unto by his own proper calamities, they filed all the Temples and Chapells. The Dames and ancient Matrons, lying groveling and weeping the Church floors and pavement with their hair and tresses, hanging loose down, humbly besought pardon of the Gods: and an end on the pestilence. Whereupon, were it that they had obtained the mercy of God, or that the more dangerous and outrageous season of the year, was now well overpast: their bodies by little and little, having escaped the danger of disease, began to recover and was more healthy.

Then let they their minds about the care of the Common-weal, and after certain ten-reigns determined or ended, P. Valerius Postumus, the third day of his Interregnum or Regency for the time, created Consuls L. Lucetius Tricipitinus, and P. Valerius Geminus or Vesulus, whether ye will: who three days before the Ides of Sexilis began their Consulship. By which time the City was grown so strong again, that it was able not only to maintain a defensive war, but also to enter the field and assail others. When the Hernicks therefore gave them advertisements that the enemies were passed over into their borders: they made no delay but readily and willingly promised their aid and levied two Consul armies. Valerius was sent against the Volcians to begin with them and to war within their own Country. Tricipitinus was opposed in the Frontiers of their confederates, to keep them from in- and out, and went no further forward than to the Hernicks. Valerius at his first encounter and confronting of his enemies, discomited and put them to flight. But Tricipitinus whiles he lay still encamped in the marches of Prenefte, missed of the army of the Robbers: which was conducted over the Mountains of Prenefte and Gaber: and from thence they fetched a compass about unto the Mountains of Tusculum. The City of Rome likewise was put in great fear, rather upon the sodain occurrence of this alarm, than for any want of power to resist their violence. Quintus Fabius at that time was Provost or President of the City, who put the youth in armor, disposed guards in places convenient, and made all safe and in good security. The enemies therefore who had raised a booty out of the parts adjoining, durst approach no nearer, but cast about with their army and retired: and the further they went from their enemies City, so much the more careless they were, until they light upon the Col. Lucetius, who by his epicals and flours, was aloft that time acquainted what wayes they would take, and was ready also to try battail. So with resolute and prepared hearts, they set upon them, that with the sodain fear were amazed. And albeit they were in number fewer, yet they discomited and put to flight a mighty multitude of them, and drove them within the hollow valleys, where because they had no ready way to get out, they kept them in locked on every side in such sort, that the whole name and nation weener of the Volcians, there utterly perished. In some Chronicles I find that there were 13470 slain in the fight and chase, and 1250 taken Prisoners alive, and 27 ensigns or banners brought away. It may well be that the number perhaps doth somewhat exceed the truth, yet a great slaughter certainly there was. The Consul having achieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same finding having achieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same finding having achieved this victory, and gotten a mighty great prey, returned into the same finding

 “and the rigor of all punishment, against the Commons. But lest this their licentiousness should “continue for ever, he was minded to prefer and publish a Law, by virtue whereof there should “be five men created, who should set down certain conditions, to limit and gage the authority “of the Consuls: and look what authority and commission the people granted over them, the “same should the Consuls exercise, and no more, and not rule of themselves, and use their own “will and licentious lust in stead of Law. This act being once published, and the Nobles fearing, “left whilst the Consuls were away, they should be taken down and yoked. Quin Fabius Presi“dent of the City, assembled the Senate, who lo bitterly and sharply inveighed against the Law and “the Law-giver himself, that it both the Consuls themselves had stood about the Tribuns of purpose “to contradict and cross his proceedings, there had been no threats nor terrible menaces let for “them, to have thundred out. For he laid fore unto his charge, that he had lye in wait, and now “having ipied the time to fit his purpose, had given the venture to assail the C.W. and the State.
 “And in case the Gods in their wrathful displeasure had sent among them such a Tribuns as he “year before, together with war and pestilence, there had been no remedy then, but he must have “had his way, and then they had been all undone. For when the Consuls both were dead, and “the City lay bed-ridden as it were, in a miserable confusion of all things, he would have made laws “then indeed, to the utter abolishing of the Consuls authority out of the Common-wealth, and “been a ring-leader to Volscians and Aequians both, for to have assaulted the City. For what “might not he have lawfully done by virtue of his place? If the Consuls had either proudly or “cruelly proceeded against any Citizen, he might have entered an Action against them, and “convened them to trial before those very Judges, of whom peradventure some one had been “by them hardly dealt withal. This would have been the course and end of it. And he that thus “did, should not cause the Consuls authority and rule, but the Tribuns power to become odious “and intolerable: which having been of late well quieted and reconciled unto the Nobles, began “now afresh to come unto the old place, and to be troublesome again. Neither intreated he him “not to go on still as he had begun. But ye my Masters (quoth Fabius) that are the rest of the “Tribuns, we would request you to consider well this one point especially: That this power you “have, was brought in for the succour and relief of every particular person, and not to the general “prejudice and undoing of all. Again, that ye are created Tribuns of the Commons, not enemies “of the Nobles. A heavy and lamentable case it is to you, odious and hateful unto you, and will “breed you much ill will and displeasure, in case the C.W. now forlorn, should thus be invaded “and assailed. Ye shall lose nothing of your own right, I assure you, nay, you shall avoid much “mislike and hatred of men, in case ye be in hand and deal with your brother Tribuns, to put off “this matter and defer it wholly unto the Consuls coming. Why, the very Aequians and Volsci“themselves the last year, when both our Consuls were dead of the plague, pressed not hardly up“on us, to prosecute any proud and cruel war against us. So the Tribuns communed and perswa-“ded with Terevillus: and this his commenced suit or action being adjourned in outward show, “but in very truth let fall quite and dismantled, the Consuls forthwith were sent for home. Lucer-tius returned enriched with a right great booty, but with far greater honor and renown. Who at “his very first coming won him more glory, by laying abroad in Mars field all the prizes, that “every man for three dayes space might know his own and have it away. All the rest, that had no “owners to come forth and make claim, was sold in port-sale. By all means content, the Consul “was thought worthy of triumph: howbeit that matter was put off by reason that the Tribuns had “not yet done with his law: which was the thing that the Consul thought meet should be first re“garded. The matter was debated and treated for certain dayes, both in the Senate and also before “the people. At last the Tribuns yielded to the Majesty of the Consul, and gave it over. Then was “due honor rendered both to the General and also to the army accordingly. He triumphed over the “Volscians and Aequians: and in his triumph his own legions followed after him. To the other “Consul granted it was that he should in a kind of triumph called Ovatio, ride into the City, but N “without his soldiers. The year next ensuing, the Law Terevillus was by the whole College or “fellowship of the Tribuns revived and propounded again: which put the new Consuls P. Volu-mianus and Ser. Sulpicius to some trouble. And in the same year the skies seemed to be on a light fire, “and there was an exceeding earthquake. And that which the year afore was no credit given unto, “was now for truth believed, to wit, That a Cow did speak. Among other strange wonders it “raised first: during which shew, a huge number of fowls flew among, and were reported to “have snatched it and carried it away as it was in falling. But that which fell down and escaped their “talons, lay scattered here and there for certain dayes in such sort, as the sent changed not at all, “nor the flesh: one rotten and corrupted. Then the books (of Sibylla) were perused by the Du-“mivirs deputed over matters of Religion: who fore told of some dangers to ensue by a Company “of strangers, and gave warning to look lest haply some assault should be made upon the highest “places of the City, and thereof a slaughter and massacre ensue. Amongst the rest, warning was given “to abstain from civil discord and mutinies: which the Tribuns found fault with, as a devised “matter to hinder the law. Whereupon great debate and contention was like presently to grow.
 “But behold, (that the revolution and course of troubles might turn about every year to the same “point,) The Herniks bring news that the Volscians had Aequians for all their wings were well clipped,

A ped, and their forces greatly decayed, began together and levy new armies: Items, That in Anti-um lay the whole weight and importance of the affairs, and all depended upon it: That the Anti-“atians held their counsels and had their meetings in open show, at Ectra, but Antium “was the principal seat of the war, and from thence came all preparations and forces whatsoever.
 “As soon as the news were reported in the Senate, order was given to muster soldiers: and that “the Consuls should part between them the administration and managing of his war, so as the one “should have the charge against the Volscians, and the other against the Aequians. But the Trib-“uns rung it out openly in the common Hall before the people, “That this was but a made mat“ter of the Volscian war, and a tale devised by the Herniks, who were suborned and framed to “B “play their parts in the Pageant, and to serve the turn of the Nobles. And that now verily the “freedom of the people of Rome was not oppressed or endangered by plain prowess & virtue, “but finely thrust off and dallied cunningly withal by lye and crafty inventions. And for as much “as now it was an unlikely thing and incredible, that the Volscians and Aequians after so great “slaughter committed upon them, whereby they were all in a manner killed up, should be able of “themselves to wage war, there were, forsooth new enemies fought out: A faithful Colony near “adjoining, was now slandered and defamed: war was pretended for a shew against the guiltless “and innocent Antiats, but in truth, intended with the very Commons of Rome, whom they “meant to drive out of the City in all haste headlong, furnished with heavy armor, and to (by “turning out their poor fellow citizens into banishment, and sending them away, God knows “C “whither) to be avenged at length of the Tribuns. And thus the Law (lay the Tribuns, for they “must think their drift is to this end and to none other) should be trodden under foot, unless “whiles all is entire and whole, and nothing done, whilst they remain at home in their houses, “whiles they be in their gowns, they take heed and look well about them, that they be not dis“possessed of the City, and take the yoke of servitude upon their necks: assuring them that if “their hearts only served, they should want for no help: and that all the Tribuns agreed and were “of one mind, that there was no cause of fear abroad, no forrain war to trouble them: last of “all, that the very providence of the Gods the year before assured them, that their liberty might with “safety be defended. These and such like Remonstrances gave the Tribuns out. On the other “part, the Consuls causing their chairs of estate to be set, even in their light and preference, began to “D “muster. Thither ran the Tribuns down in all haste, and drew the whole assembly of people with “them. And, to make as it were a proof and trial, some few by name were called, and straight-“ways began a stir. For whomsoever the Sergeant by the Consul his commandment arrested, the “Tribuns charged again that he should be let go. And neither side contained within the limits and “compass of their commission and rightful authority: but presumed of their might and strong “hand, to attain unto their desired purpose. For even as the Tribuns had demeaned themselves “in forbidding the muster, solemly the Senators blisfirmed themselves to stop the law for going for“ward: which was propounded every Court day, and when the people might assemble. And ever“more the brawl began, when the Tribuns commanded the people to avoid the Hall, for that the “Patritii would not endure thus to be let out and excluded. Few or none of the ancients would “E be present at these troublesome stirrs, being such as were not to be managed and ordered by sage “Council, but wholly left to the rashness and boldness of young and green heads. The Consuls also “were much abject, and forbore to be in place, for fear lest in such a confused hubbub their Ma“jesty and dignity, might have been subjected to some shameful contumely and disgrace. But there “was among them one Cajus Quintus, a lusty young Gentleman and a stout, in regard both of his “noble parentage, as also of the goodly tall personage and strength of his body. Besides these good “parts that God had bestowed upon him, he had won himself many ornaments by sundry exploits “achieved in wars: He had withal an eloquent speech and a good grace at the bar, so as, in one “word, throughout the whole City, there was not one thought to be more ready in tongue, or “taller of his hands. This Cajus standing in the midst of the Nobles, higher to be seen above all the “F rest, as one that in his speech and strength, carried aloft him the countenance and authority of all “Dictators and Consuls, was the only man that bare off the brunts of Tribuns, and forms of the “common people. Many a time were the Tribuns driven out of common Hall, the Community “dejected and put to flight by the conduct of this Captain. Whosoever came within his reach, “was sure to go away thoroughly beaten, and clean stripped. So as it evidently appeared, if this “course might have been allowed, the law had loon been checked and overthrowen. Now when all “the other Tribuns besides were herewith dismayed and welnearthed, Antius Viginus alone, “being one of their fellowship, was so bold, as to enter an action against Cajus: of a capital crime.
 “By which deed of his, he rather fired, than feared his hot and furious nature. For so much the “more eagerly withstood he the Law, courtied and troubled the Commons, and persecuted the Tri-“G buns as it were with open war. The plaintiff in the mean time, suffered the defendant to run on “still, and with many outrages to kindle more coils of ill will, and hatred upon his own head, and “to minister further matter of crime to be charged with. And all the while he cared not to prefer “the Law afore said, nor so much of any hope to bring it to pass, as to provoke and set on work the “giddy head and humorous vein of Cajus. Whereby it came to pass, that many follies oftentimes “were committed both in word and deed, by the younger sort: and evermore the blame light upon “poor Cajus: he alone was always charged, because he had been once suspected. But nevertheless “he hee gainfayed and crofled the Law. And Autus Virginius ever and anon would entertain the Commons with thefe and fuch like fpeeches. "See ye not already (quoth he) O Quintus, that ye may "not now have Cæſo your Citizen, and the law which ye deſire both together. But what mean "I to ſpeak of your Law? It is your liberty that he infringeth and ſeteth himſelf againſt, and in "pride and arrogancy he excedeth all the Tarquinians that ever were. But wait, ye were beſt-until "he be made Conſul or Dictator, whom ye fee already, being but a private perſon to bear him- "ſelf ſo greatly of his ſtrength and boldneſs, as to Lord it over you, and rule as a King. Many ſoot- "then the Tribune and ſaid thelike, adding moreover, how they had been well knocked and beaten "at his hands: and were forward enough of themſelves to ſet the Tribune on, to proceed in his commenced action againſt him.

Cæſo recom-

Nobility.

Now was the law day of judicial trial come: and it ſeemed abroad, that all men verily thought that the very foundation of their liberty conſiſted in the condemnation of Cæſo. In conclusion, driven he was with much indignity and ſhame, to creep and crouch unto every man, ſubmiſſively craving their favour one after another. There ſeconded him his kinſfolk and neereſt friends the beſt men of the City, Titus Quintus Capitolinus, who had been thrice Conſul, ſpoke in his behalf: and after he had reckoned up many honors and dignities, both of his own, and a ſo of his family, affirmed, that neither in the houſe and race of Quintus, nor yet throughout the City of Rome, was ever ſeen ſo great towardsneſs, no ſuch ſhew and likelihood of ripe and perfect virtue and prowess as in Cæſo: ſaying, that he had been firſt his ſouldier, and ſerved under him, and that with his own eyes he had ſeen him oftentimes fight valiantly hand to hand with his enemies in the field. Again Sp. Fufius made this good report of him. That upon a time, when himſelf was in great dittails and extremity, Cæſo was ſent unto him from Quintus Capitolinus, to help at a pinch: and that there was no one man, by whole good ſervice, as he thought, the Weal-publick at that time was more relieved and reſtored, then by his, L. Lucretius the Conſul laſt year before glittering in his bright glory to ſeeh and news, joined with the reſt, avowing Cæſo partaker with him in his praiſe-worthy act: he recounted his brave combats, rehearſed his noble exploits, both in his rides and voices, and alſo in the pight field: adding & counſelling them that in any hand they would retain him ſtil for to be a Citizen of their own City, rather then of any other, this excellent young gentleman, furniſhed with all good gifts of nature and fortune, like to prove a ſingular ſtay of the public affairs, into what City and State forever he ſhould come. As for that heat and haſtineſs (quoth he) which was in him miſliked and offensive, age and time would dayly diminiſh, and bereave him of it: grave and ſage counſel, which now was wanting, would come on apace every day more then other. Seeing therefore his faults waxed old and faded, his virtues now were in their growth, flouriſhed, and grew ripe unto perfection: they ſhould permit to brave, to rare a perſon, to live ſtil among them, and be a good old man in this their City. His father among the reſt, L. Quintus, furnamed Cincinnatus, went another way to work: who not by iterating ſtil his praiſes, for fear of heaping more matter of envy and repine, but craving pardon for his wildneſs and youthful demeanor: beſought them for his ſake at leaſt wiſe, to give the ſon as a preſent to his father, who neither in word nor deed had ever offended any perſon. Some took no heed and gave a deaf ear to his prayers, either for modeſty and reverence, or for fear. Others complaining how they and theirs had been beaten and hardly uſed at his hands, bewaried and ſhewed plainly by their ſtiff and churliſh answers what their judgment was. Beſides, the common millike and malice conceived againſt the deſcendant, there was one perilous matter and crime above all, that touched him very neer. And that was this: M. Volſcius Tullor, who certain years before had been Tribune of the Commons, came in againſt him as a witneſs, and depoleſed, how that net long after the plague was in the City, he hapned upon a company of youths as they made a riot and robbery in the Subura: where there aroſe a brawl and fray, in which his elder brother, a man well in years, and not thoroughly recovered of his ſickenſs, was with a buffet with Cæſo his ſil fell to the ground, and lay there for dead: ſo as he was fain to be had home between mens arms: and as he deemed, of that blow he died: yet might not he as hainous as the fact was, bring his action and proſecute the law, for fear of the Conſuls of theſe laſt years. As Volſcius thus informed, the whole court was moved therewith, in ſo much that Cæſo eſcaped hardly, from being murdered, in that rage and fury of the people. Then Virginius commanded to lay hold on the man, and to have him away to priſon. The Parent again by force reſiſted force. T. Quintus cried out. That he who was under arreſt for to make his appearance, and answer at a day for his life, and who flootily ſhould come to hiſtorial and be judged, ought not before ſentence of condemnation, and before he had pleaded for himſelf, thus violently be miſuſed. The Tribune replied again, That his meaning was not to puniſh him before he were condemned: howbeit, by his leave he would be ſo bold as keep him ſtil in priſon, to be forth-coming at the law day: that he who had killed a man might ſuffer thereupon, according as the people of Rome ſhould award. Then were the Tribunes called unto for their help, who by the means of an indifferent decree then made, ſhewed their lawfull favours with ſpeed. By virtue whereof they forbade expreſly, that he ſhould not be imprifoned, but pronounced that it was their wil and pleaſure, that the defendant ſhould perſonally appear, and a piece of money be promiſed unto the people, in caſe that he made default and failed of his appearance. Much queſtion there was what ſum of money ſhould be thought reaſonable to be promiſed. And the matter was put over to the Senate to be decided: and whiſt the Senators ſate there-

A thereupon the defendant was kept ſtil in ward within the common Hall. At length they thought good and ſet it down that he ſhould put in ſureties. And they bound eaſily in 1000 * Alies, But how many of theſe ſhould put in band, was left to the wil and diſcretion of the Tribunes, who alſigned and determined ten and no more. With ſo many ſureties the plaintiff bound the defendant perſonally and peremptorily to appear at his day. This man was the firſt Roman that went under ſpecial bail, and put in good pledges to make his publick answer, Thus being enlarged out of the common Hall and dimiſſed, the next night following, unawares to the Conſul, he departed for his exile, that he was out of the town, and gone into baniſhment: yet nevertheleſs Virginius aſſembled the people about this matter: but his fellow Tribunes being called unto for their help, dimiſſed the Court and licenſed every man to depart. But the forſaid money was cruelly exacted at his fathers hands, ſo that he was driven to ſell up all that ever he had, and for a long time to live apart as a perſon confined, on the other ſide of Tyber, in a poor bld and cottage out of the way. This proceſs of judgement, and the preſenting of the law aboveſaid together, buſied the City and kept it occupied. Quiet they were for any wars abroad. At what time the Tribunes like Conquerors, ſeeing the Nobles appalled at the baniſhment of Cæſo, ſuppoſed now their law was in manner fully eſtabliſhed and enacted. And for as much as the more ancient Senators had diſpoſſeſſed themſelves, as it were, of the Common-weal, and medled not for their own parts with the State: the younger ſort, and ſuch eſpecially as were of Cæſo his true and acquaintance, were kindled the more againſt the Commons, and abated not their courage: mirrily, this good thereby was done upon them, that in ſome meaſure they tempered and ruled their furious affections and violent outrage. The firſt time after the exile of Cæſo, that the law began again to be propoſed, they being well appointed and banded together, backed alſo with a mighty company of their friends and favorites, ſet upon the Tribunes: taking the occaſion when they charged them to depart out of the hall in ſuch manner, that no one of them above his fellows was ſingular, or carried home with him any ſpecial praife or blame more then another: but the Commons complained that for one Cæſo, there were now ſtart up a thouſand. All the days between, wherein the Tribunes medled not with their law, none more quiet, none more peaceable then they themſelves. Courteouſly they would ſalute and ſpeak unto the Commons, at all other times they would invite them home to their houſes and make them good cheer, aſſiſt them and be preſent with them in the common Hall, ſuffer the Tribunes themſelves without any interruption or impeachment to keep their courts and hold their aſſemblies whatſoever: ſhewing themſelves at no time to any of them either publicly or privately fierce and cruel, but only when they went in hand with the law, for otherwiſe the young Gentlemen were popular enough. And not only in other caſes: made the Tribunes good diſpatch, and went quietly through all their buſineſſes: but alſo the ſame men were choſen again for the next year following without any ſoul and croſs word: ſo far were they from being offered any forcible violence: and thus by ſoft handling and gentle dealing, they had now by little and little won the Commons, and made them as it were cometo hand. And ſo by theſe fine fetches and devices, for one whole year the law was ſhifted off, and E peremptory avoided. The City being now in more quiet ſtate, C. Claudius the ſon of Appius and P. Valerius Poplicola, came to be Conſuls. And no news this new year: for the ſame ear ſtil, either about preterring or admitting the law, held the City occupied. As much as the puny Nobles inſinuated themſelves more into the favour and familiarity of the Commons: ſo much more eagerly again on the other ſide, did the Tribunes labour and endeavor with complaints and ſlanders, to bring them into ſuſpition and jealousie with the Commons: ſaying, that there was a conspiracy intended and contrived: that Cæſo was in Rome: that there were plots laid to murder the Tribunes, and to ſmaltire the Commons: that they were ſet on work by ſome great ones, even the Ancients of the Nobles, utterly to aboliſh the Tribunes authority out of the C. W. and to bring and reduce the City to the ſame pals again, as it had been before the taking and keeping hold in the F Mount Sacer. Beſides all this, war was feared from the Volſcians and Aerutians (to ordinary it was, and ſo duly once every year it came about) yea and with all, another miſchief newly ſprung, and unlooked for.

A rabble of baniſhed perſons, Outlaws and Bondſlaves, to the number of 4500 having to their Captain one Ap. Herdonius a Sabin, ſurprized in the night the Capitol and Cattle, and were makers thereof, who immediately killed in the caſtles many as would not be of their conſpiracie & take arms with them. The reit, amid this hubbubly ran headlong down into the Market place for fear. The army was gotten on all hands: and no cry heard but Arme, Arme, the enemies are in town. The Conſuls were afraid to put the Commons in arms, and they doubted alſo to let them be unarmed, not knowing what ſudden occurrent this ſhould be, that thus had entered and poſſeſſed the city: whether it were forraign or domeſtical, ariſing from the malice and hatred of the people, or from the treachery and falſhood of their ſervants: Yet they deviced to appeaſe the uproar: and as they were buſied to reſt it, the more other-while they ſtirred up new: for the frightened and amazed multitude, could not be ordered by any commandment. Howbeit at length they reſolved to ſuffer them to take arms, and not all in general, but only (for that they knew not what their enemies were) to have a ſufficient and truſty guard about them, ready at all allyes and dangers whatſoever. In this careful ſuſpence and doubt, who were their enemies, and what their their number was, they passed the rest of the night, disposing strong watch and ward in all meet and convenient places of the City. But the day light disclosed the war and the Captain thereof, Appian Herdonius from out of the Capitol proclaimed freedom to all bondmen that would come and follow him: taking upon him himself to defend the cause of most miserable captives:

namely, to restore home again unto their native country all such exiled persons, as had been wrongfully expelled, and also to take away the heavy yoke of slavery and bondage. Which thing he could with it might be effected and brought about with the good will and helping hand of the people of Rome. But in case there were no hope & comfort there, then he would allay the Volscians and Æquians; yea, and procure what means he could, by all hard courses and extremities whatsoever. Now the Nobles and Consul, began to see more into the matter: and beheld those dangers that were in view, and presently threatened, they feared some practice from the Veientians or the Sabines: and left, there being already so many enemies in the City, the legi- ons and Tuicani should combine together, and come upon them. Over and besides, left their old enemies and perpetual, the Volscians and Æquians should now at once, not, as aforesaid, invade their borders and drive booties, but give an attempt upon the very City, which was already in their borders and possessed by enemies. Many and sundry were their fears. But of all other the dread and jealousy of their own bondslaves presented unto them most imminent and present danger: for fear, lest every man harboured his enemy at home in his own house, whom neither he could trust securely, nor yet mistrust without some jeopardy: fearing lest being once disredited, he might prove the more malicious and bent to do a mischief. And to such thoughts they were driven, that with all their concord and agreement, they hardly were able to remedy the matter, and to stop the extremity. So greatly the future troubles like to ensue, exceeded those that presently appeared and were in sight, that no man feared either Tribunes and Commons.
That mild and gentle kind of malady, in comparison of others, and rising always by occasion of rest from all other. Seemed then by reason of a foretelling terror, filled clean and brought asleep.
And yet see, that was the only thing in a manner that lay hardest upon them, ready to bear down to the ground their state, which now began already to shrink and reel. For so furiously and madly were the Tribunes bent, that they thirstily would stand to it, and bear men in hand. That it was no war, but a vain illusion and colour of war, and no other, that had seized on the Capitol: for nothing else but to withdraw the minds of the Commons from intending and following their Law: and that a sort of clients, followers, and favorites of the Nobility and Gentry were gathered together, who if they might once perceive that the Law were passed, and that all the virties had made, took no effect, would slip away soon and be gone, in remorseless I wis, than they himself came. Whereupon they called the people away from their armor and weapons, and summoned them to an assembly, to go through with their Law and Enact it now or never. In the mean time the Consul, held a Council fearing a greater mischief like to ensue from the Tribunes than the enemies had wrought in the night season. And when word was brought that arms were laid away, and that the people had abandoned their quarters whereto they were set in guard, then P. Val- erius, his colleague to keep the Senat together, departed hastily out of the Court & went straight into the Temple to the Tribunes. "What work is here my Masters (quoth he) you that are Tribunes: M "Are ye about to overthrow the State indeed under the conduct of Ap. Herdonius and who was "notable to follow it and do any thing with your bondslaves and servants, was his hap so good as to "corrupt and inveigle your selves: is this your pleasure and to your good liking, whilst the enemy "is over our heads, to have our armor laid aside, and laws preferred? Then turning his speech to "the whole multitude: I ye take no regard nor are (O Quirites) of the City if ye pais not for your "selves yet have some reverence, and stand in fear of the Gods of your native country, which by

"munes. And had it not been more meet and decent that both Nobility and Commonalty, Con"suls and Tribunes, God and Man, all armed together, should set to their helping hand, should to the people.

A or whereforever he were, in Capitol, in market place, all as one, take him for an enemy, and deal accordingly. Let the Tribunes (forasmuch as they forbade to take arms against Ap. Herdonius) command hardly, and spare not, to arm against P. Valerius the Consul: It should be well seen that he would dare and do that by the Tribunes, which the first of his house and name sometime had done by the KK. A great broil was toward, and no other like, but that they would have gone together by the ears, and that the mutiny of the Romans, would have been a goodly spectacle to the enemies for to behold. But all this while, neither could the law be preferred, nor the Consul go up into the Capitol. The night at length stayed these brails begun, and hushed all. The Tribunes fearing the armed forces of the Consuls, yielded to the darkness of the night, and gave over. Now B when the principal Authors of the discord were once gone out of the way, The Nobles went about to the Commons, intruding themselves into their companies as they were met in knots together: where they would enter into talk and discourse with them, according to the present occasions and the time, admonishing them to take heed unto what danger they brought the State.
"Forasmuch as now (quoth they) it is not a matter of debate between the Senators and Commons: but both Senators and Commons, the Capitol and Strongeti hold on the City, the Temples of the Gods: their houses both publick and private, were ready to be yielded unto the enemies. Whilst these things were a practising in the common place, for to appease the contention the Consuls for fear, left the Sabines or the Veientians, enemies both, should stir and rise, were gone to the gates and about the walls. The same night came tidings also to Tuiculus of the C taking of the Capitol, the surprising of the Capitol, and likewise of the trouble some State wher-in the City stood. At that time was L. Mamilius, Dictator of Tuiculus: he forthwith called assenate together, brought in the Messengers of the foretold news, and thought it very expedient and needful not to wait until there came Embassadors from Rome to crave their aid: for that the present peril it self alone, the urgent necessity, their social Gods, and the faithful bond of league, required no less at their hands, than to lend succour: adding moreover, that the Gods would never give them the like occasion and opportunity again, to gratify the Romans: to bind and oblige unto them by a bound benefit and pleasure done, to mighty a City, and to meet a neighbour. Whereupon it was decreed, to relieve them with all speed. The able men of service were taken up and enrolled, munition and armor given them in their hands: who advancing toward D Rome by break of day, seemed a far off to be enemies, and were taken for the Æquians or Volscians.
But afterwards, when this foolish fear was overblown, they were received into the City:
and marched down in order of battell to the market place. Where, at the very time came Pub-
l. Valerius having left his fellow Consul to guard and fortify the gates, was letting his men in array.
The authority of the man had prevailed with the people, for he promised and assured them, that if the Capitol were once recovered, and the City set in quiet, if they would suffer him to be informed what fraud and secret mischief was underhand practised by the Tribunes under colour of this Law, he would in remembrance of his ancestors, and of his surname (which in regard of the affectionate love unto the people, by a special care, as it were by inheritance from his forefathers, was recommended unto him) not hinder and trouble the meetings and assemblies of E the Commons, nor cross and thwart their proceedings. They followed him therefore as their Captain, gain by the Tribunes what they could (for all would not serve) advanced forward, and marched up against the rising of the Capitol Hill. The Tuiculan Legion stuck close unto them, and followed after. Citizens and Associates both did their best, and strove who should regain the Capitol first, and have the honor of that day. Each Captain exhorted and encouraged his men.
Then began the enemies to fear, and wist not well what to trust unto, but on the situation of the place. The Romans and their allies seeing their fear, came forward and advanced their Standards against them. Now by this time were they broken into the porch of the Temple. Where F P. Valerius fighting manfully among the foremost in the vanguard, was slain. P. Valerius the Consular man, saw him when he fell: who gave his men in charge to cover his body, and keep himself into the Consuls room, and fought in his stead. The soldiers for heat and eagerness of fight, took no regard, and came to no knowledge of this great mischief, but got the victory, ere they knew that they fought without their Captain. Many of the outlaws were there slain, and polluted the Temple with their blood: Many taken alive Prisoners, and Herdonius himself was slain outright. So the Capitol was again recovered. The captives, as they were either bond or free, were executed every one according to their condition and place. The Tuiculans had thanks given them. The Capitol was cleaned, purged, and hallowed anew. The Commons, as it is reported, call "Quadrantes or mites into the Consul his house, that he might with greater pomp of G funerals be brought to the ground.

When all was appeased and in quiet, the Tribunes were earnest with the Nobles to perform the promise of P. Valerius: they were instant also with Claudius, to assist the soul, and keep from blame of his fellow Consul late deceased: and to permit the law to be set on foot and forward. The Consul gladly denied to suffer them to meddle with the law, before he had constituted a fellow in his place. And these contentions held unto the time of the grand Election for the substituting of a new Consul. And in the month December, after much suit, and labouring of the Nobles, was L. Quinctius Cincinnatus, the father of Cicero, created Consul, and presently to enter into his office. The Commons herewith were much troubled and stricken dead, now that they were to have an angry Consul, and mighty withal: considering the favour of the Nobles wherein he stood and his own virtue & prowess besides; by reason also of his three sons, of whom there was not one that for haughtiness of mind came behind Cæso, and for wisdom, discretion, and moderation (when time and occasion served) went far beyond him. Who being once entrined into his office in all his publick speeches and orations, continually ceased not to well to bridle, restrain and keep in the Commonalty, as also to chastise sharply the Senate; through the remembrance of which degree & want of courage, it was come to pass, that the Tribunes became now to continue still in office, and not as in the Common-wealth of the people of Rome, but as in some unruly and disordered house with their lavish tongue raigned as it were, and ruled the rest: saying, "That together with his son Cæso all virtue and constancy, all commendable qualities that graced young Gentlemen both in war and peace, were chased and utterly banished out of the City of Rome. In lieu whereof, babblers, mutinous persons, and lovers of sedition and dissention, are become Tribunes the second year, and the third time; who by indirect courtesies & lewd practices have loofely in the City like Princes and Kings. That same Asius Virginianus, (quoth he) hath he deserved less punishment than Ap. Herdonius, because he was not in the Capitol with the rabble of other Rebels? Nay, much more a good deed, if a man will weigh the matter aright and truly. Herdonius, (if there were nothing else) yet by professing himself to be an enemy, advertised you, and gave you warning in a manner to arm your selves. But he, by bearing you down so confidently, that there was no war, what did he else but disarm you, and as it were, take your weapons from you, and offer you naked to the devotion and mercy of your bondmen and outlaws? And have ye (under correction he it spoken, and saving the reverence and honor of C. Claudius here, and P. Valerius that dead is) advanced your enigns up the Capitol Hill, before you had rid the market place and common Hall of these enemies? It is a shame (before God and man I speak it) when our enemies were in the Castle and Capitol, when the Captain and Ringleader of outlaws and slaves, abode and lodged within the Chapels and Sanctuaries of Sup. Op. Max. to the profanation and polluting of all that they at Tusculum should take them to their weapons before us of Rome, and that it should be doubted, whether L. Manilius the Tusculan General, or P. Valerius and C. Claudius the Roman Consuls, should have the Fortresses of Rome: and that we, who would not suffer the Latines in their own defence, when they had their enemies in their borders, so much as once to take weapon in hand, should now our selves have been surprised and destroyed had not they, the very same Latins of their own accord, put themselves into armor for our sakes. Is this your succouring and helping the Commons, (O ye Tribunes) to expose and cast them unarmed before the enemy, to have their throats cut? I was, if the meanest or basest person of your commonalty, which you have dismembered from the whole body of the people besides and made it, as it were the native country of your own, and a Common-wealth peculiar only to your selves: If any one of them I say, should bring you word, that his house were beset round about, with a company of servants and slaves in armor, you would think it meet that he were aided and succoured: And when Sup. Op. Max. was besieged with a power of armed outlaws and bondslaves, was he not worthy of mans help? And yet these men would be counsellors and held for Sacrosanctis, i. Sacred and inviolably, with whom the very Gods themselves are not feared and inviolate. And notwithstanding, that ye are thus overcharged and stayed with sins both against God and Man, ye go up and down, and say, That this year you will get your law to pass, and make it sure. In truth, if ye prefer it again, then I must needs lay the Common-wealth ill betted and had a shrewd run that day whereon I was created Consul, yea, and worse a good deal than at what time P. Valerius the Consul was slain. But now first and foremost (quoth he) O Quirites, my colleague and I both, are minded to lead forth our legions immediately against the Volscians and the Æquians; how the Divine Providence of God hath appointed it, I know not, but surely we find the Gods more gracious and favorable unto us in our wars ordinarily, than in time of peace. And in what danger we had stood of those nations, in case they had known that the Capitol was in the hands and possession of outlaws, better it is to guess by that which is past than to try indeed by present experience. The Consul his Oration moved, and galled the Commons, The Nobles took heart, and were in a good belief, that the world was well mended, and the state better reformed. The other Coe, more hearty to follow than to lead, and who was well content that his fellow had broken the ice before, and taken in hand to deal first in to weighty a matter, willingly challenged unto himself the charge to perform the part and office of a Consul. In the execution and accomplishment of those designments. But then the Tribunes made a game therat, and letting light at the Consul his words, inferred again and demanded, how the Consuls would lead out an army, and no man suffer them to muster souldiers. Marry (quoth Quintus) we need no mustering at all, for at what time as P. Valerius armed the Commons to recover again the Capitol, they were all sworn unto him and took their oath in this form. To assemble together as the Consul his commandments, and not depart from their colours without his leave and licence. We will and charge you all therefore, that have taken this oath to prevent your selves to-morrow with your armour at the lake of Regillus without fail. Then the Tribunes began to cavil and wrangle and would needs have the people discharged in their conscience of that oath: alleging how when they took that military Sacrament, Quintus was but a privat person. There was not as yet that neglect & contempt of the Gods entred into the world, which now reigneth every where and is so ripe: neither did men interpret their oaths, and construe laws, to serve their own purpose,

A purpose, but rather attempted and flamed their lives and demeanour thereunto. The Tribunes therefore, seeing no hope to hinder the thing, began themselves to treat about setting forth the army: and the rather, because there ran a rumour abroad, that the Augurs were commanded to attend at the lake Regillus: and that by them a place should be hallowed and consecrate there, wherein the Consuls might duly commune and confer with the people, concerning all matters, according to the flight of birds: to the end that whatsoever at Rome had passed under a law, extorted by the violent force of the Tribunes; the same might there in a lawful assembly and general Session, be abrogated & made void by the suffrages of the souldiers, who without doubt would accord to that, which should stand with the Consuls pleasure. For by reason that there was no B appeal in force without the city, above one mile, the Tribunes themselves also, if they came thither, should be subject as well as the multitude besides of the people, to the commandment of the Consuls. These matters feared them indeed and put them in a bodily fear, but the greatest thing above all the rest that disquieted their hearts was this, that Quintus oftentimes had given out and said, that he would not call an assembly of the people for the election of Consul, for that the city was grown so far out of frame and temper, that it might not be reformed and cured with ordinary and usual remedies: but that the Common-wealth had more need of a Dictator, that whatsoever went about to trouble the state of the city, might well know that there was an absolute Dictatorship, that checked all appeals. The Senat was assembled at that time in the Capitoll, thither came the Tribunes with their Commons greatly disquieted and troubled. The multitude cried out and brought one while the Consuls of their favour, another while the LL. of the Senat of their protection; but could not once remove the Consul from his opinion (such a pitch had he taken) before the Tribunes gave their word and faithful promise, that they would be wholly ruled and ordered by the Senators. Then the Consul propounded the demands and petitions of the Tribunes and Commons, and the Senat enacted these orders and decrees. First, that neither the Tribunes should that year prefer their law: nor the Consuls lead out of the city any army. Item, from thence forth, the Senat deemed it not to stand with the weal publicly, that Magistrates should continue still in place from year to year, and that the same persons should be more then once chosen Tribunes. The Consuls for their part, were overruled and ordered by the Senators. But, say and gain say what the Consuls would, the same Tribunes were chosen anew: and the Nobles also because they would not be one ace behind hand with the Commons, would needs choose L. Quintus likewise for their Consul again. But all the year through was not the Consul more earnest and vehement in any action and speech whatsoever then in this. Should I marvel my Lords of the Council (quoth he) that you bear no stroke with the Commonalty, and your authority is so little worth among? Why, you, even your own selves let light thereby: seeing, forsooth, the Commons brake the ordinance of the Senat, touching the continuities of Magistrates yea also, because ye would not seem to yield one inch in rashness and folly to the multitude, are as ready and willing to infringe the same; as who would say, this were to have more rule and authority in a city, namely, to out more levities, inconstancies, and licentiousness. For it is a point of much more lightness and vanity, I assure you, for men to disdain the acts and decrees of their own making, then of others. Ye that be Senators and Fathers of the C.W. imitate, and spare not, the ignorant, lewd and inconsiderate multitude: ye that should give good examples to others, flye hardly your selves, and do misis by the precedent of others: neither then let others by your example do well: so long as I, for my part, take not after the Tribunes, nor suffer my self to be declared Co. against an express act of the Senat. As to you, O Claudius, I would exhort you, that both your self would restrain the people of Rome of this their licentiousness, that thus they have not their desire, and also that you would persuade your self thus much of me, that so far off will I be from thinking my honour by you in paired, that rather I will take my glory to be increased by the desisting and refusing of a dignity, and the ill will and envy abated and diminished, that might grow upon the continuation thereof. Whereupon both the Consuls jointly together made an edict and proclamation, that no man should by his voice nominate Quintus, Consul: and if any man did, they would not allow of his election. So there were created Consuls, Q. Fabius Pibulanus the third time, and L. Cornelius Mancinus.

In this year was held assembling and numbering of the citizens, but touching the Lustrum, there was some temple of conscience, because the Capitol had been taken, and the Consul slain. When Q. Fabius and Lucius Cornelius were thus Consuls, suddenly in the very beginning of their year began great troubles: for the Tribunes on the one side, as their guile was, let the Commons work: the Latines and Hernicks on the other side, sent word of great wars from the Volscians & Æquians: that the Volscian legions were already at Arminum, and the Colonie it self greatly suspected to rebel. Yet hardly could the Tribunes be brought to agree, that preparation should be made aforehand to prevent this war. But upon these news, the Consuls parted between themselves the charge of all affairs. Fabius was appointed to lead forth an army to Arminum; and Cornelius to abide at Rome for the defence of the city, for fear lest some part of their enemies, as the Æquians manner was, should in running camp make roads and forge the territories about. The Hernicks and Latines, were by vertue of the league, charged with the finding of certaine souldiers, so as the whole army should consist of j. parts of confederates and one third of citizens. When, at the day appointed the Allies were come, the Consul pitched down his tents without the gate Capena: from whence when he had taken a generall muster and purged his armie, he marched towards Arminum and and encamped himself not far, either from the town, or the standing camp of his enemies: where the Volcians seeing no forces yet come unto them from the Æquians, had no heart to fight, but made preparation how they might keep themselves quiet and safe, within their mure and rampire. The morrow after, Fabius made not one entire battell of Allies and citizens mingled together, but three battalions severally by themselves, of three sundry nations, & ranged them along all about the countercarpe and trench of his enemies. Himself was in the midst with the Roman legions, and gave commandment to observe heedfully and mark the signal: that the Allies also should both begin battell and also retire, when he founded the retreat. In like sort he placed the horsemen behind the Principia at the back of each battell. Thus in three sundry parts he assailed the camp, and invironed it round about, and charging lustily hard upon them on every side, he beat the Volcians down from their rampier, for they were not able to endure his violence. And having gotten over all their trenches and fortifications, he drove the fearful multitude clean out of their hold, that now were forced to a hide and corner of the camp. The horsemen might not easily get over the trench, and stood still of purpose to behold the fight, and to mark them when they should flee: but having once gotten them in the open fields, they chased them as they ran away on heaps: and by killing them in their fearful flight, deferred their part in that victory. Great was the execution both within the camp, and also without the rampires, as they fled; but greater was the pillage, for that the enemies had much ado to carry their armour away with them, and but that they throwed themselves as they fled in the woods, they had perished every man. During these exploits about Antium, the Æquians having sent before them the tallest and lustiest young men they had, surprised the cattle of Tufulcum, upon a sudden and at unawares in the night season: and with the rest of their power they were encamped not far from the walls of Tufulcum, intending to intercept and slay the army of their enemies. Tidings hereof came in post to Rome, and from Rome to the camp before Antium: which troubled the Romans as much as if news had been brought, that the Capitol was taken. So fresh in remembrance was the late desert of the Tufulcians: and the like jeopardy seeming to challenge and redemand semblable aid and succour. Fabius setting all other things aside, caused the booty in all halt to be conveyed out of the camp to Antium: where having left an indifferent guard, he hasteneth space in order of battell to Tufulcum: by reason whereof, the soldiers could take nothing with them, but their armour, and such tacked or boyled meats as were at hand ready. The Consul (Cornelius) sent a convey of victuals unto them from Rome. Thus for certain months continued the war at Tufulcum. The Consul (Fabius) with one part of his host assailed the camp of the Æquians: for the other part he had let the Tufulcians have, to win again their fortress. Against all force it was impregnable, but in the end famine constrained the enemies to abandon it. To which extremity being at length driven, they were by the Tufulcians disarmed and compelled to pass naked under the yoke. Who as they fled homeward with shame enough, were overtaken of the Roman Consul in Algidum, and put to the sword every one. After this victory, he encamped with the rest of his army at Columen, for to the place is named. The other Consul likewise, seeing that there was no danger threatening the walls of Rome, now that the enemy was discomfited & repulsed, departed himself from the citie. So the Consuls entering two waies the borders of their enemies, made sharp war and spoiled the Volcians of the one side, and the Æquians on the other. I find in most writers that the Antians in this year rebelled: and that L. Cornelius the Consul managed that war and won the town. But for as much as there is no mention made of that matter in any ancient writers, I dare not avouch it for a certain truth.

This war was no sooner brought to an end, but the domestical Tribunes war at home put the Nobles in fear: for the Tribunes cried out that this was cautelous and fraudulent dealing, thus to keep the armies abroad, for nothing els but to disappoint them for publishing the law. Yet nevertheless, since they had begun it, they would not give over, but go through with it and see an end. Howbeit P. Lucretius, president of the city for the time, prevailed thus much with them, that all Tribunitian actions should hang & be deferred unto the coming of the Consuls. There was besides a new occasion arose of fresh trouble. A. Cornelius and Quintus Servilius * Quæstors, gave summons to M. Valerius to make his answer at a day, who laid to his charge that he without all doubt, had born false witness against Cæso. For by many presumptions and evidences it appeared, that neither Valerius his brother, from the first time that he fell sick and took his bed, was at any time seen openly in the streets, or so much as to have sit up, and mended any whit, but at that disease which held him many months, he languished and consumed away to death: not about that time, wherein the deponent supposed the deed was done, was Cæso once seen at Rome: it being plainly affirmed and proved by those who served together with him in the wars, that he was ordinarily all the time fighting under his colours as well as they, without any passport or licence to depart. And to make this good, many there were that of themselves privately challenged Valerius, and offered to travel the law and to be tried by any indifferent and competent judges. But when as he durst not abide the trial and to be judged, all these things put together and to companion one to the other: made men doubt no more of the condemnation of Valerius than of Cæso, which was grounded upon the bare testimony of Valerius. The Tribunes were only the stay; who said plainly they would not suffer the Quæstors to hold any sessions or judicial court, for the trial of the defendant, before they had a solemn assembly about their law. So were both these matters

A matters put off unto the Consuls coming. Who being entred with triumph into the city, with their victorious armie, & no words made of the law, many thought the Tribunes were elected and stricken dead. But they (for that the year now was at an end) aspiring to be Tribunes the fourth time, left all their hot contention for the law; and reserved themselves wholly to argue and reason at the assembly for the Election of new Magistrates. And albeit the Consuls had bent all their might and main against the continuity of the Tribuneship, as earnestly, as if a law had been propounded, tending to the impairing and abridging of their majesty, yet got the Tribunes the mastery, and had the hand of them in the end. In this year peace was granted upon request and petition, unto the Æquians. And the Selling, which the year before began, was now finished. B And this was counted the tenth general Survey and solemn purging of the citie from the foundation thereof. There were numbered in the Censile-book of citizens 132,419 polles. Aglorious and honourable year it was untill the Consuls, both at home and in war. For they not only procured peace abroad, but also the citie was, if not in perfect concord and unity, yet in less trouble than at other times. L. Minutius, and L. Nautilus, that there were created Consuls, entred upon the reliques of the two matters begun the former year. And much after one sort, as the Consuls crossed the going forward of the law, so the Tribunes hindered the judicial proceeding against Valerius. But the new Quæstors were men of more power and greater authority. For together with M. Valerius, the son of Valerius, and nephew of Valerius, was T. Quintus Capitolinus created Quæstor, a man that had been thrice Consul. Forasmuch therefore, as Cæso, the worthiest gentleman of all other, and the very ornament of the youth of Rome, could not be restored again, neither to the house of the Quintis, nor the commonweal, he pursued of more piete, with just & lawful war, and false witnesses, who would not suffer on anyhand the innocent person to have the liberty to plead in his own defence. And when Virginius, most of all the other Tribunes, was earnest to publish the law, the Consuls had two months respite given them to consider thereof, and look into it thoroughly: to the end, that when they had adverted the people what secret fraud and inconvenience was hidden and lurked therein, they might afterwards suffer them to proceed to a sentence, and gather voices accordingly. This space between granted, brought the citie into a good and quiet state.

But the Æquians would not abide, that long it should continue so: Who having broken the league, which the year before was made with the Romans, chose Gracchus Clutius for their governor and general, who was in those daies the greatest man among the Æquians. Under the conduct of this Gracchus, they enter first in warlike manner the country of Lavinium, and from thence into the territory of Tufulcum, spoiling and ransacking as they went: and being laden with preys and booties, they pitch their tents in Algidum. Thither repaired from Rome into their camp, Q. Fabius, P. Valerius, and L. Postumius as embassadors, to complain of wounds received, and to demand amends and satisfaction according to covenant. The General of the Æquians seemed to grant them audience, and willed them to declare what message and commission they had from the Senat of Rome, unto the oak; for that himself had some other matters to dispatch the while. Now there grew a mightie great oak hard by the General his pavilion, spreading his boughs even over it, and the shadow thereof served for a cold fitting place. Then one of the Embassadors, he went his way, "Let both the sacred Oak (quoth he) and what divine power forever is feared in this place, heare and know that by you first the league is broken, who now regard our present complaints, and shortly assay our valiant armies, when we shall prosecute "and revenge at once the dishonour breach, both of Gods laws and mans. So soon as the Embassadors were returned to Rome, the Senat gave direction, that one of the Consuls should lead forth an armie against Gracchus, into Algidum, and the other have in commission, to waite the borders of the Æquians. The Tribunes, as their manner was, hindered the matter, and peradventure had staid it altogether, but for a new fearful occurrence that suddenly came in the neck of the other. For a mightie power of Sabines were approached well nigh to the walls of the citie, robbing, spoiling and destroying all a fore them with sword and fire. The territory was pitifully roun about laid desolat, and the citie there with fore terrified. Then the Commons (floods came down, and gently they took weapons in hand: and (say what the Tribunes would against it) two great armies were enrolled. Nautilus had the leading of the one against the Sabines: and being encamped at Eretrum, with robes and incursions, and those for the most part by night, made such fool work and walk in The Sabines country, that in comparison thereof, the lands about Rome, seemed as if they had not been once touched. Minutius in his exploits, had neither like good success, nor yet equal courage and valour of heart. For having pitched his tents not far from the enemy, and received no great foile and loss at his hands to speak of, yet he kept himself for fear within the camp. Which when the enemies perceived, they grew more bold (as commonly the cowardice of one increaseth the courage of another) and assailed the camp in the night season: but seeing that plain force little prevailed, the morrow after they raised mounts, and cast trenches round about. But before they had with their countermures and rampires stopped up all passages, five horsemen being even amongst the guards of the enemies, brought news to Rome, that the Consul with his armie was besieged. Nothing could there have hapned so little thought of, and unlooked for: whereupon there was such fear, trembling, and quaking, as if the enemies had besieged not the camp, but the very citie. Nautilus the Consul they tend for, and because they thought him like to do but small good, they agreed therefore to create a Dictator, who might might restore again to the distressed state of the C. W. And L. Quintus, Quintus by consent of all men was nominated. Now a world and wonder it is to hear them speak, that in regard of riches despite all things else, and suppose there can be no great honour and virtue, but where wealth and riches do flow in excess. This L. Quintus, the only hope of the Romans, the man who was to set upright their Empire now distressed, occupied then a piece of ground, to the quantity of four acres, called at this day Quintus pratis, L. Quintus his meadows, on the other side of Tyber, over against that very place, where now the Ardenal and Shipdocks are, and there was he tilling digging a ditch, and bearing hard on his spade, or else a plowing the ground, I wot not whether, but busie and earnest about some rusticall work, no doubt he was: and after salutations passed on both sides, between him and the Embassadors that were sent, he was requested by them, that he would put on his belt gown, and (that which might turn to the good of himself and the commonwealth) hear a message from the Senat. First, he marvelled what the matter should be & very often asking of them if it were well, the will of his wife Racilia to bring him forth his Senators robe straightway, out of his torie cottages which he put on his back (but first he brushed off the dust, and wiped away his sweat, and made himself somewhat mannerly) and then came forth unto them, who in joyous manner, by way of congratulation filled him by the name of Dictator: calling hard upon him to repair unto the city, and declaring in how doubtful terms the armie stood. Then was thereARGE provided ready for Quintus, at the cities cost: and being ferried over the river, his three lions met him and received him first, then others of his kinsfolk and friends, and after the K Sergeants going before, was he brought to his house. Great concourse there was also of the Commons: but nothing so joyous were they, to see Quintus, supposing that government of his over great and absolute, and himself a man in time of his rule, too imperious. And for that night verily, nothing was done, but a good standing watch kept in the city. The morning after, the Dictator being come into the common place of assembly before day-light, appointed Generall of the hoste, L. Tullius, of Noble blood descended: a man who for more poverty had ever served on foot, but of all the flower of Rome was reputed and taken to be a brave levitour, and an excellent soldier. Then Quintus with the Generall of horsemen, mounteth into the pulpit aloft: proclaimeth a publicke vacation or Lawfeed: commandeth all shop windows through the city to be shut, and chargeth that no man should follow any privat businesse of his own. Then as many as were of age to fight, were willed to shew them selves in their armour, before the sun set in Marsfield, every one with viduals dressed for five daies, and with twelve folded flakes a peece for to pitch in the rampart. And that whoeever were above that age, and were unwieldy, and not meet for service should dress and provide viduals for the next soldier unto him, whilst he himself made ready his armour, and sought for flaxes aforesaid. Thus ran the young able men to and fro, to furnish themselves with flaxes, and took whatsoever they could find, and whatsoever was next hand: no man was forbidden, and so they were all ready with heart and good will, according to the Dictator his proclamation. Then went the Dictator forth with the legions of footmen, the Master of the hoste likewise with his men of arms, in such good order and array, as might not only serve for a speedy march to rid ground, but also for a set battell if occasion served. "In M both regiments they spured not to encourage and exhort their soldiers, according as the present time required: willing them to set foot forward, to mend their pace and make speed: that by night time they might reach to their enemies: & not (say they) before there was great need: for that the Roman Consul and army were benighted, and had now three daies already been pent up fast inclosed: and what might happen in one day or one night, no man knew: for oftentimes in the twinkling of an eye, and in the very turning of an hand, here fall out accidents of sight great moment and importance. On a fore space, Ensigne cried one: follow soldier faithfully another. Then went they also lustily forward, and all to pleasure and gratifie their captains. So that by midnight they were come into Algidum: and so soon as they perceive their enemies to be next at hand, they pitched down their ensignes. Then the Dictator rode about as far forth as he could see in the dark, and having viewed well the situation, costling and fashion of the camp, commanded the Marshalls and Colonels to give direction, That all the carriage and baggage, should be laid up together in one place, and that the soldiers with their armour and flaxes only, should come again into their ranks. What he commanded was soon done. Then in the same order that he marched, he drew out his host in length, and compasseth the camp of his enemies, and commandeth them all (upon a signall or watchword given) to set up a shout, and presently upon the shout to set trench, & every man stuck down his pale in the rampier. Having given this charge, straightway the signall followed. The soldiers do that which they were bidden: the shout was heard over all the camp of the enemies, yea, and into the Consul his camp: causing in the one great fear, in the other exceeding joy. The Romans rejoicing one with another to hear the shout of their fellow-citizens and countymen, with a conceit of their coming to rescue, began of themselves from their sentinels and Corps de guard, to threaten and terrifie their enemies. The Consul see them forward and said, there was now no playing for the matter, nor delays to be made: for that it appeared by that alarm, that not only their friends were come with succours, but also had begun to skirmish: and that it was all to nothing, that their enemies camp, was already on the outward side assaulted. Whereupon he commanded his soldiers to arm, and to follow hard after him. Thus in the night began the skirmish, and

A and the legions of a Dictator by their outcry and shouting made signification that the enemies on that side also were driven to their shifts and in great hazard. By this time the Aequians had addressed themselves to impede them in their trenching and making of their rampier, to the end that they might not be compassed about: but the alarm was given and the skirmish already begun by their enemies within: fearing therefore, lest they would break through the midst of their camp, they turned from the pioneers and workmen without, to them that fought within, and thereby gave the other leave to plie their work and labour all the night long at their pleasure: and so they maintained skirmish with the Col, untill day light. Now by the break of day they were entrenched on every side by the Dictator, and were scarce able to hold out battell with one of the armies. Then the host of Quintus, which presently upon the finishing of the trench returned to their weapons, entering of the inures and rampiers of the enemies. Here began a fresh conflict again, and yet the former nothing abated. The enemies then seeing themselves thus distressed and to hardly driven on every side, left fighting and fell to intreating: they besought the Col, on one side and the Dictator on the other, that they would not get the victorie by effusion of blood and cruel massacre, but would permit them to go their waies naked without their weapons. The Consul he posted them off to the Dictator: who being in great wrath and displeasure, would not be contented without their shame and ignomy besides. But commanded that Claudius their generall with other Colonels and Captains should be brought bound unto him. Item, he enjoined them to abandon & quit the town of Corbio: as for the Aequians blood, he fought not for it, he had no need thereof: they might depart with their lives. Howbeit, because he would have it now as length, manage their heads, confessed, that the nation was vanquished and subdued, this will and pleasure was, they should pass all under the yoke or gallows: the manner whereof is this. They took three spears or javelins, and set two of them pitched in the ground endlong, and their overthwart lashed unto the other. Under this kind of gallows the Dictator compelled the Aequians to go. Thus having gotten the tents of the enemies full of all kind of store (for naked he sent them under the yoke) the whole pillage he bestowed upon his own soldiers only: and rebuking sharply the Consuls army and the Col, himself, Ye shall quoth he soldiers go without your part of booty won of the enemy, whole booty ye had like your selves to have been. And as for thee, O L. Minutius, until thou begin to have the heart and courage befitting a Consul, thou shalt be a Lieutenant only over these legions. So Minutius being discharged of the Consulship, remained still as he was commanded, with the army. But so well were men content in those daies, willingly to yield obedience to them that better could command, that this army in remembrance hereof as of a favour received, rather then of a disgrace offered, both ordained for the Dictator a coronet of gold of one pound weight: and also when he went homeward, saluted him by the name of their Patron. At Rome the Senat being assembled together by Q. Fabius Provost of the citie, decreed that Quintus should enter the city in triumph with his army marching in battell array as he came. Before his chariot was led the commanders of his enemies: the ensignes are carried afore, then followed the army laden with spoil and pillage. Great cheer and banquets were set out, men lay upon tables at every mans dore. Thus making merry, they followed the chariot with songs of triumph, with sports and merry conceits, as they are wont to do at their great and solemn feasts. The same day L. Mamilius the Tusculan, with the approbation and good liking of all men, was enfranchised citizen of Rome. And forthwith would the Dictator, have signed up his office, but that the Court, held for the trial of M. Volscius, ended of bearing false witness, staid him: and in truth, the Tribunes would have hindered the judicial proceeding against him, if they had not stood in awe of the Dictator. But Volscius was convicted and had sentence, and departed to Lanuvium in exile. And Quintus having taken the Dictatorship for six months, gave over the fixteenth day after he entered into it. About the same time the Consul Nautilus fought valiantly with the Sabines at Eretum: who besides the wailing of the fields, had an overthrow in fight. Fabius was sent into Algidum, to succeed in the room of Minutius. In the end of the year, the Tribunes began to stir about their law: but because the two armies were absent, the Senator prevailed so much at that time, that no bills were propounded unto the people. The Commons likewise obtained, that they might create the self-same Tribunes, now the fifth time. The report goeth, that there were leen in the Capitol, wolves chased away by hounds: for which strange sight, the Capitol was purged. And these were the acts of that year. Then followed Consuls Q. Minutius & M. Horatius Pulvillius.

In the beginning of which year, whilst all was quiet abroad, the same Tribunes and the same law caused dissention and sedition at home: which would have grown to a farther mischief, if such heats men were, had not word been brought, as it were of set purpose, that the garison at Corbio was surprized in the night by the Aequians and put to the sword: whereupon the Consuls called the Senat together: and order was given, that they should lead a Subitary army and with a running camp invade Algidum. Then was the strife about the law laid aside clean, and a new contention arose about the nullters. But the Consuls with all their authority, were over-ruled of the Commons, by the help and assistance of the Tribunes. At what time a new trouble put them in fear, for intelligence came, that a power of Sabines were come down already into the territories of Rome for to fetch booties and make spoil: and from thence advanced against the city. Upon which fear, the Tribunes were content that soldiers should be prett, yet not without this covenant indented: That for as much as they had now themselves these five years been troubled off and deluded, & that this protectorship of theirs stood the Commons in little stead, in regard of their small number, therefore, should from thenceforth be ten created Tribunes of the Commonalty. The Nobles were to fear driven and to such frights, that will they, still they, yield they must thereto: with this proviso, that they should never after elect the same men Tribunes twice. And for fear that this act should after the war was once past, turn to nothing, like as others had done before, they went in hand immediately to call a court for the Election of the Tribunes. So in the 36. year from the first Tribunes of the Commons chosen, there were ten created: out of every Classis, two. And by an act it was provided, that in such sort they should be created ever after. The musters then being taken and soldiers enrolled, Mimius went with a power against the Sabines, but found not the enemy. And Horatius, because the Equians after they had put the garrison at Corbio to the sword, and won Horatius besides, fought with them in Algidum. Many a man there he slew, and drove his enemies not only out of Algidum, but also out of Corbio and Horatius. As for Corbio he utterly raised it, for betraying the garrison there. After this, were M. Valerius and Sp. Virginius made Consuls. At quiet they were both at home and abroad. But great scarcity there was of corn, by reason of the untemperat and unreasonable rain that fell. A bill there was preferred, that the mount Aventine should be turned to Commons. And the same Tribunes were made again: who, all the year following, when T. Romulus and C. Veturius were Consuls, in all their Halls and assemblies, still published the law: saying, it was a shame, that their number was thus increased to no purpose, in case their affairs should be dead in their two years, as they had done in the whole 5. years past. Whiles they were earnestly debating these things, fearful messengers came in all hail from Tusculum, with news, that the Equians were in the territory of Tusculum. The swift desert of that nation would not suffer the Romans for shame to defer their helping hand. Whereupon both Consuls were sent with an army, and met with the enemies in Algidum in their wonted haunt and accustomed place, where they encountered and struck a battell: in which were slain about 7000. enemies. The rest were put to flight. A huge booty there was gotten, which the Consuls sold out-right, by reason of the want of money in their common treasury. But this caused the soldiers to repine and grudge, and in the end ministered matter to the Tribunes, to accuse the Consuls unto the Commons. As soon therefore as they were out of their office, when Sp. Tarpeius and A. Eternus were Consuls: Romulus was arrested and put in suit by C. Claudius Cicerio, Tribune of the Commons. And Veturius was likewise troubled by L. Halerius an Edile or L. Warden of the Commons. Condemned they were both the one and the other, to the great indignation of the Nobles. Romulus was fined in 10000 Alfes. Veturius in 15000. But for all this hard law and calamity that befell to those former Consuls, the new were never a jot more remissive and cool in the quarrel: saying, Well may we also be calt and condemned, and both Commons and Tribunes never the nearer to compass and enact their law. Then the Tribunes giving over the law, which now by propounding only to sit, was waxen stale and old, began more gently to deal with the Senators, praying them to make an end once of all strife and contention. And in case that the laws of the Commons so disliked and displeased them, they requested them to suffer certain Law-makers to be created indifferently out of the Commonalty, as well as of the Nobility, who might devise such accommodations & profitable to both parts and or the equal liberty and freedom of all. As for the Nobility they had the making of those laws. Seeing then they agreed thus about the laws, & differed only and quired about the lawgiver, there were Embassadors sent to Athens, Sp. Posthumus Albus, A. Manlius, and P. Sulpicius Camerinus: who were commanded to exemplify and copy out the famous and worthy laws of Solon: to search out and learn the ordinances, customs, and rites of other cities in Greece. For any outward wars, this year was quiet, and the year following more quiet, when P. Crassius, and Sex. Quintilius were Consuls, by reason of the continual silence of the Tribunes: which as the expectation of the Embassadors that were gone to Athen, and of strange and foreign laws, first and principally procured: so, two mighty great calamities that rose both at once, to wit, famine and pestilence, noisome and loathsome both to man and beast, afterwards continued. By means whereof the fields lay waste and desolate, the city dispeopled with continual burials: many right worshipful and honourable houses thereby mourned. Sergius Cornelius, the Flamin of Quirinus died thereof. C. Horatius Pulvillus the Augur went off likewise: in whose room the Augurs (his Associates) chose C. Veturius: and thereafter, because he had been condemned by the people. Quintilius the Consul departed also this life, and four Tribunes of the Commons. So that this was a year, with manifold losses and calamities fully distressed. But for enemies all was quiet. After this were C. Menenius, and P. Sestius Capitolinus made Consuls. In which year likewise there was no war abroad, many at home home troubles arose. By this time were the Embassadors returned with the Athenian laws. And therefore the Tribunes were so much the more earnest and urgent, that once at length they would set on, to describe and put down home laws. And agreed it was, that there should be created Decemvirs above all appeal: for the year ensuing, there should no other Officers and Magistrats be in place. Now, whether any of these might be of the Commons or no, that was a question: and hereupon some debate and controversy continued for a good while. At the last, the Nobles went away with it, & had the pre-eminence upon this condition, that neither the law scilicet, concerning the Aventine mount, nor other sacred laws should be repealed. Thus in the 302 year after that Rome was built, was the form of the civis government changed the second time, and to the Consul: from the Decemvir, was the sovereign rule translated, like as before, from the kings to the Consul.

A This change was lesse notable, in that it long continued not. The beginning of this Magistracy was fair and goodly to see to, but grew too rank: and exceeded in overmuch licentiousness. The sooner therefore it faded and fell away, and the former government was taken up again, and both the name and jurisdiction of Consuls returned, and was conferred upon twain. The Decemvirs created were these: Ap. Claudius, T. Genucius, P. Sestius, L. Veturius, C. Julius, A. Manlius, P. Sulpicius, P. Crassius, T. Romulus, Sp. Posthumus, C. Julius and Genucius, became they had been Consuls elect for that year, had this dignity bestowed upon them, in lieu of the other. And Sestius one of the Consuls the year before, because he had preferred this matter unto the Senators, against his fellow Consul will. Next to these were counted the three Embassadors that went to Athen, both for that they should be rewarded with this honourable dignity, for their embassy into so far & remote a country, & also because men were perswaded, that by reason of their insight and skill in foreign ordinances of strange nations, they might be well employed in setting down, and making of new; The rest made up the number. They say, that in the last scrutinies and suffrages at this Election, choice was made of those that were more aged, and farther steep in years, to the end they might not so fiercely and stoutly gain say and cross the opinions and constitutions of the other. In this new state of government, Appius was the man that bare the greatest stroke, he ruled the rest and swayed all the rest, so highly stood he in grace and favour with the people. He had altered his nature, and became such a new man, that all on a sudden, of a cruel and terrible persecutor of the Commons, he proved a very Publicola, and counter of the Commonalty, and one that lay for to get every gale of popular love and favour that might be had. Every one at his tenth day in place of judgement, and ministered justice in their severall turnes unto the people. On which day, the twelve knives of rods were born by the Lictors before the sovereign judge: as for his nine brethren, they had each of them one for aught to give attendance. In this agreement among themselves, (which accorded otherwhiles when they were private persons, had been hurtful unto them) rested only and wholly the greatest equity towards others. A proof and argument of their moderation, it shall be sufficient to observe now in the example and instance of one only matter: for whereas they were created absolute, and past all appeal, it fortuned, that in the house of P. Sestius, a Nobleman, there was a dead body found buried, and brought forth openly into the publick assembly of the people. The thing being no lesse apparent in view, then heinous and horrible in fact, C. Julius a Decemvir, brought Sestius in question therefore, put him in suit to answer at a certain day, and became plaintiff unto the people, and accused that defendant, whose competent judge he was by order of law. And so he yielded of his own right adding so much to the freedom of the people, as was taken from the power of his own jurisdiction and government. When as now both high and low gave out, that this authority was found, and uncorrupt, & fast as were from Oracle and Gods own mouth, & all men willing to accept of justice at their hands: then set they to it, and went about the making and giving of laws. And with great expectation of men, they let out ten Tables, and called the people to general assembly, commanding them in a good hour, and in the name of God to go, & that which might turn to the good, & to the benefit, and happiness of the Commonwealth, themselves their children & posterity to read the law there published: protesting that so far as ten men could with all their wisdom foresee & provide for, had devised indifferent laws, and equal for all sorts of callings, as well the best as the meanest. But for as much as the wits and heads of many men, were of deeper reach to see farther into things, they gave them good leave, to call in their minds, and ponder with themselves each particular, yea, and to reason together from point to point, and thereof to deliver their opinion openly, what was thore and wanting, or what was superfluous, in every article: and look what laws the consent of all men seemed to bring in, those should the people accept and none other: that it might appear they were not so much to approve of them and give their assent after they were propounded, as to propose and preferre them their own selves. And when as they were thought sufficiently corrected, according to the speeches of men, and as every one spake to the severall titles and chapters of the laws, as they were set forth: then in the high court of Parliament, assembled of all the Centuries & degrees of men, the laws of ten Tables were enacted and established. Which even at this day, among that infinite number of Statutes, heaped and huddled one upon another, are the very well-spring and fountain of all justice, both publick and private. After this, there ran a rumour abroad, that two tables were yet wanting, which if they were put unto the rest, then might the complete body as it were of the whole Roman law be finished and made perfect. The expectation thereof, now that the great Let-day grew near for the Election, made men very desirous to create Decemvirs again the second time. Now the Commons abroad, besides that they hated the very name of Consuls, as well as of Kings, fought not greatly for the protection of the Tribunes: seeing that the Decemvirs one after another, yielded in their prerogative, and admitted in some sort the appeal. But after that the solemn assembly for the choosing of Decemvirs, was published against the Tribunes, or third market day next ensuing, to such an height was the ambition and desire of this dignity grown, that the very chiefs men, and principall heads of the City (for fear, I believe, lest the possession of to great a government, in case they were not invested themselves in the place, should be open unto some unmeet and unworthy persons) went about and made court to every man, using in humble manner to those very Commons, with whom they had been at strife & variance, for that honour and dignity, which they themselves had with all their power and might impugned. The worthiness and reputation of men of those years, and baying born and gone through that they were much beholding to their enemies, and might thank war for this, that any ancient H guile and custom of a free city was come up and in use again. They looked about on every side of the Forum, to see if they might espie a Senator but few or none could they hear of, any where.

Then looked they into the Curia, and behold, none at all appeared about the Decemvirs. Whereof their own selves, even the Decemvirs could gather no other wife, but that in the conceipt, & content of all men, their government was become odious: & the Commons also thus collected and interpreted, that the Senators met not together, because privat men (such as the Decemvirs were indeed) had no authority to assemble a Senat. And now said they, is the way and entrance made to recover their liberty again, if to be the Commons would join with the Senat: and as the Nobles being called, meet not together in counsel, to the Commons likewise would refuse to be muttered. In this wise muttered and whispered the Commons. And in truth scarcely was there any one of the Senators about the common place, and but few within the city: for very griefe and indignity to see that things went as they did, they had withdrawn themselves into the countrie to their lands: and forgetting the state of the common-weal, they became careless of their own privat affairs: thinking themselves so far freed from oppression and wrong, as they were more and sequestred from the society, meeting and conference, with so Lordly & imperious rulers.
When they would not assemble at their summons, the officers were sent unto their houses, both for to streine and take away streffes for their contumacie and disobedience, and also to enquire and learn, whether they refused to come at their commandment, or of set purpose or no. And word they bring back, that the Senators were in the country. The Decemvirs were better apt to hear that, than if answer had come that they were at home and refused to obey. They they gave commandment that they should be sent for, and they warned a Senat house against the next day following: where they assembled more in number than they looked for. Whereupon the Commons supposed that their liberty was bought and sold and utterly betrayed by the Nobles, for that the Senat had yielded obedience to them (that now by right were out of their office) as if they had given a lawfull summons, who being privat men had no power at all to do so. But they flew more obedience and submission, as we have heard say, in coming to the Councell house, than any disposition to deliver their minds and opinions there, to the liking and pleasures of the Decemvirs.
First, L. Valerius Potitius, as it recorded, after that Appius Claudius had proposed unto them the cause of their meeting, before they were required their advice in order and course, claimed the liberty of the house, to speak in the behalfe of the common-weal. But when as the Decemvirs denied it flatly, yea, and forbid him with threats, upon pain of their high displeasure, he inferred again and menaced, that he would go forth unto the commons, and to begin a broil and tumult.
M. Horatius Barbatus likewise took part with him, and was nothing behind in stoutnesse to maintain the quarrell, terming them ten Tarquins: "and are ye aware (quoth he) how the Kings were in times past expelled by the Valerius and Horatius? And yet the name it was not of Kings, that men were so weary of and loathed in those daies. For why? it was right lawfull to call " Jupiter by that name: whereby Romulus also the founder of this City, and other Princes his " successors have been called: yea, and the name hath been used, and is retained still as a solemn ti" tle, in the sacred rites of holy Kirk. Nay, it was the pride and oppression of the King, that then M
" was odious, and nothing else, which enemies, if they were in those daies in the King himself, a " lawfull prince, or in the King his son intolerable, who can abide and endure the same to ma" ny privat persons? I advise you therefore to take heed how you debar men of their liberty " in speech in the Councell House, lest ye drive them thereby to speak their mind and complain with" out the Councell House. Neither see I any reason at all, why it were not as lawfull for me
" a privat man, to assemble the people to an audience, as for you to call the Senat together to a " Councell. Make triall whensoever ye will, ye shall find how much more forcible our just griefe
" will be, in recovering our libertie again, than this greedy desire of yours, holding and upholding " still your usurped, unlawful, and tyrannical rule. You have propounded here unto us, forsooth,
" concerning the Sabines war: as who would lay, the people of Rome can be at greater war with N
" any than with those, who have been created Magistrates only for the publishing and casting of " certain laws, have left now neither law nor justice at all within the city. Who have taken away " their Comitia, i. Courts and Leets of Election, their yearly Magistrates, the successive change " and course of bearing rule, the only thing that maketh Isonomy, and equality of freedom. Af-
" being but privat men, are possessed both of regall ornaments, and also of regall government. Wh-
" ter the expulsion of the Kings, the Magistrates that succeeded were of the Nobility: in pro" cess of time, upon the rising of the Commons and their departure, there were officers chosen out " of the Commonalty. I demand of you, and I would gladly know, of whether state or body are " ye? Are ye, I pray you, popular, and of the Common people? What have ye ever done with ad" vice and approbation of the people? Are ye Nobles and Peers? who now for a whole yeere P " almost, have held no Councell of Senators. And now that ye have assembled them, you restrain " them from speaking for the Weal-publick. Well presume not too much, neither bear your selves " upon the timorousness of others. For, trust me truly, the indignities that men already suffer, " seem more irksome and uncomfortable, than whatsoever els they can doubt and fear hereafter. As " Horatius spake these words aloud, and the Decemvirs could not bethink themselves of some in" different & mean course, either in anger to be revenged, or in lenity to pardon and put up, nor with" out where to this matter might tend and proceed in the end: then C. Claudius, uncle to Appius, Dece-

" ing your privat estate more than the Commonweal. As for her, if he might not by fair means
" and with their good wils, obtain her own due and right, he would by foul waies, and in spite " of their hearts recover it in the end. And for as much as of much debate and strife there ensue " commonly heats of anger and cankered rancour, I am in dread & horror what the sequel and if-
" sue will be of these jars. Now when as the Decemvirs would not permit the rest to speak, but " only to the point propoed and occasion of their meeting, yet they were ashamed to interrupt B the speech of Claudius and to cut him off: but suffered him to go on until he made an end. And in conclusion his opinion and sentence was, that he would not (to abide by it) agree, that any act of the Senat should for that time passe in that behalf. And all that were present took his words to, as if Claudius deemed no otherwise of the Decemvirs, than of private men. Many of them also, such especially as had been Consuls, were of his mind, and said as much. Another opinion there was, more rough and sharp in outward shew, but far lesse forcible and effectuall in deed: advising and willing the Nobles, to make no more ado, but to go together and choose an Interregent. For this man seemed yet, to account and judge them Magistrates; (bad though they were) that had called C a Senat, and held them in Councell: whereas the former, that would not abide any act to passe, reckoned them out for privat persons. Thus when the Decemvirs came began to shrinke and go downward, L. Cornelia Maluginensis, brother to Cornelius the Decemvir, being relieved of purpose to give his opinion in the last place of all the Consular Senators, such as had been Consuls, pretending a care that they had of the war, took part with his brother and his Collegues, saying, that " he marvelled much by what misfortune or destinie it happened, that the decemvirs should be chal" lenged and opposed, especially by those that had stood for the Decemvirship, or by their " friends and associates: and how it came about, that in so many months space, whiles the city was
" at rest and without fear of war, no man made question or doubt, whether they that were in place,
" and governed the state, were lawfull Magistrates or no: and now at last, when the enemies are " in a manner at the gates, they should so civilly dissension, unless this were the meaning of it,
" that in a troubled time it would not be so clearly seen and perceived, what they went about. But
" no man is able (quoth he) to set down a true dole, & alledge a sould case in forrest a matter as this " is to me, whose minds are busied and wholly possessed of a greater care. And therefore my o" pinion is, that concerning that point which Valerius and Horatius charged the Decemvirs with,
" namely, That before the Ides of May their government was determined, and they out of office;
" the Senat should dispute and debate, when as the wars now at hand were dispatched, and the " Commonweal brought once again to quietnesse: And that Appius Claudius should make this re-
" sponing even now stand, and know that he is to render a reason of that high count of Parla-
" ment, which for the election of Decemvirs he called and held, being a Decemvir himself:
" namely, Whether they were created for one year only, or to continue till, until the other laws E " which yet are wanting, were ratified and confirmed. As for the present time, he thought good that " all other matters should forcelate, and be passed over, save the war only: the name, or rather, if " they thought to be idle, god that they were but tales that not only the messengers, but also the " Embassadors of the Ides, his reported, then his advice was to send out epistols, who upon their " discovery might bring more certain tidings. But in case they gave credence, to messengers and " Embassadors both, then with all speed possible to muster, and the Decemvirs to have the com-
" duct of the armies, and to lead them whither they thought meet: and that nothing els should be " thought upon before this. Which opinion of his, that it might prevail and take effect, the public
" Senators by importunate convalling, obtained. Then Valerius and Horatius both rose up the se" cond time more fierce and eager than before, calling upon them aloud, that they might be per" mitted to speak concerning the Commonweal: and in case they might not be suffered by reason of " the faction, to have the liberty of speech in the Councell House, they would speak their mind with" out, before the people. For neither could privat men (as they were) debar them in Senat House, " nor in open assembly, & to give place unto their imaginary, and pretended imperial ensigns, they " would never be brought. Then Appius supposing the matter well-near come to this passe, that " unless the violence were resisted with like boldnesse, their rule was at an end, and their autho" rity conquered: Ye were not best (quoth he) to speak but to the matter, whereupon we sit in " Consultation. And when Valerius replied again and said plainly, that he would not hold his " tongue for a privat mans commandment: Appius lent a Sergeant unto him. Whereupon Valerius
" cried for help to the Quirites, from the porch of the Councell House. Then L. Cornelia clasping G Appius about the middle, without regard to content him whose good he pretended, raised the " strife. So by the mediation of Cornelius, leave was granted to Valerius for to lay his mind at his " own pleasure. But, for as much as his libertie proceeded no farther, then to some few words, the " Decemvirs held on their purpose still, and had their desire. The Nobles also, such as had been Con" suls, and the senators, upon an old cankered hatred that they bore still against the Tribunes au" thority, where upon they supposed the Commons were much more devoted and affected, then unto the " government of the Consuls, were rather inclined and willing that the Decemvirs of their own ac" cord should themselves afterwards forgo their office, than that upon hatred and malice received " against

against them, the Commons should take heart of grace, and hold up head again. For it with gentle handling of the matter, without stir and clamour of the people, the regiment returned again unto the Consuls, it would haply come to passe, that either by means of wars coming between, or through the moderation of the Consuls in their government, the Commons might in time forget the Tribunes quite.

Thus whiles the Nobles were silent and made no more words, a muster was proclaimed, and the younger sort of people, seeing the government of the Decemvirs absolute and without appeal, made answer to their names. And when the legions were enrolled, the Decemvirs took order and agreed between themselves who should go forth to the wars, and who should have the command of the forces. The chief & principal of the Decemvirs were Q. Fabius, and Appius Claudius. And for that there seemed greater war at home then abroad, the Decemvirs supported the violent nature of Appius, fitter to repress all troubles and murdres in the citie; and considering withall the disposition of Fabius, to be leave constant and resolute in goodesse, then active and quick in militarie service, (for this man having been in times past of great worth, both at home, and also in war: the Decemvirship, and the conditions of his colleagues together, had to greatly changed, that he chole rather to be like Appius than himself) to him therefore was imposed the charge of the war against the Sabines, together with M. Rabulius and Q. Petilius joined in commission with him. M. Cornelius was sent into Algidum, with L. Minucius, T. Antonius, Cassius, Dulcius, and M. Sergius, and they ordained and appointed Sp. Opimius as assistant to Appius Claudius, for the defence and government of the city, and to have the full authoritie of all the ten Decemvirs. But the Common-weal sped no better abroad in warfare, than it fared at home. The only fault in the Generals was this, That they had made themselves odious to their souldiers and citizens: all the blame els lay in the souldiers themselves; Who to the end that nothing might go well forward and prosper under the leading and conduct of the Decemvirs, suffered themselves to their own shame, and dishonour of their captains, to be defeated: for the armies were both by the Sabines at Eretum, and also by the Equians in Algidum discomfited. They that fled from Eretum in the dead of the night, had encamped and fortified upon an high ground nearer unto the city of Rome, between Fidens and Crustumena. And when the enemy pursued them till and provoked them to fight, they would never come forth into the plain and even ground, to encounter with them in a pight battell, but stood upon their guard and defended themselves, trusting in the situation of the place and their rampier, and nothing upon their own manhood and force of arms. But in Algidum they committed a more foul and beastly fault, and received withall a greater losse and overthrow; inasmuch as having lost their camp with all their tents, the souldiers being turned out of bag and baggage, their harness and implements of necessary use, retired for refuge to Tusculum, hoping there to be entertained as guests, and to live upon the protection, mercy and devotion of their holls and friends: who failed and deceived not their expectation. But to Rome there came such fearful news, that the Senators and Nobles laying apart now all hatred against the Decemvirs, thought good to keep watch and ward in the citie: and commanded as many as were able to bear arms, to keep the walls and guard the gates: they gave order also to send harness and armour to supply their want at Tusculum: moreover, That the Decemvirs should abandon the cattle at Tusculum, and with their souldiers take the field and keep the camp: That they likewise should dislodge and remove from Fidens, that lay fortified there and remove into the countrey of the Sabines: so that by making wars upon the enemy first, they might scare and divert them from pursuing their intent of giving assault unto the citie of Rome. Besides these damages and losse sustained at the enemies hands, the Decemvirs committed both in war abroad, and also in the citie at home, two most wicked and horrible facts. For whereas one L. Siccius, during their abode in the Sabines countrey (upon an odious conceit and malice against the Decemvirs, had gone up and down, and in secret talke whispered in the ears of the Common souldiers, some mention of erecting Tribunes, and of another insurrection and departure: him the Decemvirs dispatch before to spy out a convenient plot of ground to encamp in. Now they had given those souldiers in charge, whom they sent to accompany him in that expedition, to let him upon him in some fit place of advantage and to kill him. And kill him they did, but to their own cost: for whiles he fought in his own defence, some of those that laid for his mischief, died for it, and lay along about him for company: for being a right stout and strong man of his hands, he stood to it courageously: and notwithstanding he was betted round about, he defended himself very manfully. The rest that escaped bring word into the camp, that Siccius was fallen una-ware into an ambusement, and whiles he fought lustily, was with certain other of the souldiers slain. At the first, credit was given to him that brought the news. But afterwards, when as there was a band of souldiers thither sent by the permission of the Decemvirs, to bury them that there lay dead: they observing none of their bodies there, to be diarmed and depouled, and Siccius lying in the midst of his armour, and all the rest of the dead with their faces towards him: no corps of enemy, nor footing of them departing from thence, brought away with them his dead carcase, and made report that undoubtedly and passe all peradventure, he was murdered by his own company. Hereupon was the whole camp filled with hatred and detestation of this fact, and generally it was agreed, that Siccius forthwith should be conveyed to Rome, had not the Decemvirs made hatt to tolerate his funerals souldierlike, at the publicke charges of the common treasure. So interred was he with exceeding sorrow and mourning

A of the souldiers, but to the most shameful obloquy and infamy of the Decemvirs, amongst the common sort.

Now followeth the other heinous deed committed within the City: which began of wanton lust, and had as foul and shameful an end, as that which upon the carnal abusing and bloody death of Lucretia, callt the Tullians out of the City, and deprived them of their regall dignity: that both KK, and Decemvirs, might have not only the like lucke and illue, but also one and the selfe came out of their rule and dominion. Appius Claudius enamoured upon a virgin, a commoners daughter, lust to the abuse and spoil of her body. The father of the maiden L. Verginius, was of good calling, and in place of credit in the camp that lay in Algidum, and had the leading there

The tragical History of Verginius.

B of company: a man of honest example and conversation of life, both at home and also abroad in warfare. His wife likewise of virtuous disposition: so were their Children nurtured and taught accordingly. He had espoused and affianed his daughter in marriage to one L. Titus, a man of stout courage (as having been Tribune) and whole virtue and valor had been well tried and approved in the quarrel and defence of the commonalty. This damsel in the prime of her years, passing fair and beautiful withal, Appius (I say) cast a fancy and liking unto, and so burned in love of her, that he assayed with guits and fair promises to win her good will, but seeing algnarded and sorely fenced with maidenly shamefastnes and honesty, he bent his mind wholly to cruel and proud violence. He liboneth and setteth on a favorite and follower of his, one M. Lucretius, to make challenge and lay claim unto her as his bond-maid: and not to give place nor yeeld her

C unto them, that required to have her at liberty out of his hands, during the suit, and until shee brought proof of her freedom: supposing, because the father of the virgin was absent, he had good opportunity to work this feat, and compals his intended injury. As the maiden therefore was coming into the market place, (for there were the schools for pettes kept, of reading and writing) the Decemvirs man (a broker to lerve his matters lust) laid hold upon her, avowing that she was his bond-servants daughter, and therefore his bond-maid: commanding her to follow him, and threatening besides, that if she made any stays, he would have her away perforce. The feartie girl there was amazed, and her nurse withal cried to the Quirits for help: whereupon the people came running and flocked together all about them. Now was the name of Verginius her father, and likewise of Titus her spouse, very gracious and popular: so that the love and favour

D wherein they stood, raised friends and acquaintance: and the indignity of the thing besides, moved the whole multitude to tender the cause of the damsel. When as there fore she was now past danger of violence, the party that made claim unto her, said: there was no need that the people should thus gather together, for his meaning was to proceede only by order of law, and not with any violent course. And so he cited her to the court, minding to commence his action against her, and put her in suit. Then they that were present to assist her, periwaded her to follow. Now when they were come before Appius, sitting judicially upon his tribunall seat, the Plaintiff, or challenger, declared against her, and retell a tale wel known to the Judge himselfe, being the origin and deviler of the whole matter and argument: Namely, that the maiden was born in his house, and by stealth was from thence conveyed home to Verginius, and so was his

E supposed and reputed daughter: this he averred to have certain knowledge of, by pregnant evidences and witness: and would make proof thereof to be most true, and let Verginius himselfe be the judge, whom the greater part of this wrong deeply touched: in the mean while, it was but meet and reason, that the bond-maid should go with her Master. The friends and advocates of the damsel, having alledged and pleaded in her behalf, that Verginius was absent and employed in the affairs of Common-weal: and if he had word thereof, would not fail but be at home within two days: that it was no reason, that whiles atwar was away, he should be in contention and controvercie about his children: they required of Appius therefore to deier and put off the hearing of the whole matter until her fathers coming, and that according to a law by himselfe in that case made and provided, he would grant her to be at large and stand at liberty, for to bring in proof

F that she was not bond: and that he would not suffer a maid of those years, ripe and ready for a husband, to be come in hazard and danger of her good name, then prejudiced in the trial of her freedom. Appius made a long preface and discourse before his decree, namely, how much he favoured and tendered the cause of liberty, and to that effect, alledged the selfe same law, which the friends of Verginius interpreted for their purpose and demand. But so far forth, and no otherwise, should there be in that law assured safeguard of freedom, as the case altered not in circumstance of causes and persons. For, this priviledge and benefit held only in those that were claimed to be free, where any man whose ever might go to law and plead. As for her, who was in her fathers hand & at his disposition there was no other man els unto whom the Master that maketh challenge, is to yeeld the right of his possession. His pleasure therefore was, and thus he decreed, That the father should be lent for: and that in the mean season, he that made title to her, should not be prejudiced thereby, but that he might lead away the wench, promising and assuring to have her at her coming, and to present her in Court. At the return of him who is pretended, and nominated, to be her father. Against this injurious decree, when as many men rather muttered and murmured, then any one durst refuse and contradict it, P. Numitrius, the mids tinsle by the mother side, and Titus her espoused husband, hapred to come in place: and having way made them through the throng and press, the multitude thought verily, that by the coming, especially of Titus, Appius might have been reitied and crossed. But then the Licitor pronounced that

Claudius.*

Appius had passed an order and decree already, and put Leilius back: who cried out aloud, (for so manifest and horrid a wrong had been enough to have moved a very Saint, and set on fire a right mild natured person.) Nay, Appius (quoth he) thou hadst more need to let me back with force of arms; if thou wouldst get clear away, and not be spoken to for that which thou wouldst do in huck mucker. This maid, I tell thee, I mean that go with me: I purpose to have her to my selfe, an honest and pure virgin, and enjoy her in lawful marriage, as my wedded wife: call therefore unto thee all the Licitors besides (thou were best) that belong unto thy companions: cause both rods and axes to be made ready: I tell thee, Leilius his espoused wife shall not abide in any place without her fathers house. What? although ye have taken from the Commons of Rome the Tribuns assistance and protection, and the privilege of Appeal, two principal bulwarks for defence of their liberty: ye are not therefore allowed to rule and tyrannize, and to fulfill your lust upon our children and wives too. Exercise your rigour and cruelty and spare not, upon our backs and sides in scourging us, yea, upon our necks and heads also, in taking them from our shoulders: so ye forbear to assail our chastity and honesty. Whereunto, if any violence shall be offered, I will for my part, call for the help of the Quirites here present, in the behalf of my spouse: and Virginius for himself will call to the fouldiers, in regard of his only daughter: we will cry for help of God and man: and cost it shall our lives before thou go away with this decree, and put it in execution. I require and charge thee, O Appius therefore, to be well advised, and look how far thou dost proceed. Let Virginius when he is come, see to his daughter, how he deleth about her: and let him know thus much for certain, that if he give place to this plaintiffs assertion, and forgo the present possession of her, he shall go seek his estate and propriety that he hath in his daughter. As for me, in this quarrel of maintaining the freedom of my spouse, I will lose my life, before I fail in my faithfull promise to her made. Hereat the whole multitude was moved, and like it was, that some mutiny and fray would presently have ensued. For the Licitors had hemmed in Leilius on every side. Howbeit they proceeded no farther then to big words and high threats: whiles Appius laid hard to Leilius, "That he did not this so much in the behalf and defence of Virginius, as (being himself an unruly person, and even already breathing forth a Tribuns spirit) sought means, and picked occasion of an uproar and sedition. Howbeit for his part he would not that day minister unto him any matter thereof, and that he might now well know, that he did not this to feed his malapert taunings, but in regard of the absence of Virginius, and for the name of a father, and the tender respect of freedom, he would not that day sit to hear and determine the matter, nor award a definitive judgement in that case: but would request Mar. Claudius, to suspend his action, and to forbear and yield for much of his own right, as to suffer the maid to be bailed and go under sureties, and to be at her liberty until the next day. But in case her father appeared not in Court the morrow after, he gave Leilius, and such as he was, to wit and understand, that neither the law should want the patronage of the maker, nor the Decemvirs fail in courage and resolution: neither would he call together his fellow officers and sergeants, for to keep under such invidious and turbulent spirits as he was: but would content himself with his own Licitors, and do well enough. The time now of effecting this injury, being thus deterred, and the maids Advocates gone aside, they agreed first of all upon this point, that a brother of Leilius, and a son of Namptorius, two lusty and nimble young men, should be dispatched straight from thence to echeate: and that with all speed possible Virginius should be sent for home from the camp: for that if it stood the maid upon as much as her whole estate and life was worth: that he would be present and ready in due time the day following, to preserve her from this hard course, and wrongful proceeding. According as they were bidden, they set forward, and spared no horseflesh until they brought tidings herof to her father. All this while the plaintiff that made challenge to the maid, was very instant with Leilius to bail her, and put in sureties. And he again made answer, That he went about it as fast as he could, and did nothing else: but indeed trifling out the time on purpose, until the messengers that were sent to the camp, were got afore welonward on their way. Then the whole multitude on all sides N held up their hands, in token that they offered themselves every one unto Leilius, ready to become bound. Whereupon he burst out into tears for tender heart. Gramercy (quoth he) my masters all, to morrow I will use your helping hand: for this time I am sped of sureties enough. So was Virginius set at liberty, and bailed by the suretiship of her kinsfolk. Then Appius, after he had stayed a while, because he would not seem to have fat for that matter alone, when he saw all other suits and canes omitted, in regard they had to it, and no man coming to him for justice, he arose, got him home to his house, and wrote unto his brethren Decemvirs into the camp that they should not give Virginius his passport but keep him fast in durance, and in ward. This wicked practise (as God would have it) came forth. For Virginius already had got his discharge, and was departed forward on his journey, in the evening by the setting of the first watch. And very early in the morning came the letters for to stay him, but all in vain. For Virginius by break of day was arrived: by which time the whole City resorted into the common place, standing and waiting earnestly for his coming. And thither he himself being in soiled and simple array brought his daughter in her old worn cloaths, accompanied with certain Wives, and a great number of Advocates and friends: Then and there began he to go from one man to another, and to labour them hard: and not only besought their assistance by way of intreaty and prayer, but also required it as due and deserved: saying, that he stood dayly in field ready to fight in defence of their wives

A wives and children: neither could there be reported of any man more hardy exploits and valiant piece of service in war, then of himself. But what booteth or availeth all this (quoth he) to save the City from enemies, in case our children be forced to abide the utmost extremities that befall unto Cities taken by the enemies? so went he about preaching, as it were, from one man to another. Likewise Leilius cast forth and redoubled his speeches freely and spared not. But the train of women, with their still and silent weaving, moved men more then any words uttered. Altho this notwithstanding, Appius in his obstinate mind (so disquieted was he and wholly possessed with a forcible spirit of humorous madnes rather then of amorous passion) ascended up into the tri umphall. Where, as the plaintiff first of himself was framing some short complaint, that by reason of partial favour and making of great friends, he could not have law and justice the day past: before that either he had made an end of his demand, or given leisure to Virginius for to put in his answer accordingly: Appius interrupted the speech, and began himself, What preamble it was that he made before his decree, peradventure some ancient writers have for truth recorded. But for as much as I cannot any where find in so manifest a decree, that which I carryeth but a shew and soundeth like a truth: therefore, that only which is of all agreed upon, I thought best to tell of the kintnes barely without any preface at all: namely, That he judged her in the behalf of the Plaintiffs to be his bondswoman. First, all men there, wondered at this unworthy and foul act: and being thus taken therewith allowed, for a good while after, stood still and held their peace. But afterwards, when as Mar. Claudius went to lay hand on the maid, amongst the dames C that stood about her, and was received with a piteous lamentation, and cry of the women: Then Virginius was king with his hands and shaking them at Appius: "To Leilius (quoth he) have I betrothed my daughter and not to thee O Appius: brought her up I have for honest and chaste wedlock: and not for unclean and filthy whordom: to be a wile another day, and not an harlot. Is this the manner of it, like bruit and wild beasts without all regard, to leap and run upon you such not whom, and to insult your fleshly lust? How these that be here will suffer such pranks, I know not: but they that are in camp with sword in hand, I hope, will never put them up. Now when as he that challenged the maid was by a knot of Women and Advocates that stood about her repelled back, then proclaimed the Bedlie and commanded silence. And the Decemvir having his head intoxicated, and altogether carried away with unbridled lust, brake forth D and said, That he had certain intelligence and was informed of a truth, by manifest and assured evidences, (and not induced and led thereto by the reviling taunts of Leilius yesterday, and the violent proceedings of Virginius, whereof he had the people of Rome to bear witness, and which might give some light and presumptions) That the night past, there were meetings and conventions in the City, and all to raise a mutiny and insurrection: and therefore he not ignorant of such a broil and riot toward, was come down into the common place with a guard of armed men: not minding to hurt any one that would keep the peace, but only by virtue of the majesty of government and authority, to repress such as troubled the peaceable state of the City: therefore it were best for them to be still and quiet. So Sergeant (quoth he) cause the people to avoid the place, and make room for the matter to lay hand upon his bondswoman: and after I had thundered E out these words full of ire and wrath, the multitude of themselves gave back and made way: so the poor wily wench stood all tormented and left as a prey to their injurious clutches. Then Virginius seeing all past help and no other remedy: Well Appius (quoth he) passion me first I beseech thee if thou art a fatherly affection and grief of heart, I have let fall some shrewd and curst words against thee more then was becoming: Then, give me leave here before the virgin, to enquire of her nurse the truth of this matter that I have uttered: her nurse, I may go hence better spyed and satisfied in my mind. Leave being granted, he led his daughter and the nurse apart from the rest, near to the Church of Venus Cloacina, hard at the shops, called at this day Nova Laborum, i.e. the new shops or standings: and there having caught a knife from a butcher he thus spake: My sweet daughter, no other means have I but this only to let thee free, and to bestir up F the damsel to heart: and looking presently to the judgement seat. Here with this blood I stain a crifice thee Appius, and thy head to the Devil, Appius with the crife that arose upon so horrible a fact, being much troubled, commanded Virginius to be apprehended: but he with bloody blade in hand, made way where he went, until with a number that followed him apace to bear him company, he recovered the gate. Leilius and Namptorius took up the bloodless corpse and held it aloft to the people, blaming and cursing the wickedness of Appius: pitying the unhappy and unfortunate of the damsel: and bewailing the hard exaction and extremity of the father. The Matrons followed after and cried: Is this the condition and fortune allotted unto parents for getting and bearing children? Is this the hire and reward of chastity and virginity: with other like speeches, which in such a case, women in their grief of mind use to utter: whose sorrow as it is G more heavy, proceeding from weak and tender hearts, so it yeeldeth and uttereth more pitiful and lamentable words, as they in their sharp sents and dolorous moans. But the men and Leilius above the rest, had no other talk, but of the Tribunes authority, and the appeal unto the body of the people: how they were taken away from them, and of other public indignities and common offences. The whole multitude partly upon the hainfulness of this wicked act, and partly for hope by this occasion to recover again their liberties, were all up on one in an uproar. Appius one while commanded Leilius to be called, another while for his disobedience and contumacy to be attached and convented before him. At the length, seeing no way made unto the Apparitors, for

to come by him, passed himself with a crew of tall gentlemen of the Nobility that were of his guard through the throng & commanded to have him away to prison. By which time there were gotten about Leilius not only the multitude, but the chief Captains and ringleaders of the multitude, L. Valerius and M. Horatius: who having thrust the sergeant back, said withal, that it Appian had any thing to charge him by of order of law, they would bail Leilius, and maintain his cause against him, who was but a private person: but if he went about to offer violence, he should soon meet with his matches. Hereupon grew a fierce brawling broil. The Decemvirs officer set on upon Valerius and Horatius to lay hold upon them: but his rods were by the multitude broken to pieces. Then Appian gets him up into the common place of audience, for to speak unto the people. Horatius and Valerius follow after him up, to do the like. Then the assembly heard with patience, but they hissed at Appian and cried out against him. Then Valerius took upon him, and commanded the Lictors to give attendance no longer upon a private person, Whereupon, Appian his heart was done and his courage quailed: so standing in fear of his life, he was fain to cover his face, and to withdraw himself in disguised manner, and took an house over his head, near unto the common place (unknown to his adversaries) there to save himself. Sp. Oppius, for to refuse and succour his Colleague, rushed from another side into the place: and there he might see force and might to have got the upper hand of authority. After many devices and consultations, wherewith he was distracted, and framing himself to yield consent on every side, at length by the advice and persuasions of many there about him, in great fear he commanded the Senat to be called together. This appeased the multitude, for that they were in hope that (by means of the Senators, who many of them, seemed to milke like the ads and proceedings of the Decemvirs) that government of theirs should come to an end. The Senat devised and took order, not to provoke the Commons too far: and withal to have a more provident and special eye, that the coming of Virginius unto the camp, bred no mutiny in the army. Whereupon were sent certain of the puny Senators unto the host, that lay encamped upon the hill Velutius, who advertised the Decemvirs from the Senat, to endeavor all they could to keep the soldiers in good order, from commotion and sedition. But there Virginius raised a greater uproar and tumult then he had left behind him in the City. For besides that, he was seen coming with a crew and train almost of four hundred men, who incensed with the indignity of the late accident, accompanied him voluntarily from the City, his naked drawn knife, and himself besprinkled and embred with blood, caused the whole camp to turn their eyes upon him. Moreover, their gowns seen in sundry places within the camp, made a greater shew of citizens in number then was indeed. Being demanded of them what news, and what the matter was, he wept, and for a good while held his peace. At the last, when as now the multitude, that for fear ran confusedly together, began to stand still and keep silence: he declared orderly from the beginning to the end, every thing in particular, as it was done. Then lifting up his hands to heaven, and calling to all his companions and fellow soldiers, he besought them not to impute that foul act unto him, wherof in truth Appian Claudius was the author and cause: nor to detest and abhor him as a parricide and murderer of his own children: saying, that his daughters life was more dear unto him then his own, if the might have lived free and honestly. But when he saw he was once hailed by force, as a bond-maid to be ravished and made a strumpet, M he thought it better to be bereft of his children by death, then by contumely and reproach: and so upon meer pitifulness incurred the shew and appearance of cruelty. And but that heretofore he was in the aid of his fellow soldiers, trusting that they would be revenged for his daughters death, he would not have remained a live-man after her. I know well (saith he) that you also have daughters, sisters and wives of your own: And it is not the death of my child that hath killed and mortified the lust of Appian; but rather the longer it elc-peth unpunished, the more outrageous and unbridled would it be. So that by the calamity of another man, ye are well taught and warned to beware of the like injury. As for me, I have buried my wife before, who died on Gods hand: and now my daughter, for that she might not finish the course of her days, with the safety of her maiden head and chastity, hath died, I confess, a pitiful and lamentable, but yet an honest kind of death. As to Appian, (quoth he) now can he not fulfil his lust in this his house: and for any other violence of his whatsoever, I carry the same mind and heart still to defend mine own body, wherewith I have already saved my daughters. Now let other men look to themselves and their children, as well as they can. As Virginius uttered these speeches aloud, the whole multitude with one accord cried and protested, they would not fail, but both revenge his grief, and maintain their own freedom. The Citizens also in their lide gowns, intermingled among the soldiers, made the self same complaints: shewing how much more horrible those things were in the eye to be seen in fact, then they could find unto the ear by bare relation: and withal reported, how at Rome the matter was well neer dispatched already, for that there were certain come after them: even hard at their heels from thence, who brought word that Appian had like to have been murdered, and was departed into exile: and so far prevailed they with them, that they gave the alarm, packed up their standards, and took their way to Rome. The Decemvirs being fore troubled, both at the present occasions which they evidently saw, and also to hear these news, in what bad terms all things stood at Rome, ran up and down, here one, and there another, into sundry parts of the camp for to appease the tumult. When they went to work mildly and gently, they had not a word of them again: but if any one laid his commandment upon them, and extended his authority, they would beard them and answer, That they were men, and more

A more then that men in arms and soldiers. Thus march they in order of battel toward the City, and take the mount Aventine, and there settle themselves. And as they encountered any, all their song was this, to exhort and encourage the Commons to recover their franchises, and to create Tribuns of the Commonalty. Not a word was heard else, tending to any violence. Oppius assembled the Senat together: where it was agreed, not to proceed by way of rigour in any case: for as much as they themselves had given the occasion of sedition. But three ancient personages, such as had been Consuls, were sent Commissioners in Embassage as it were, Sp. Tarpeius, C. Iulius, and Publius Sulpicius with commition, to demand of them in the name of the Senat, by whose commandment they had abandoned the camp, or what their intent was thus in war-like manner to keep the Aventine: and why leaving to war with their enemies, they had thus invaded their native Country: They were not to seek of an answer, only there wanted a man to give the answer: for as yet they were grown to no certain head, upon whom they might rely: and singly by themselves they durst not incur the hatred and dangerous displeasure that might ensue. This only the multitude with one voice cried aloud, to send L. Valerius, and Marcus Horatius unto them, for to those they would make a resolute answer. The Commissioners being dimitted, Virginius putteth the soldiers in mind, and adverteth them, how erewhile in a matter not of the greatest importance, they were intire and perplexity, because the multitude was without an aid: and how an answer was returned, although not altogether unprofitable and besides the purpose, yet agreed upon at a venture, and not proceeding from any public counsel. But now his opinion was, that there should be ten chosen to bear sovereign rule: who for the honour of warfare and soldiery, should be called military Tribuns. And when this dignity was to him offered first. Nay (quoth he) reserve still these your good persuasions and judgments of me, unto more happy days and favourable times both to me and you. For neither doth the remembrance of my daughter suffer me to take joy of any honour in this life, nor (as the fate standeth now troubled) is it good for you to have them to be your Magistrates, who of all other are most exposed to ill will and displeasure, and in need of danger to be hardly thought of. If I may serve you in any stead, you may make bold, and have no less use of me, remaining still a private person. So they create Tribuns military, ten in number. But all this while was the army as unquiet in the Sabins country. For even there also, by the instigation of Leilius and Nimitorius, the soldiers fell away from the Decemvirs and departed. For their minds were no less troubled and disquieted with the remembrance renewed, of the late murder of Securus, that kindled and set on fire by the fresh news of the death of Virginius, so villainously, so shamefully laid unto and challenged, and all to satisfy the lust of another, Leilius, so soon as he heard say, that there were ten military Tribuns created in Aventine, fearing lest the Election in the City should follow the prerogative of the military Election in the camp, as a precedent to create the self same men Tribuns of the Commons, being a man well seen and experienced in these popular affairs, and reaching himself at the same dignity and promotion, wrought to with his adherents and friends, that before they went to the City, they should likewise elect the self same number with equal authority. Who entered the City with banners displayed, at the gate Collina, and marched through the midst thereof in warlike order, up to the mount Aventine. And there joining and uniting themselves unto the other army, they gave in charge to the twenty military Tribuns, to create out of their number twain for sovereign governors to rule all. So they elected Marcus Oppius, and Sextus Maelius.

The Senators being in great care for the Common-weal, sat in Council every day: where they spent time oftner in wrangling and jarring, then in sage advice and politic counsel. The murdering of Securus, the wanton lust and loose life of Appian, the shameful disgraces received in the wars, were laid in the Decemvirs dish. At length they concluded, that Valerius and Horatius should go to the Aventine. But they refused and would not go, but upon condition that the Decemvirs would give up the Ensigns and Ornaments of that Magistracy and government, which by right they should have forgon and departed from a full year before. The Decemvirs were grieved and complained, thus to be let down & made no better then private men, and idly flatter they would not be depost from their place of rule, before those laws were fully enacted and confirmed, for which at first time they were created. The Commons having intelligence by Dullius (who had been a Tribun of the Commons) that by reason of continual debate and contention in the Senat house, there was nothing done and agreed upon, removed from the Aventine unto mount Sacer. For Dullius ceased not to suggest, and plainly affirm unto them, that the Senators and Ancients of the City would never sadly think upon any care and provision to be made, until they saw the City abandoned and desolate: moreover, That the mount Sacer would put them in mind of the constant resolution of the Commons: and that they should well know, that matters would never be settled and brought to an end, without they restored unto them their power and authority again. So they take their way by Nomentana Via, which at that time was named Ficulenis, and encamped themselves in the mountain Sacer: doing no harm to any creature as they passed along: following therein the modesty of their forefathers. The whole Commonalty followed after the host: there was not one who for age was able to travel on foot, that drew back and carried behind. Their children and wives bare them company, in piteous wail moaning themselves, and asking them: whereto they would leave them behind in that City, where neither their honest chastity might be guarded, nor yet their liberty secured and kept safe. When as now, by reason of his uncouth and strange desolation, all seemed at Rome waste and void, and none to be seene in the publick place, besides a few of aged men; and when the Senators were called into the Senate house, the common place appeared empty, naked and forlorn: then there were more besides Horatius and Valerius that cried out and said, What look you for fill my I.L. of the Council? What? and if the Decemvirs will make no end of their peevish frowardness, will ye let things run at six and seven, until all come tumbling down, or be of a light fire? And what goodly dominion is this, that you embrace fo in your arms, that you clip and hold so fast? Will ye minister justice and give laws to empty houses and bare walls? Are ye not abashed and ashamed, that there should be seen in the Place, a greater number well near of your Lictors and officers, then of gowned Citizens, and of all other men whatsoever? How and if the enemies should come against the City, what would ye do? Nay, what if shortly the Commons should march in arms, seeing we weigh their insurrection and departure too lightly? Will ye, together with the ruin and downfall of the City, end your rule, and not afore? Well, to be plain, ye must either have no Commons at all, or else allow them to have their Tribuns again: there is no mean, there is no other remedy. Sooner shall we want our Magistrates of the Nobility, then they will be without their Patrons and Officers of the Commonalty. They wring and wretched from our forefathers that power and authority fire new, and whereof they had as then, no proof and experience: how think ye then, that having talked now the fivecets of it, they will endure the want thereof? Especially seeing, that we our own selves are not of so temperate carriage in our government and command over them, but that they have need of some succour and relief. And when these and such like reasons were on all hands often alleged and laid abroad, the Decemvirs overweighed with the general content and unity of the house, promised: That seeing it was so thought good, they would be wholly ordered and ruled by the Senators. This only they befought at their hands, and admonished them of, by way of a proviso, that they would take order for the safety and security of their persons: and not by shedding their blood, to flesh the Commons, and to train them up, and acquaint them with exercising cruelty upon the nobles and Senators. Then were Valerius and Horatius lent with commission to reclaim and call home the Commons, upon such conditions and capitulations, as they should think convenient: yea, and to set all things in good order and make a final composition, with a special charge to provide for the safeguard of the Decemvirs, against the raging ire and violence of the multitude. These mediators took their journey, and were received into the camp with exceeding joy of the Commons, as being doubtless their very lawgivers and redeemers, approved both in the beginning of their troubles, and now also at the very end and upshot of all. In regard whereof, they were welcomed with thanksgiving. Scellus was the mouth of the multitude, and their prolocutor. Who when they came to debate and reason about the articles of covenants, and that these Delegates and Committees, required of the Commons, What the demands and points were that they stood upon? Being already provided aforehand of purpose what to say, demanded such conditions, as it was well seen, that they reposed more hope, and relied themselves rather in equity, and indifference, than in force of arms. For they require, Imprimis, to have the Tribuns power on foot again, and the appealing unto the people revived: which before the creation of the Decemvirs had been the only help and succour of the Commons. Item, that no man should be called in question, nor M any way touched in life, limb, or goods for gathering the soldiery or Commons together by way of commotion, for recovering again their libertie and franchises. Only, their demand concerning the punishment to be inflicted upon the Decemvirs, favoured of cruelty. For they deemed it meet and reason, that they should be yielded into their hands, and then they threatened to burn them quick with fire. To these Articles the Commons spake in this wise, "As for those capitulations, which upon counsel and deliberate advice ye have articulated, they are so reasonable and indifferent, that without your suit, they ought to have been offered unto you frankly and freely: for ye request to enjoy such things as concern the defence of your liberty and freedom, and to maintain not your licentiousness, to the offence and hurt of others. But as to your ire and wrath, it is to be pardoned, rather than to be followed and yielded unto: as who, under colour of N hatred and detestation of cruelty, run headlong into cruelty: and before, in a manner, that ye be set free your selves, ye will be Rulers and Lords over your Adversaries. Alas the while, and will our City never be at rest, and cease from punishing: but that either the Nobles will scourge the Commons of Rome, or the Commons whip the Nobles? As for you, ye had more need of a shield. 'Tis then a sword. Humbled he is enough, and too much humbled, who liveth in a City on even hand, and equal with others, under the same laws, neither doing nor taking wrong. And if ever at any time you mean to shew your selves dread and to be feared, when you have once recovered your Magistrates and Ordinances again, when ye have the law in your own hands, to censure and judge according to your own discretion, then may ye give your doom of our lives and goods, as each cause requireth. Now for this time it sufficeth, that ye claim and have your freedom again. Hereupon they all submitted themselves to the depured Delegates, permitting them to do what they would. Who seeing they had brought all matters to so good a conclusion, promised to return with all speed, so they took their leave. And when they had declared to the Senators the demands of the Commons, all the rest of the Decemvirs, perceiving no mention at all made of their punishment (a thing more then they looked or hoped for) denied no one point thereof. But Appius, a man of a fell and cruel nature, and who above all the other was most odious, and lay open to the malice of the people, and measuring the hatred of others toward him-

Commons.

A fell, by his own spleen that he bare against other men: "I wot well (quoth he) what ill fortune will betide me shortly: and I see plainly, that our adversaries hold off to wrangle and contend with us no longer then until they have weapons given in their hands. To satisfy their malice and hatred, we must part with our blood: nothing else will content them. For mine own part, to renounce my Decemvirship I weigh not: neither pass I how soon I do it. Then was an Act made by the Senat, that the Decemvirs out of hand should surrender their place: and that Quintus the Arch-Bishop or High Priest, should create Tribuns of the Commons: provided always expressly, that the mutiny of the soldiery, and insurrection of the Commons, should turn no man to dispendure and harm. These Acts being passed, and the Council retired, the Decemvirs came abroad into the open place of assemblies, and there to the exceeding joy of all men, they reigned up all their power and authority. Tidings hereof were carried to the commons by the mediators afore said: and look what people forever remained behind in the City, went now forth to accompany them. As this multitude passed along forward they were encountered upon the way with another joyful company from out of the camp. Who rejoiced mutually one in the behalf of the other, that both freedom and concord were restored to the City again. Then the mediators in the general assembly of them all spake and said: "To the great good, happiness and felicity of you and of the C. W. be it spoken, Return in Gods name into your own country, to your houses, wives and children: but see, that as ye have demeaned your selves modestly in your way hither, hurting and spoiling no mans lands and possessions, notwithstanding the need ye were driven unto of so many things: so ye carry the same moderation and stay of your selves homeward into the City. Go into the Acentine from whence ye came: and there for good luck sake, where ye laid the first foundation & ground-work of your liberty, create ye shal your Tribuns of the commons. There, will the high Priest be ready and give attendance, to call an assembly for the grand Election. Great was the accord, alacrity and cheerfulness, that they shewed in approving all that was propounded. So from thence they turn their standards and ensigns, and as they marched to Rome, they strove with all they met on the way, who could shew most joy and gladness: they paid on through the City armed as they were, yet peaceably and without noise, until they came into the Acentine. Where the chief Priest immediately held the Comices, in which they created for Tri. of the C. first and foremost L. Virginius, next after him, L. Icilius, and P. Numitorius. Uncle by the mothers side of Virginia: all authors of their insurrection and departure: then C. Scitinius descended from him in right line who was the first Trib. of Comm. created in mount Sacer, (as we find in records) and M. Duilius, who before the chusing of Decemvirs, had right worthily and notably borne the Tribunship, and in all combats and commotions with the Decemvirs, stuck close to the Commonalty and never failed them. After these were elected, moreover for then a former deiert, M. Titinius, M. Pomponius, C. Apronius, Ap. Julius, C. Oppius. Then C. Icilius immediately in the very entrance into the Tribunship, preferred a bill unto the Commons, and the Commons enacted it. That the departure and insurrection of the common people against the Decemvirs, should not be laid to any mans charge, nor bring him into trouble. Then without farther delay M. Duilius went through with an act of his own to wit, That there should be Consuls created, with reservation of liberty to appeal unto the people. All these things passed in the Comices of Commons, assembled in the meadows named Flaminia, which now they call Circus Flaminius.

Then, by an Inter-regent were Consuls created, L. Valerius and M. Horatius, who presently began their government. Whole popular Consulship, as it was without wrong doing to the Senators and Nobles, so it was not without some offence committed of their part: For whatsoever was provided for the liberties of the Commons, they supposed it abridged somewhat of their power and authority. And first and foremost, whereas it was a question and controverted not well cleared in law, Whether the Nobles were bound to stand to the Acts of the Commons: they made a law now in a general Session, by the suffrages of the Centuries, That what ordinance soever the Commons (being parted by Tribes) had by their voices granted, it should comprise and bind the whole body of the people. By which law, the Tribuns acts were armed with a most sharp and keen weapon to strike withal. Moreover, The other Consular law concerning Appeal, the only fort and strength of liberty, which by the Decemvirs absolute power had been overthrowen, they not only revive again, but also fortifie the same for the time to come, by making a new law, forbidding expressly that no man should create any magistrate absolutely without the liberty of appealing: and whosoever should create any such, he might rightfully and lawfully be killed, and that murder should not be counted a capital crime. And when they had sufficiently strengthened the Commons, on the one side with the benefit of appealing, and on the other side with the Tribuns power in favour of the Tribuns themselves, that they also might seem sacrosanct and inviolable (a thing now almost grown out of remembrance) they renewed that high privilege, with certain solemn ceremonies which having been of long time laid aside & neglected, were now brought up again and put in use. And they ordained them to be inviolate, as well in a reverent regard of religion and temple of conscience, as also by a special law in that behalf provided: namely, that whosoever hurt either Tribuns of the Commons, Adiles, Judges, or Decemvirs, his head should be accursed and devoted to Jupiter, and his family sold in port-sale at the Church of Ceres, Liber & Libera. By virtue of this Act, the great Exploiters of the law, deny that any man is a sacrosanct or inviolable: but (say they) it is enacted only, That whosoever hurt any of them, shall be accursed.

And therefore, an Edile may be attached and led away to prison by superior Magistrates, Which H although it be not warranted by law (for he is hurt, who by this law ought not to be hurt) yet it is a good argument to prove, that an Edile is not inviolable, Marry, as for the Tribuns, they were indeed by virtue of an ancient oath of the Commons, at what time as they first created that power and authority, inviolable: as they would seem to expound and make construction of the law. Others have been, that thus open and interpret the law. That in this self same Act of Horatius, the Consuls also, yea, and Pretors too, (because they are created by the same auspices or bird-signs that the Consuls be) were comprised, and had the benefit thereof. For a Consul is called by the name of a Judge, But that exposition is confused, for that in those days it was not the manner to turn the Consul a Judge, but the Pretor only. And thus much concerning the Consular Laws. I

The same Consuls also brought up this order and custom, that all the Acts of the Senat should be brought into the Church of Ceres, and presented unto the Ediles of the Commons: which aforesome were suppressed and smothered, yea, and corrupted or perverted at the will and pleasure of the Consuls. After all this, M. Duilius a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the Commons a Law, and they let it pass and granted it, That whosoever should leave the Commonalty destitute of their Tribuns, or create any Magistrate absolute without Appeal, should be scourged, and lose his head for it. All these Acts, as they passed against the wills and minds of the Nobles: so they went clean without their contradiction: for that, all this while hitherto, there was no rigour and severity that seemed to extend and reach to any one particular person among them, But afterwards, when as both the Tribuns power, and also the Commons freedom, were once well and surely grounded: Then the Tribuns, supposing now it was full time, that they might safely and without peril give the onset upon them, severally one by one, made choice of Virginius to be the first accuser or plaintiff, and Appius Claudius the first defendant, And Virginius had not so soon arrested Appius to answer at a day, and Appius came down into the Common place, guarded with a company of tall young gentlemen of the Nobility: but presently upon the sight of him and his guard about him, the remembrance of that most cruel and detestable tyranny was refreshed and renewed. Then Virginius: "Speeches (quoth he) and Orations were devised for doubtful

"causes: and therefore will I neither spend time in accusing him before you, from whose cruelty ye have by force of arms delivered your selves: nor suffer this wretch, over and besides his other wicked pranks, to shew in the defence of himself his audacious impudence. Therefore, as touching all other lewd parts of thine and wicked designments, O Appius, which thou hast for these two years ungraciously and impiously enterprized, and practised one on the neck of another, I will do thee some favour, and pardon thee: but for one crime only, unless thou canst acquit thy selfe the better, namely, that thou being the Judge, against all order of Law, didst not grant unto the party defendant, the benefit of liberty to go at large, during the time of the suit depending, until he might bring proofs of his freedom: for this, I say, I command thee to prison. Now had Appius no hope at all, either in the Tribuns helping hand, or in the doom and judgement of the people. Howbeit he both called upon the Tribuns for succour: and also seeing himself urged and haled away by the officer, and no man to stay his hand: I appeal (quoth he) unto the people. This one word in maintenance of freedom, being heard to come out of that mouth, that lately had given sentence on his side that impeached the freedom of one, and challenged the party for bond, caused silence. And when every man to himself secretly muttered in this wile: "I see well (when all is done) there are Gods in Heaven, and such Gods as neglect not the affairs of mortal men. Pride and cruelty (although it be long first) at length will surely have a fall, and thoroughly be punished. Lo, how he is now fain to appeal, who aforesome abolished and took away all appeal: he humbly craveth relief of the people, who heretofore trod under foot all rights and franchises of the people: and see how he is carried to prison, destitute and deprived of the benefit of liberty, who awarded and adjudged a free body to bandage and servitude. Amidst these words I say, that might be overheard in that confused humming of the assembly, Appius also was perceived to call unto the people of Rome for relief and mercy. He reckoned N up withal, the defects of his ancestors in the behalf of the C. W. both at home in the City, and abroad in the wars: he alleged his own unhappy affection (when time was) to the Commonalty of Rome, and partaking with them: and namely how with the exceeding displeasure of the Nobility, he resigned up his Consulship, and all for to bring in and establish equal and indifferent laws to both parties. He rehearsed moreover his own laws, which notwithstanding they remained still in force and strength, he, the law-giver himself, was going to prison. But concerning his own proper parts and defects good or bad, he would then make trial thereof (he said) when he should be permitted judicially to make his defences for the present time, he pleaded the common benefit of the City, to wit, that being a Citizen, he might at the appointed day, speak for himself: and stand to the doom of the people: neither feared he the hatred & malice of men to much O as to repose no hope at all in the equity and mercy of his neighbors and fellow Citizens. But and if he were cast into prison and not suffered to come unto his answer then he would once again call upon the Tribuns of the Commons for their help, and admonish them, not to follow and imitate them, whom they would seem to hate. And in case the Tribuns will be known and avow that they are linked in the same bond and covenant, to abolish and take away the benefit of calling unto any one of them by way of mediation, against which they have charged & blamed the Decemvirs for complotting & agreeing together: then he said, that he appealed unto the people.

Appius moveth the people in his own behalf.

A "and had recourse for succour unto the laws concerning appeal, made as well by Consuls as Tribunes, that prevent year and no longer ago. For who may ever hereafter (quoth he) have benefit of appeal, if it be not lawful for me, who stand yet not condemned, nor attained, and have not pleaded for my self? what Commoner, what mean person may find relief by those laws, if Appius Claudius may not? It will be seen in me, and my example shall be a precedent and proof to others, Whether by these new statutes, lordly rule, or equal liberty be established: whether the calling for help by way of mediation & intercession, or by plain appealing against the wrongful proceedings of Magistrates, be granted in very deed, or but only pretended in bare shew, under vain colourable pretences and foolish Letters Patents. Against all this, Virginius made his rejoinder and said, That Appius was the man alone exempt out of all benefit of laws, and excluded from all civil and humane society. "Let men but look toward the tribunal seat, they very well-head, as it were, and receptacle, the fortress and hold of all wickedness: whercon that perpetual Decemvir practising his cruelty upon the goods, the bodies and lives of free citizens, menacing whipping and executing hangmans work unto all persons: a contemner both of God and man, guarded with a crew of executioners and butcherly tormentors, rather then Sergeants, proceeding on from spoil and bloodshed to set his hart on leachery & carnal lust-plucked a maid by birth free, from out of the very arms of her father, as if he had been taken captive in war: and that, in the sight of the people of Rome, and gave her away to one of his followers, even to a groom of his bed-chamber. Where, by a cruel decree of his, and detestable sentence, adjudging C her bond, he caused the father to lay violent hands upon his own daughter: where he commanded, the elop'd Husband and Uncle of the Virgin (that took up her body half dead) to be had away to the Gaol, as being more displeased with them, for disappointing and putting him beside his purpose of abusing and spoiling her, then for the murder upon her by them committed. Adding moreover and besides, That he had built a prison, which he used to tearm, The habitation on and dwelling house of the Commons of Rome. And therefore, plead he ever and anon, and as oft as he wil, his appeal, I will not give over (quoth Virginius) but as oft rendered a judgment, and be able to prove, that he gave not sentence, and pronounced her free, but bond: but in case he wil not abide to be censured by a competent judge, then I command him to be carried to prison, as attain and convicted. Thus was he committed to ward: and as there D was none misliked of this proceeding, so every man was greatly troubled in spirit to see to great a personage punished, and the very Commons themselves thought their liberty too large & excessive. The Tribuns let him down a day (before hand) to plead for himself and make his answer.

The replication of Virginius as upon Appius.

Appius cometh mixed to prison.

Amid these affairs, there came to Rome Embassadors from the Latins and Hernicks, to congratulate, and to shew their joy and great contentment, for the unity and concord between the Nobles and the Commons: in token whereof, they brought as a present unto Jup. Opt. Max. a crown of gold, not very massive in weight, but according to their ability, which was not much, yet answerable to their devotion: which men performed rather with religion and zeal in those days, than in portly shew and magnificence. By relation and intelligence from them they were certified also that the Equians and Volscians prepared war with all the power they could make. E Whereupon, the Consuls were commanded to part their provinces between them. To Horatius bellet the Sabins, and to Valerius the Equians and Volscians. And when they had proclaimed these against these wars, such was the toward affection and favour of the Commons, that not only the younger folk, but also a great sort of these that by law were dispensed with, and discharged from warfare, and lived of their pensions, offered their voluntary service, and were ready to enter their names into the muster-Malters book: whereby the army was not only in number greater, but also for the goodnes of men, more puissant, as having the old, beate, and experienced soldiers among them. But before they went out of the City, the Decemviral laws (which now are known by the name of the twelve Tables,) they set up openly to be seen, engraven in brass. Some writers have delivered, that the Ediles performed this office, as they had it in charge F from the Tribunes. C. Cludius, who upon a detestation and deep hatred of the Decemvirs lewd and wicked enormities, but especially above all others, of the insolent pride of his brothers (on which he could no longer abide, had removed and departed to Regillum, his old native country. He being now a very aged man, returned to sine and intreat for his deliverance out of danger, whose voices he abhorred: and in fullied weed and poor array, accompanied with those of his lineage, and other his followers and vassals, went through the common place, and laboured every man one by one. "Beleeching them not to let that brand of ignominy, and bring such a stain upon the house and name of the Claudius, as that they should be thought worthy of imprisonment and prisons: nor suffer a man of most honourable quality, a singular pattern of Nobility to his posterity in time to come, the Law-maker and founder of the Roman laws, to lie in G chains among fellows, night-thieves and robbers by the high way side: but to turn away their minds a while from anger and wrath, and incline to a due regard and consideration of matters: and rather at the their earnest petitions of so many of the Claudius, to forgive them one man, than for the hatred of one man, to reject the prayers of so many suppliants. As for himself, he protested that he did this much for kindred and names sake, Neither was he re-oviled unto robins and they made friends again: yet could he wish, that his adverser fortune and poor condition were relieved, Concluding with this in the end, that as their liberty was recovered again, by virtue & prowess, so the concord of all degrees & estates might be established sure by clemency.

The Laws called the twelve Tables.

C. Claudius his petition in the behalf of Appius Claudius.

Some

Some there were whom he moved, more in regard of his own kindness and love, than in any respect of him for whom he spake. But Virginius prayed them, "To take pity and compassion rather, of him and his daughter, and to give ear to the prayers and supplications, not of the Clau- dis, who have had the day, and tyrannized over the Commons but to the neerer friends of Vir- ginius, the three Tribunes, who being created for the aid and succour of the Commons, do now themselves implore and beseech the help and assistance of the Commons. And verily these tears were thought more reasonable, and like to speed. Thus when Appius saw all means of hope cut off, before the forelaid day appointed was come, killed his own self. Soon after this, Sp. Oppius, who of all the rest next unto Appius, was most hated: for that he was in the City at the very time when this unjust doom and sentence of his Colleague hapned to be pronounced, was attacked by I. Nomentinus. But Oppius was the worse thought of and more prejudiced, by occasion of an injury by himself done, then for not stopping the wrong intended by Appius to Virginius. For a witness he proceeded to depose against him, one, who having served in the wars seven and twenty years, had been rewarded and honoured extraordinarily eight times. This valiant servitor, thus adorned with those gifts and marks of valour, in the view and sight of the people of Rome rent his garments, and shewed his back and sides, and the skin all broken with scourging: beseeching no other favour, but if Oppius the party accused, could justly charge him with any trespass and offence by him committed, he should not spare him, but now a private person as he was, exercise and redouble his cruelty upon him once again. Well, Oppius likewise was had to prison: and there before the law day, ended his life. The goods of Appius and Oppius both, the Tribunes did confis-cate. Their com-parters and fellow Decemvirs fled their country and were banished, and all their goods also were forfeit & confiscated. And not so much as M. Claudius the party that laid claim unto Virginius escaped, but he was arrested to answer at a certain day, and was condemned. Howbeit Virginius of himself released him his life, and would not take the extremity, so he was sent away and confined to: whar, as it were into banishment. Thus the poor spirit and ghost of Virginius more happy after her death, then unfortunate during her life, having wandered abroad, and haunted so many houses for due revenge of her adventures: at last, when there was not one guilty person of them left unpunished, gave over her walking, and rested quiet.

Now were the nobles, in exceeding fear, beholding the same countenance already in the Tribunes, which they had observed in the Decemvirs. But then M. Duilius, a Tribune of the Commons, liwily and politicly, restraining and keeping within a mean this excessive power of theirs: "We have enough (quoth he) both of our own liberty, and also of revenge of our enemies: and therfore I will not suffer or this year, any man more to be arrested or imprisoned. For I do not like that old faults done and past, and now as it were cancelled and rased out, should be revived again, and brought in question, since that by the punishment of the Decemvirs, satisfaction hath been made for the new and the continual care and diligence of the Consuls both to retain, for the maintenance of your freedom assure me, that nothing will be committed hereafter, that may require and need the power of the Tribunes. This moderation at the first had of the Tribunes, put the Nobles out of their fear: but made the Consuls to be thought the worse of: (for that they had been to adduced wholly to the commonalty) in that a Magistrate of the Commons had more regard of the safety and liberty of the Nobles, than the proper Magistrate of the Nobility: and because the adverse party had their trial of revenge and punishment of the Nobles, before it did appear that the Consuls would once mean to stop the course and stream of their licentiousness. And many there were who gave it out, that the Consuls bare themselves too remiss and slack in the matter, and little respected the good and credit of the Nobles, in that they had approved & confirmed the Acts that were propoled by the Tribunes. And no question, troubled as the state was then of the C. W. they were forced to give place, and do according to the necessity of the time.

When the Consuls had set all things in good order within the City, and surely grounded the state of the Commonalty, they were either of them into their own Province, Valerius against the armies of the Æquians and Volicians, which now had joined together in Algidum: where full politically he held out, and stood upon his defence only: for out of hand he had put it to the hazard of a battell, cannot tell, but I greatly doubt, considering how the hearts of Romans and enemies both, were affected presently upon the unfortunate conduct of the Decemvirs, it would have turned to their great loss and cost them an overthrow. He therefore having encamped a mile off from the enemies kept his soldiers within the camp. The enemies ranged in battell array took up the whole ground between both camps, & when they made bravado's, and challenged them to come forth and fight, not one Roman would answer them again. At length the Volicians and Æquians, weary with long standing still, and in vain expecting battell, thinking verily that the honor was in manner yielded unto them departed: some into the country of the Hernicks, other some to the territories of the Lains, for to raise booties and make spoil: leaving behind them rather a competent guard for defence of the camp, than a sufficient power to maintain a field fight. Which when the Consul perceived, he paid them again with the like measure of fear, as they before had from them received: and with his army ready embattelled, bids them battell: who being privy to themselves what forces were wanting, forbore to fight whereupon the Romans presently took a better heart unto them, and made account that their enemies were overcome being in such a fear within their rampart. When they had stood thus a whole day ready to fight, they retired back in the evening and gave place to the night. And the Romans full of good hope, refreshed their

A their bodies and made much of themselves, but the enemies nothing so hearty and courageous, send out messengers every way in fearful halt, to call again the foragers. Such as were near at hand came running back into the camp: those that were farther off, could not be found nor met withal: Now when it was once day light, the Romans issue forth of the camp, intending to give an assault upon the Rampier, unless they would come forth and fight. But when it was far forth day and the enemies stirred not at all, the Consul commanded to advance with their ensigns. The Æquians and Volicians seeing their battell coming forward, began to chafe and take foul disdain, for very shame that their rampier and trench should protect victorious armies within this camp, rather than their weapons and valour defend them in plain and open field: and were earnest likewise themselves with their Generals for the signal of battell, and at length after much im-portunity obtained it. Now were some of them flustered out at the gates already: and others followed hard after at their heels, keeping their array, and every man coming orderly into his file and rank. By which time, the Roman Coss, before the battell of the enemies flood fully furnished with their full strength, came on still and gave the onset: charged them before they were all come forth, yea, and ere they were well marshalled that came abroad, being a multitude, waving (as it were) to and fro every way for fear, and looking about themselves, and to their fellows: and to amaze their troubled heads the more, he assails them with a great shout and main violence. At first the enemies gave back: but after they had gathered their spirits together, and were come again to themselves, and that their Captains on every side rated them, and asked them whether they would yield unto them, whom before they had overcome, the fight began again to be renewed. "The Consul on the other part, willed the Romans to remember, that this was the first day, wherein they being newly let free, were to fight likewise for the freed City of Rome: to be therefore they were to win a victory for themselves, and not after victory gotten, to be a prize for any more Decemvirs to prey upon. For they fought not now under the conduct and standard of Appius, but of the Consul Valerius: who as he was defended from the deliverers of the people of Rome, so he was one of them himself: exhorting them to shew now, that in former battels of late dayes, it was long of the leaders and not of the soldiers, that they achieved no victories: saying, it were a foul shame for them, to have had more stomach against their own neighbours and citizens, than heart against their enemies: and to have flood more in fear of servitude at home, than of bondage abroad. As for Virginius, the was but one, whose honesty and chastity was in time of peace hazarded: and Appius it was only, and none but he, that in regard of his unbridled and dissolute lust, was the dangerous citizen. But if the fortune of war should fail on our side, and go against us, then shall our children all be in jeopardy, to be abused and spoiled at the hands of many thousands of enemies. Unwilling I am (quoth he) to prelude such miseries and to prognosticate to the City those calamities, which both Junius and our flock-father Mars, forbid and hinder to light upon it, founded upon to lucky signs and happy foretokens, at the first beginning: I put you in mind rather of the Aventine Hill, and Mount Sacer: that where within these few months you recovered your freedom, thither ye may carry back again your Empire, life and sound, unfeigned and unfoiled: that all the World may see that Roman soldiers are as forward and nobly minded after the banishing of the Decemvirs, as they were before their creation: and that by the bringing in of equal and indifferent Laws, the manhood and prowess of the people of Rome, is no whit decayed nor diminished. Having uttered these words among the ensigns of the footmen, he made speed to the cornets of the Horsemen. Go to, brave gallants (quoth he) excel the footmen in valour and chivalry, like as ye exceed them in honor and degree. At the very first shock and encounter, the footmen forced the enemy to retreat: and being now retired to your hands, let spurs to, gallop after them apace, and chase them out of the plain field: they will never abide your violent charge: for even already they are at a bay, and stand rather at a stay, than make any resistance. Hereupon they gird out lustily, and run their horses among the enemies, dis-ordered already, and in disarray by the service of the footmen. And having broken through their ranks, and passed forth even to the rearward: certain of them cast about in the void and open ground, and when the enemies were about on all sides to fly, they turned most of them away from their camp, and overriding them, they got between them and home, and kared them wholly from thence. The footmen and the Consul himself, with the whole strength of the main battell, made forward to the camp, assailed the tents, won them, and besides a great slaughter, obtained a booty far greater.

When news of this battel was brought, not only into the City, but also to the other army into the Sabins country, it was received in the City with joy only and solemnity: but in the camp it set the soldiers hearts on edge, and enkindled them to strive for the like honor and renown.
 G Now had Horatius already partly by lending his soldiers forth, to make incursions and outrides:
 and partly by training and proving them in light skirmishes, enured and acquainted them to trust to themselves, and have confidence in their own good service, rather than to remember the shame-full disgrace and foil, received under the leading of the Decemvirs. And even those small bickerings had done them much good already against they should venture upon a set field, and heartened them in assured hope to win the victory. The Sabins again for their part, still lusty upon their good success the year before, ceased not to provoke and urge their enemies: very oft asking them what they meant after the guise of robbers, to run in and out in small companies, so to trifle out the time, and thus by piece meal to make of one entire battel many petty and small skirmishes? H Why rather fought they not one field for all, and without more ado, hazzard all upon a cast, and commit the whole to the trial of fortune, to see unto what side the will incline. Then the Romans. Besides that of themselves they had gathered heart and courage enough, were with the indignity of this challenge also set on fire: considering, that when the other army was at the point now, with victory to return into the City, their enemies began to insult and crow over them with reproachfull taunts: and if now they were not meet and even with them, when should they ever be able to make their parts good? So soon as the Consul perceived the soldiers thus to mutter and mumble within the camp, he assembled them all together, and thus bespake: "Sirs (quoth

I) he) what incites hath been, and how the service hath sped in Algidum, I suppose you have already heard, namely, such as befetted the army of aircelate and people. By the policy of my fellow Consul, and the manhood of his soldiers together, achieved is the victory. As for my self, that consil will I take, and that resolute mind will I carry, which you my soldiers shall afford unto me. The war may be drawn out in length profitably: it may be also dispatched and ended speedily: It protracted it shall be, look how I have begun already to train you, with the same discipline still I will exercise you, and bring to pass, that your hope and prowess may encrease every day more than other. If your hearts now serve you well, and that you like to fight it out, Go on in the name of God, and in token of your willing heart and valorous prowess, now let us uphich a cry and shout, as you will make when you first join battel, and give the charge. After that they had with ex-ceeding cheeriness shouted aloud: God bleis us all (quoth he) I will fulfill your desire, and bring you forth to morrow into the field for to fight. So the rest of that day was bestowed in making their harness and weapons ready. When the morrow was come, the Sabins in soon as they perceived the Romans ranged in battel array, came forth also themselves, as ready and desirous of fight, as they. Here was a battel struck, such as might between two armies, that trusted on both sides in their own valour, and made full account of that days honour. The one eager and greedy to recover their ancient glory, wonted evermore to have the upper hand, the other proudly bearing themselves, upon a new victory lately achieved. The Sabins besides, mended their strength wel with a stratagem, for when they had equally divided their battalions every way, they reserved two thousand drawn out of the rest, extraordinary without the ranks apart. Who in the very time of the conflict, should hotly charge the left point of the Romans:
they advancing overthwart with their ensigns, & flanking them on the one side, prested shrewdly upon that one point, and overcharged it, wel neer environed all about. Then the horsemens of two legions, 600, almost in number, aught on foot from their horsebacks, and as their fellows were even now ready to retreat, rush forward with all speed to the forefront: and withal, made head against the enemy. And first, they put life unto them again, for that they entred equally with the footmen into danger and bare even part thereof: afterwards, for very shame, they gave more boldness and animated them to fight. For abashed they were, that horsemens should be put to double service in both kinds of fight, on horse and on foot: and professed footmen not able to contravert the horsemens, who had taken them to their feet. So they advance forward to the battel, which on their part was abandoned, and make haste to recover the ground which they M had lost. And in a trice, at one instant, not only the fight was renewed, but also a battalion of the Sabins began to shrink. The horsemens closely among the ranks and files of the footmen gat again to their horses, and from thence rod speedily unto the other side, reporting to their fellows the victory: and withal, sharply charged the enemies, who now were affrighted, be cause the stronger wing of their side was discomitted: neither were there any in this battel also, that were seen to perform better service then they. The Consul, as an overseer, beheld all the manner of it, praising those that stood to it manfully, and rebuking where they fought but faintly. They were not so soon chastised and reprov'd, but presently they bare themselves like hardy men, and did right good service: and look how much that praise excited some, so much shame stirred up others. Then with a fresh shout and outcry, they bent their whole force on all sides, and compelled the enemies to turn their backs: who were not able after this, to abide the violence of the Romans. The Sabins scattered here and there all over the fields, left their tents for a spoil to their enemies: where the Romans recovered again not the goods of their Allies, as before in Algidum, but their very own, which they had lost by the foraging and spoiling of their lands.

For this two-fold victory achieved in twoundry battels, the Senat right sparingly (such was their misery) decreed in the name and behalf of the Consuls, one days thanksgiving and procession and no more. But the people, the second day likewise, without order and warrant from authority, solemnized the same in great numbers. And this popular procession, disorderly as it was, and without formality, was with more good will and better affection of men celebrated, then the other. The Consul of set purpose (as it was agreed afore) came within the compass of those two O days into the City: and summoned the Senat to assemble in Mars field: where, as they were about to make some speech of their exploits and worthy acts, the chief and principal Lords of the Senat, complained and shewed themselves grieved, that the Senat was assembled on purpose, among the soldiers, to strike a terror into them. Whereupon the Consuls, because they would give no occasion of quarrel and fault-finding, called away the Senat from thence into Præa Flaminia, where now the Temple of Apollon stands, a place which even then they called Circus Apollinis:
where they being denied triumph with one voice and general consent of the nobles, L. Iulius
a Tribune

A a Tribune of the Commons, propounded unto the people, to know what they thought of the Consuls triumph. And among many that stepped forth to cross and dissuade the bill, C. Claudius above all others cried out aloud, that the Consil intended to triumph over the Nobles, and not over their enemies: and that they sought a thank by way of recompence for a private favour done to the Tribun, and not for an honorable reward, for any vertue and worthy act. For never (quoth he) aforetime, was there held any treaty of triumph before the people: but evermore it was referred to the Senat, to consider and determine of that honor. Neither had the Kings at any time, impaired the Majesty of that highest Court and degree: what should the Tribuns then meddle so much, and have their hand in all matters by vertue of their authority, as to suffer no public B council at all to remain in force? For a City can never be counted free, nor Laws equal and indifferent, but when each degree and estate retaineth still their own privilege, and hold their proper pre-eminence. When the rest of the principal Senators had spoken much to the same effect, all the Tribes notwithstanding in general, allowed by their suffrages that which the Tribun had propounded. This was the first time that ever any triumph was granted by the voices of the people, without the authority and assent of the Senators. But this victory of the Tribuns and the commonalty, had like to have turned to a dangerous surfeit of licentious liberty: by reason that the Tribuns conspired together and were fully agreed, to be choien Tribuns again: and to the end that their own ambition should be less seen above others, they alledged to the Consil, for a sufficient reason (that they likewise should continue still in place of government) the agreement and consent of C the Senators: through whose holding together and drawing in one line, the liberties of the Commons, to the great disgrace and reproach of the Consuls, were infringed and indamaged. For what would come of it, say they, if before the late Laws were fully established, the (new) Consuls with their factious banding, should set upon the new Tribuns: for we must not look to have always such as the Horatij and Valerij, to be Consuls, men that would not regard their own welfare for the freedom of the commonalty. As it hapned very well for that time, it fell to M. Duilius his lot especially, to be chief President of the Comices and Election: who like a prudent and wise man, foreseeing the heart-burning and hatred, like presently to ensue, upon the continuance of the same Magistracies still in place, said flatly, that of the old Tribuns he would not propound any one:
and when his brethren in office laboured earnestly with him, to permit the Tribes to go to a free D scrutiny or else yield up the charge to him allotted, of holding the assembly unto his brethren, who would keep the same and manage the matter, according to Law rather than to the will and pleasure of the Nobles: Duilius then, seeing their earnest contention, caused the Consuls to be called into their own putes and seats, and demanded their minds concerning the Election of the Consuls:
and when they answered that they would create new, he having once got them to be the authors of a popular sentence, and not popular themselves, went forth together with them into the assembly of the people. Now when the Consuls were brought out into their presence, and were asked the question, what they would do, in case the people of Rome should elect them Consuls the second time and that, in remembrance of their liberty received and recovered by their means, and for their good service in war, and worthy acts by them performed: he finding them constant in the E same mind still, and nothing altered from their resolution: after he had commended the Consuls, for their steadfast perseverance unto the last (as altogether unlike to the Decemvirs) went presently to the new Election. And when he had created five Tribuns only, seeing there were no other competitors enough to reach unto sufficient voices of the Tribes, in comparison of the other nine Tribuns his colleagues, who openly stood to be choien again: he brake up the assembly, and from that time forward called no more about any Election. For he said, That he had fulfilled the Law in that behalf, which without setting down any precise and definite number of Tribuns, so that there were some left behind, and rooms void, gave authority to those that were created, to chuse and take unto them more colleagues, to make up the number. And therewith he recited the words of the Law, which run in this form. If I shall propound ten Tribuns of the Commons to be F created, and they (shall) that present day make fewer than ten: they by vertue of this Law, shall be accounted Tribuns, whom those elected shall cause and take unto them for their fellows, and as lawful (shall they be held, as those whom this day ye shall create Tribuns of the Commons. Thus when Duilius persisted still resolute unto the end, saying, That in any case the state might bear five and twenty Tribuns, and having thus conquered the greedy ambition of his colleagues: with great favour and the good liking as well of the Nobility as the Commonalty, he gave up his room. The new Tribuns now in the electing and making choise of their companions, carried favour with the Senators, and framed themselves to their will and pleasure, in chusing to them two of the Nobility, and those that had been Consuls, to wit, Sp. Tarpeius and An. Aternus. And Consuls there were created, Sp. Herminius and Titus Virginius Calpurnianus. Who bearing themselves in a mean be-G tween Commons and Nobles, and not greatly inclining to one side or other, had peace as well at home as abroad. Lu. Trebonius a Tribune of the Commons, being highly offended with the Senators, and spitefully bent against them, and saying withal, that in the coooperation of the rest of the Tribuns, he had been cunningly over-raught by them, and betrayed by his colleagues, propoed a Law. That whosoever hereafter propounded unto the Commons any Tribuns to be elected, should not give over; but still propound, until he made up the full number of ten. Thus continued he all his Tribune ship in persecuting and molesting the Nobles, never letting them to be quiet:
whereupon he was surnamed Asper.

After this, M. Geganius Macrinus, and C. Julius, being created Consuls, appeal'd the contentions. Orations of the Tribuns, which were begun and raised against the young Gentlemen of the Nobility, so as without any bitter invectives against the authority of the Tribuns, they preserved still the sovereign Majesty of the Nobles: and by means of deceiving mutters against the wars of the Volkians and Æquians, stayed the Commons, and kept the City from all sedition and discord: saying, That by civil unity, all would be at quiet abroad: whereas through discord of citizens, foreigners took heart. The care likewise of outward peace, was the cause of inward and intestine concord. But evermore the one state disquieted the moderation of the other: for whilst the Commons were still and in good temper, the pious Senators began to offer them wrong and hard measure. And when the Tribuns would have assisted the weaker side, at first it booted little: and small good they did: but afterwards they themselves escaped not without abuse and hurt: and especially in their latter months, when as they received injuries, both by reason of the meetings and packing together of the mightier sort, and also for that toward the end of the year, the edge and vigor commonly of all authority waxeth dull and groweth feeble and weak. So that now the Commons had little or no confidence at all in the Tribunship, unless they might have such as Scellus to be Tribuns: and as for these two years last past, they had them but in bare name, and not to any effect and purpose. The elders and ancient fathers of the Senate on the other side, as they believed verily that their youth were too forward and lusty: for they were of this mind, That if there needs must be trepals and excess, they had rather those of their own degree and coat should exceed measure, and have greater stomach, than their adversaries. So ticklish and dangerous a thing it is to keep a mean in maintenance of liberty: whilst under a colour of wishing and desiring equality, every man advanceth and lifteth up himself so, as that he thrusteth and beareth down another: and in pretending a care and regard that men should not stand in awe and fear of them, they make themselves dread and fearful to others, and so the wrong that we put off and turn from our selves, we impose upon others. As if there were no remedy, but that we must either do, or suffer injury.

Then were made Consuls, T. Quintus Capitolinus the fourth time, and Agrippa Furius: who found neither sedition within, nor war without. But yet both the one and the other was near at hand. For now could no longer the dissention of the citizens be held in, but needs it must break out. And both Tribuns and Commons rose against the Nobles. For in all the assemblies and meetings of the people, one or other ways of the Nobles and Senators were served with proceeds: whereupon grew fresh troubles and new contentions. At the first noise whereof, as if the signal of battle had been given, and the alarm stricken upon the Æquians and Volkians took arms: and withal, their Leaders and Captains (such as gaped greedily after spoil and pillage) had born them in hand and persuaded them to believe, That for these two years past, they could not go through with their mutters proclaimed: for that the Commons refused to obey, and brake their allegiance: which was the only cause that there were no forces sent out against them. Besides say they, The life and manner of their warfare, is now with their licentious looseness, discontinued and clean decayed: Rome was now no more a common-wealth and country to her citizens: For all their anger, quarrels and malice, that they bare aforetime against foreign nations, was now turned upon their own selves: so that at this time they had fit occasion and good opportunity to surprize them, blinded as wolves with mutual rage and fury one against another. Hereupon they joined their whole power, and first wasted the country of Latinum: and afterwards seeing none to encounter them and make defence (to the exceeding joy of those that were the authors of this war) they came foraging and spoiling all the way to the very walls of Rome, even before the gate Esquilina, there braving and vaunting in reproachful and scornful terms before the whole City, telling them how they had laid their fields and territories waste, from whence they retired themselves without revenge and loss, driving their booties afore them, and marched along to Carbia. Quintus the Consul seeing this, assembled the people, and there (as I have heard) he made to them a speech in this wise, "Albeit I am not privy to my self, and my confidence accuseth me not of any fault. O Quirites, yet am I exceedingly abashed and ashamed to come forth into this assembly of voices: that every you should know, or the posterity hereafter understand, how the Æquians and Volkians (who of late dayes were hardly comparable to the Hernicks) came when T. Quintus was the fourth time Consul, in warlike manner with banner displayed to the walls of the City of Rome: and went their ways again clear and without any hurt by them received. This shamefull dishonour, if I had known it, would have lighted so just in this year (and yet for this good while the world hath to grieve, and such hath been the course of our life and conversation, that my mind ever gave me there was no goodneis toward) I would have avoided this place of dignity, either by banishment or death, if there had been no other way to escape it. And might indeed have Rome been taken in the time of my Consulship, if those weapons which were under our gates had been in the hands of valorous men? Then had I indeed enjoyed sufficient honor already, then had I lived long enough, and a little too long, and might have dyed well when I was but the third time Consul. But who were they? I pray you, whom these most base and cowardly enemies of ours despised and set so lightly by? Were they that are your Consuls, or you Quirites the people of Rome? If we were in the fault, let us over as unprofitable and unworthy persons our rule and government, and if that be not enough, let us over and besides be unpunished and abide the fault. But if the blame be in you Quirites, let neither God nor man chastise your trepals and offence, only do you repent your

A "your selves, and be fery therefore. It was not your cowardie that they scorned and despised, neither was it their own valour wherein they trusted. For why? they having been so often defeated, and driven out of the camp and the field, lined with forfeiture of Lands, forced to go under the gallows, and brought into servitude, knew very well both themselves and you also. No, no, the variance and discord between our own states and degrees, is the only bane, and nothing else, of this City: the jarrs and debates, I say, between the Nobles and the Commons. Whiles neither we have any gage or stay of rule and command, nor you know mean of freedom and liberty: while you are weary of Noble men rulers, and we likewise of the Commoners Magistrates, they have gotten heart, and wax bold. Now, (Gods will) what mean you to do, and what would you have? Tribuns of the Commons ye longed and sought after: for quietness and concord sake, we let you have your longing. Decemvirs you had a great misot, and them you desired: we granted and permitted them to be created. Weary you were anon, and all too weary of Decemvirs: we forced them to forgo their office. And when your anger continued still against them, being become private persons again, we suffered to be put to death, and to be exiled, notwithstanding noble and right honorable men. When you would needs elect anew your Tribuns of the Commons, you chose them at your pleasure. To create Consuls from out of your own faction, although we knew it hurtful and prejudicial to the Nobles, yet have we seen that dignity proper to Nobility given away as it were, and made common with the Commonality. The affliction of Tribuns, the appealing to the people, the Laws and Acts denied by the Commons, to be rendered and imposed upon the Nobles, to bind them thereto: and that, under the pretence and colour of Isomni, or equal and indifferent Laws, our own rights and priviledges should be overthrown, we have abidden, and do still endure. When will there be an end of discord and dissention? Shall we never have one City of it? Shall we never have this to be the common Country of us all? We can be content much better to be at quiet, when we are vanquished, than whiles we are victors. And is it not enough for you, that you are dread and feared of us? but still you seek for more? Against us it was, that you took the Mount Aventine, against us it was that you held and kept the Mount Sacer. For when the gate Esquilina, was well-near surprized by the enemy and when the Volkians our enemies were ready to climb our trench and banks, and to scale our walls, none of you there was to be seen, for to remove and let them further off. Against us ye play the men against us ye can be armed. Well then go to: When ye have here beset the Senate-house, taken up the market place and common Hall with soldiers, filled the goal with Noblemen, and those of the chiefest and best quality, then with like courage and stoutneis of heart rally forth of the gate Esquilina. Or if you dare not venture so much behold and view all afore you from the walls discover your Lands and territories with fire and sword wasted & consumed, your goods and cattle had and driven away as booties and prizes, your farms and houses burning and smoking in every quarter. But all this time the Commonweal only (you think) by this means is in worse plight and poorer case, the villages fired the City besieged, and the enemy goeth his way with the honor of the war. And in what taking, I pray you, is your own private estate the while? Tidings will come anon to every man particularly from out of his own livings and possessions, of his proper losses: and what have you at home (if a man may ask) to make supply again? Will the Tribuns make you restitution, and amends for all your damages? You shall have words of them your fill. They will not flack, to speak to rail, and let fly slanders freely before you against the heads of the City. Laws upon Laws you shall have heaped thick and threefold. Assemblies, convocations, and tedious invectives good store. But from their and their assemblies, never came there any of you home to his house, richer of one gray goat or single denier nor in better fare to live than before. Was there ever any one carried ought from thence to his wife & children, but hatred and malice, displeasure and rancour, grudges and heart-burnings, both publick and private? From which at all times ye have been shielded and defended if not with your own vertue and innocency, yet by the help and aid of others. But certainly, when ye served in wars under the conduct of your Consuls, and followed not the leading of your Tribuns: when you served I say in camp, and not in the Hall and common place: when in battle your enemies quaked to hear you shout, and not in your assemblies the Romans were in dread of your us and outcries: then you van prizes, and conquered Lands from your enemies, then you returned home with triumph to your houses, full of riches and wealth full of honor and renown as well publick as private. Whereas now, you suffer your enemies to depart, freight and laden with your goods. Stick to your Ward-lects, as if you were nailed and fast pinned to them: dwell still in your Hall, and lead your lives continually there: yet must you needs war when all is done, fly from it as fast as you can. Grieved it you indeed, and thought you it a trouble and painful thing, to take an expedition so far as into the Volkians and Æquians country? Lo, the war is come even unto your gates: if it be not put from thence, it will anon be within the walls, it will take the Castle and Capitol: it will follow you, even into your houses. Two years ago, the Senate gave order and commanded that there should be soldiers mustered and an army conducted into Agrium. But we sit still at home & do nothing, but chide & scold (as it were) one at another like churl and threw words contending out selves, and joying in a present peace, and little fearing that of that rest: there will come sundry wars again, and that right shortly. I know full well, there are speeches more pleasing & plausible than these. But to speak the plain truth for your good rather than to flatter and soothe for your pleasure, if mine own nature and disposition did not reach and "admonish me, even very needfully doth force and constrain me. Willing would I be, and most willingly O Quirites; to please you: but much more would I have you to be in safety, think whatsoever ye will of me, It falleth out commonly, as a thing that cometh by kind, that who is speaketh to a multitude in his own cause, and for himself, is better liked, and heard with more applause, than he whose mind aimeth at nothing else but a publick weal, unless peradventure you think these common flatterers, these clackbaws, and men-pleasers, which give you no rest, neither in war nor peace, do stir you up and provoke you for your good. But will you have the truth? ye being once solicited and pricked on by them, serve their turns in good stead, either for their honor or gain. And because they fee themselves to be of no worth and regard, while the states do agree, they desire to play ill-mage, rather than to sit out: to be Captains of mil-lity and lewdness, rather than of nothing: and in one word, to be the heads, the ringleaders, and guides of troubles and diffentions. Whereof, if you be to be blest and happy, as to be weary now at length, and will betake you selves to the ancient manners and fashions, both of your own, and of your ancestors, in lieu of these new fangles, I will refuse no punishment: nay, let me be put to the most shameful death that is, if I do not before many dayes pass over my head, defeat, discomfit and put to flight these robbers and destroyers of our fields, and fend them packing out of their own camp, and finally translate and remove this terror of war, wherewith ye now are so affrighted and astonished, from our gates and walls, even unto their own Towns and Cities.

 Seldom at any time else had there been a speech delivered by a popular Tribune, more acceptable unto the Commons, than was the sharp Oration at this present of a most fervent Consul, Yea, and the very youth, which amid such terrors of war, had been wont to refuse soldiery, the only keen and sharp weapon they had to fight withal against the Nobles, now desired war and to be in armies. Over and besides, the country kerns that fled (to Rome,) such also as were spoiled and wounded in the villages about, reported more foul and cruel outrages in their ears, than were presented unto their eyes, and set all the City in an hot and angry broil. Now when the Senators were assembled together in the Councell Houle, then verily they all cast their eyes upon Quintus, beholding and regarding him well, as the only patron and maintainer of the Majesty of Rome: but the chief peers and Lords of the Senate spake out and said: That he had made an Oration, be-seeming the soveraign Government of a Confull, beeming so many Confullships by him already born, beeming the whole course of his life, that had passed off through many honorable digni-ties, and yet always deserved more. As for other Consuls, they either in flattering and soothing up the Commons, had betrayed the dignity of the Nobles: or else in seeking by hard courses to maintain the rights, prehemincies and royalties of their state, and to tame the multitude, have thereby made them more fell and untractable. But T. Quintus, he hath made a speech, respective and tending, as well to the royal dignity of the Nobles, as to the concord and unity of the States, and principally regarding the condition of the times. They would request him therefore, together with his brother Consul, to take in hand the care of the Common-weal. They would request the Tribuns likewise, to joyne in one accord with the Consuls, and fiew themselves willing and forward to have the war kept off and put back from their City walls: and in so fearful and dangerous a case, to reclaim their Commons to their due obedience to their Nobles: saying moreover, That the native Country, the common mother of them all, calleth unto the Tribuns and craveth their aid, now that the territories are waisted, and the City at hand to be assaulted. Whereupon, they all agreed generally to decree a mulier, and presently to make a levy of soldiers. And when the Consuls had pronounced before the whole people then and there assembled, that it was no time as then to hear excuses, but that all the younger sort, should betimes the next morning by day-light, be ready to attend in Mars field: and that after the war was ended, they would find out and appoint a time, to enquire into their allegations and reasons, that entred not their names:
 and that he should be taken for a traitor and rebel, whose excuse they allowed not: the whole manhood and youth of the City shewed themselves the morrow after in readines. Each cohort or regiment choise their Centurions or Captains, and every Regiment had two Senators for their Provost Marshalls. All this was performed (by report) with such speed and expedition, that on the very same day, the standards and ensigns were by the Questors had forth of the Armory and Chamber of the City and brought into Mars field: and by the fourth hour (or ten a clock) the same day, set forward and advanced out of the field. And this new army, with a few bands of old soldiers, who willingly of their own accord followed them, marched on and rested, at ten miles end. The day following they discovered their enemies, and at Caio encamped close unto them.
 And by the third day, there was no stay on both hands, but they must needs encounter and fight.
 For why? The Romans for anger were sharper: the enemies again, upon a guilty conscience that they had so often rebelled, were grown desperate. Now, whereas in the Roman army the two Consuls were in equal commission, yet gave Agrippa place unto his brother Quintus, and yecded unto him the entire and absolute command. A course most profitable in the managing and execution of great affairs. And being thus preferred, he again in courteously answered and requited the others Gentleness and inclination to submission, in this wise, by implying unto him all his Counsels: by parting with him all his honor and praise, and by making him his equal, who was indeed his inferior and underling. In the battell, Quintus commanded the right point, Agrippa led the left: Sp. Postumius Albus, the Lieutenant General, had the conduct of the main battell. And P. Sulpicius the other Lieutenant, they set over the horsemen, The footmen

A men of the right point fought most valiantly, and the Volscians received them with equal valour, Sp. Sulpicius with his men of arms, brake through the main battell of the enemies: & albeit he might have retired himself the same way again unto his company, before that the enemies could bring their ranks again into order, that were dismayed: yet he thought it better to charge them upon their backs. And in one moment he had discomfited and quite defeated his enemies, by assailing them behind, and thus affrighting them on both sides, but that the Volscian and Aequian Horsemen recharged him, held him play in his own fight, and so kept him occupied a good while.
 Thereat, Sulpicius said, it was no time now to linger and to drive off, but to bettle themselves, "crying out aloud, that they were environed round, enclosed within their enemies, and excluded from their own fellows, unless they let to, and bent their whole force, quickly to dispatch the B Horie-fight: and that it would not serve, to put the Horsemen to flight and save their lives: but kill both horse and man, that none might ride back again from them, into the battell to renew the fight. And to make head and resist, against him and his horsemen, they were never able, "since that the main thick battell of footmen had given him ground already. Good ear they gave to his words, and soon harkened to his direction: and with one entire assault they gave a letcharge, and defeated the whole power of the Cavalry, unhorsed and dismounted a number of them, and with their javlins goared both them and their hories. And there's an end of the horie-service. Then they set upon the battell of the footmen and dispatched messengers unto the Comits with news, what they had done: where also by that time, the battell of the enemies began to C shrink. And when tidings came unto the Romans that were already upon the point of victory, they verily were more encouraged: but the Aequians that were about to retreat, were stricken with greater fear. In the main battell first began the overthrow; namely, whereas the men of arms before had broken the array. After them, the left point also began to be distressed and driven back, by Quintus the Consul. But in the right there was hardest hold, and most ado. Where, Agrippa being a tall man of his hands and young withal, seeing in every part of the battell things go better than where he was: caught the ensigns from the ensign-bearers, advanced them forward his own self, yea, and fell to flinging some of them against the thickest of his enemies. For fear therefore of so shameful a disgrace, the soldiers better themselves, and freshly assailed the enemy.
 And to on all hands alike, they achieved the victory and won the field. Then came a messenger
 D from Quintus: & brought word that he had the better hand and was now ready to give an assault upon the camp, but would not break in, and enter therein before he knew for certain, that they in the left point also had gotten the upper hand, and made an end of the battell. In case therefore he had discomfited the enemy, he should joyne his forces to him, that the whole army altogether might gain the spoil and pillage of the tents. So Agrippa, who also for his part was victor, came to his brother Consul and the camp of the enemies, and met with mutual congratulation on the other. There, finding but a few to defend, whom they discomfited in the turning of an hand, they brake into the rampier and munitions, without conflict or skirmish: and so besides the recovery of their own goods again, which they had lost by the overrunning of the country, they gained also a rich booty, and retired back with their whole army. I cannot learn, that either they themselves E required triumph, or the Senate offered them any: and no cause appeareth upon record, why they should either refuse or not hope for that honor. For mine own part, so far as I can guess in so long distance of times, seeing that Valerius and Horatius, who over and besides the conquest of the Vol-scians and the Aequians, had the honor also of dispatching and finishing the Sabines war, were demied triumph at the Senate hand: these Consuls might not with modesty, sue for the same: having performed but half the good service of the others: lest if they had gotten it granted, there might have seemed more regard had of the persons, than of the deeds.

But this noble and honourable victory over the enemies abroad, thus achieved, was obcu-red and souly disdayned with a shameful doom of the people, in a controversy of their allies, about the bounds and meers of certain Lands. The inhabitants of Aricia and Ardea, having F warred oftentimes one with the other, about some Lands in question between them, and by giving and taking sundry soils and overthrowes outwearied, chose the people of Rome their Umpire to decide and determine this quarrel. And when they were come with their counsel to plead the case, the Magistrates granted a Court of Allies of the people. Where was much arguing and dispute on both sides before them: and after the witnesses were depoid and that at length the Tribes should be called to the sentence, and the people give their voices, there steps forth an old father, one P. Scapianus, a Commoner. And I quote he for my part. O Consuls, if it be lawful to speak for the good of the State, will not suffer the people to erre, and be deceived in this que-sition. When as the Consuls denied him audience, as being an old fool, and of no credit: and commanded him (as he cryed till that the publick cause of the City was betrayed) to be had G away. he calleth for the assistance of the Tribuns. The Tribuns then, who lightly are ever overruled by the multitude, rather than able to rule them, yielded unto the Commons: that for as much as they were desirous to hear what the old man could say, Scapianus should speak his mind at large. Then setteth he the tale on end, and beginneth thus: I am (quoth he) fourscore winters old and three on the head of it: and even upon that very ground for which all this strife and variance is lierved as a soldier, when I was no young man neither, but one that had been prest to wars, and received pay twenty years afore. And it was, I remember well, during the Siege before Corioli. Hither am I now come, to give evidence of a thing by long continuance of time,
 "worn

"worn out clean and forgotten of other men, but fresh in my knowledge and remembrance: to
 "wiz, that the Lands thus litigious, and in controversy, had been sometime within the confines
 "of the Corielans: and after the winning of Corioli, were seized by right of conquest, to the Com"mons of the people of Rome. I marvel much therefore, by what custom and prescription, the "Ardeates and Aricines, who never had right and interest, and were not possessed of the land,
 " (so long as Corioli stood in prosperity) should hope to defeat the people of Rome thereof, whom "being the LL. in fee of the ground, they had chosen for their Arbitrator. As for me, I have
 "but a small while to live, and one foot already is in grave: and yet I cannot find in my heart, but
 " (to that Land, which as old, I being a young and lusty souldier, did my best to fight for, and
 "conquered with [word in hand] make claim now that I am aged, by word and mouth, the only I
 "means left me to recover it. I advise the people therefore in good sadness, that in a vain respect "of bootless modesty, they condemn not their own cause, nor give away their right. The Consuls "marking well what audience was given to Scipius, and that he was heard not only with sil-
 "lence, but also with good liking and contentment, cryed out upon this abominable practise: cal"ling both Heaven and Earth to witness, and therewith feat for the Lords of the Council: and "joining with them, went to the Tribuns, fell in hand with them, and instantly besought them
 "not to go forward with this most lewd action for the present, and a more shameful precedent
 "for the time to come: namely, that Umpires and dayes men, should convert the thing in suit
 "unto their own and proper vantage: especially considering, that, Admit it were a lawful thing
 "for a judge himself to have an eye and regard to his own commodity: yet would there not be "so much gained and gotten by coming thus between, and interverting the Land, as there would "be damage and hinderance another way, in alienating by those hard courses, the hearts of their "good friends and Allies. For the losses (verily) and cracks of name and credit, are such as may "not be valued at any price. And should the Embassadors indeed, say they go their wayes home
 "with this goodly award: and make report abroad how they have sped? should our confederates
 "hear this? should our enemies come by the knowledge thereof? with what grief the one? with "what joy the other? Think ye that our neighbour nations will impute, attribute, and ascribe
 "this, unto the speech made by Scipius, a prating old busy body, and one that loveth to hear "himself speak in assemblies? Nay, this is certain: well may Scipius be famous and much talked
 "of in the playing of this pageant: but the people of Rome shall incur the obloquy, to have acted
 "the part under the vilsour of Scipius, of a cunning promoter, and a false interpreter to himself,
 "of other mens right in suit. For, what judge at any time in a private matter, hath done the like,
 "as to award the thing in question, unto himself? Why, even Scipius, past all shame and grace
 "as he is, would never have done it. These and such like words, spake both Consuls and Senators
 "aloud in all their hearing. But the covetousness of men, and Scipius that first let them a longing
 "and their teeth a watering, prevailed more than they all. The Tribes were called to the Scrutiny
 "of their voyces, and gave judgment, That the Lands pertained to the common Territory of the "people of Rome. Neither can it be denied, but it would have lo appeared indeed, in case it had "been tried before other judges. But now, for all the goodness of the cause, is not the ignominy
 "of the arbitrement one jot the less: Nay, the Aricines and Ardeates themselves, thought not M "more shamefully and hardly of it, than the very Senators and Peers of Rome. The rest of the year
 "continued quiet, from all troubles as well domestical as forraign.

The Fourth Book

Of the Histories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the fourth Book,

THe Law concerning marriage between the Nobles and the Commons, was proposed, and with much ado enacted by the Tribuns of the Commonalty: notwithstanding, the Nobles withstood it. Tribuns military with full authority of Consuls, were created. Under this kind of Magistracy was the Statute for certain years, both in City and in war. The Limits of the Ardeates, which had been awarded from them by an arbitrement of the people of Rome, were referred again unto them, and Colours sent to im-buh the time. In the time of a great dearth and famine in Rome, one Sp. Melius, a Roman Knight, dealt corn among the people freely, at his own proper charges: by which deed he won the favour of the Commons: and thereby aspiring to be King, was at the commandment of Quintus Cincinnatus, the Dictator, slain by the hands of C. Servilius Hala, General of the Horsemen. L. Minutius, who disclosed the treason, had a bullock with yolk horns given him for a reward. The Embassadors of the Romans, which were murdered by the Fidenates, had their Statues or Images erected at the Rostra, or the common Cross of the City, because they died in the service of the Common-wealth. Cornelius Cossus a Colonel, having slain with his own hand Tolomius, the King of the Veintians, was and bare away the second

A second royal spoils, Mamercus Aemilius the Dictator, limited the Government of the Consuleship, within the compass of one year and six months, which before that time continued five years: and for that act, with thankfulness, approved by the Consuls. Fidenae was conquered and subdued, and thither were Colours sent to dwell. When the men of Fidenae flew, and revolted from the people of Rome: and by Mamercus Aemilius the Dictator were subdued, and the City forced, The conspiracy of the banditti was suppressed.
 Posthumus a Tribune military, was for his cruelty slain by his own souldiers. The souldiers then first, and sever before, had their pay out of the common treasury. Moreover, this book containeth the wars against the Volscians and Veintians, the Fidenates and Falisci.

The fourth Book of T. Livius.

Here succeeded Consuls after these, M. Gentius and P. Curiatius. A year full of broils, both at home and abroad. For in the beginning of the year, both Curiatius, a Tribune of the Commons, proposed a law, concerning alliance of the Patricians with Commons, by way of marriage. Whereby the Nobles supposed their blood to be stayed, and the Rights and Privileges of Families and Houses confounded. Also, whereas at first the Tribuns by little and little had moved, That one of the Consuls might be created out of the Commons: now the matter proceeded so far, that often Tribuns that then were, the other nine propounded this in plain terms for a law. That it might be in the peoples power to chuse both the Coss, (if they would) either out of Commons or Nobility. Mary, if that should come to pass, the Nobles thought indeed that the sovereign rule and authority, was not only made common with the basest sort, but also translated altogether from the great men and best of the City, to the commonalty. Glad were the Senators therefore to hear say, that the people of Ardea, for the wrongfull awarding away of their Lands from them, were revolted: and that the Veintians had walled the Frontiers of the Romans: and that the Volscians and Aequians grugged and muttered for the fortifying of Verulus: So much preferred they any war, miserable though it were and dangerous, before a shameful and dishonourable peace. Having heard therefore these news, and taken them in the worst manner: to the end that amidst the rumour and bruit of many wars, the Tribunician troublesome suits might fly and be dead for the time: they commanded multitudes of soldiers, souldiers to be levied, all furniture of war, and all manner of force to be prepared, and (it might be) with more endeavour, than it had been when T. Quintus was Consul. Then C. Curiatius, after some hot words which he spake aloud in the Senate; namely, that the Commons by fighting the Commons, went about but in vain, to avert them from the regard of their new Laws: and that so long as he had any breath in his body, they should never go through with multier, unless the Commons had first ratified those things, which by him and his brethren had been propounded: forth with assembled the people together. Thus at one instant the Consuls animated the Senate against the Tribune, and the Tribune incited the people against the Consuls. "The Consuls gave it out plainly and said, that no longer now might their furious "courses of the Tribuns be endured. Now were they come to the very height and extremity, "and raised more war in effect, at home, than the enemies abroad. Which thing (no doubt)
 "happened not so much through the fault of the Commons, as of the Nobles, nor of the Tribuns "more, than of the Consuls. For look what thing was he rewarded in a City, the same always "most increased: thus men in peace (we see) prove excellent, thus in war they come to be singu"lar. In Rome (say they) seditions riped ever best, and have been reputed both to each one in par"ticular and to all ingeneral most honourable. But let the Senate call to mind the dignity which "they themselves had received from their fathers, and compare it with that which they were like
 "to leave to their children: and see, whether they may boast as the commonalty doth, how that "their condition is much bettered and more glorious than before. Well, neither is there any end
 "now, nor ever will be, so long as the Authors of seditions be as highly advanced, as the sediti-
 "ous themselves are prosperous and fortunate. See what matters and how great hath Curiatius "attempted! He would bring in a commixture or rather confusion of kindreds and houses, a "perturbation in the managing both of publick and private affairs: that nothing might be sin"cere and intire, nothing pure and undesfiled: that all difference and distinction being taken away,
 "no man might know either himself or his. For what thing else do these mixtures of Rates and "degrees by marriages draw after them, without all order and discretion: but that like brut beasts
 "in a manner, Commons and Nobles may go and couple together? so that the children between "them both, shall not be able to tell of what blood he is descended, and to what Religion he doth
 "belong, being a mingled as it were, the one half a Noble, the other a Commoner; and not well
 "G distinguishing and according with himself? They thought it not enough (be like) that all divine and "humane Laws, were confuted and shuffled together: for now these mutinous persons, these busy
 "heads and troublemers of the common people, address themselves to shoot at the Consuleship. At "first, they foundred in private speeches and secret discourses, only how to compass. That one of "the Consuls might be created out of the body of the Commons: but now they go roundly to "work and carry it before them: they are so bold to prefer laws (forsooth) that the people might "make them both either Nobles or Commons at their good pleasure. Whereby (no doubt) they "were to make choice from out of the Commons, of the most seditious persons of all other.

 tions of the Con-

"We shall have then the Camuleus and Scilians to be our Coss. But Jupiter (that great good God) forbid, that ever the Royal and Imperial Majesty, should come to that low ebb or desperate pass: dye they would a thousand deaths rather, than suffer to great a shame and indignity: knowing this assuredly, that their ancestors also, if they had once suspected or foreseen, that by granting the commonalty every thing as they desired, they would not have proved more lovely and cheerful towards them, but rather more churlish and untractable: and when they had obtained their first suits, to proceed still to demand worse and worse, one thing after another: they would sooner have endured at the first, any contending and debate whatsoever, than suffered those hard conditions to be imposed, and put upon them: and because they had once relented, that Tribuns should be created, therefore to grant them again the second time. So that as now, there is no quietness with them, nor end of quarrels will be none, so long as in one and the self same City, Tribuns and Senators remain together. Nay verily, either this state must be put down, or that office utterly abolished. And better late than never, to withstand and meet with their rash and desperate boldness. What? shall they without controlment, first sow discord at home, and then stir up foreign wars abroad? and afterwards, against those wars which themselves have raised, debar and hinder the City, for to take arms and defend it self? and when as they have as good as sent for the enemies to come to their doors then, not suffer an army to be levied against them. But let Camuleus (if he dare) speak these words out in the Senate, That unless the Nobles suffer his laws, as if he were a Conqueror, to be admitted and received, he will stay the multering? For what else is that, but to threaten that he will sell and betray his country, and suffer it to be abused and lost? What encouragement will such a word give as that, I say not to the commonalty of Rome, but to the Volsians, Equians and Veientians? Will not they hope, under the conduct of Camuleus, to be able to scale the Capitol and the Castle, to be the Tribuns shall take from the Nobility their courageous hearts, as they have bereaved them already of their right, their honor and dignity? Let him know therefore, that the Consuls are ready, first to shew themselves to be Captains and Leaders, against the malicious praises of their own citizens, before they will make head against the armed forces of their enemies? Whiles these matters were debated with great contention and heat in the Senate house, Camuleus for the maintenance of his laws, and to cross the Consuls, made this Oration unto the people. How greatly the Nobles have defiled you, O Quirites, how unworthy I see they have ever thought you, to live among them within the walls of one City, me thinks I have, as often herebefore, to now especially and most of all perceived: in that they have risen up altogether to fly, to check and withstand our propoed laws. "Wherein, what pretend we else, but to tell them and put them in mind, That we are, as well as they, citizens: and although we are not of the same wealth, yet we inhabit the same country with them? In the one, we request marriage: a thing to borderers, yea, and to foreign nations usually granted: and to speak of our selves, we also have afforded even to our conquered enemies, the benefit of our City, which is far more than marriage. In the other, we move no new matter, but only claim again and challenge that, which is the peoples right, to wit, that the people of Rome may bestow their offices and dignities, upon whom they please. What reason have they then, I pray you, to set all on an uproar, as if Heaven and Earth should go together? and what is the cause, that erewhile I had like to have had violence offered unto me in the Senate? What moved them to break out and say, they could not forbear nor keep their hands from me, and threaten to abuse and violate the sacred authority of the Tribuns? Set safe that the people of Rome may have their free voices and suffrages, to elect the Consuls whom they will, and that no Commoner be denied, to be worthy of the highest place, for to obtain the foreign dignity. How then? cannot this City possibly stand any longer? and is our Empire come to an end for ever? And all one it is (be like) and importeth as much, to disable a Commoner, for being made Consul as if a man inferred, that a bondman or a freed libertine should become Consul. Perceive you not yet (my Masters) in what contempt you live? They would, if they might, bereave you in some measure of this day light: that ye breath and speak, that ye have the shapes of men, they think much, they repine, and it goes to their heart. And what else? They give it out flatly and say (if God will) it is unlawful, that a Commoner should be a Consul. I beseech you hear me a little. If we may not be allowed to read the Chronicles, nor to peruse the High-priests records and registers, know we not those things then, that even all strangers know? namely, That Consuls entered in place of Kings, and succeeded them, and have no other right, prebeminence or dignity at all, than Kings had before? Think ye that men have never heard, that Numa Pompilius, a man not much as a citizen of Rome, much less than a Patrician and Nobly descended among them, was sent for out of the Sabines country, and by the peoples voices, and the assent of the Nobles, created King of Rome also. afterwards, how L. Tarquinus, who was no Roman born, nor, yet so far off as much as an Italian, but the son of Demetrius the Corinthian, a stranger inhabitant at Tarquinius, and from thence removing, albeit King Anco his sons were living, attained likewise to the crown? Moreover, how Servius Tullius after him, the son of a captive woman of Corniculum, whose father was unknown, whose mother a bondswoman, through wit and virtue, obtained and held the Kingdom? For what should I speak of T. Tatius the Sabine, whom Romulus himself the father and founder of this City, admitted to reign together with him? Well, so long as no stock was disdained, no race rejected, wherein appeared sparks of virtue, the Romans Em-

The Oration of Camuleus to the Commoners, against the Nobility.

A "pire became mighty, and flourished. Scorn ye then at this day, a Consul out of the Commonalty, when our forefathers depicted not Kings that were aliens and strangers? No, nor when the Kings were expelled, was this City denied and shut against foreigners, that were valorous, and men of action. The kindred and whole name (I am sure) of the Claudii, after the Kings were exiled, we not only admitted into our City, from out of the Sabins, but also received into the number of the Patricians and Noble men. And may a meer forrainer indeed become a Nobleman, and so a Consul? And shall a Citizen of Rome, if he be of the Commonalty, be wholly disabled and out of hope for ever of being Consul? Tell me I pray you, Think ye it not possible, that a valiant and hardy man, approved both in war and peace, being one of the Commons, may prove like to Numa, L. Tarquinus, or Servius Tullius? and if he do, whether shall we suffer him to govern the Common-wealth, or no? And whether will ye have our Consuls, such rather as the Decemvirs (the most wicked and wicked persons under the sun, who, by your leave, were at that time of the Nobility) than strangers and new-comers, which of all the Kings were simply the very best? But forsooth, presently after the KK, were depoed and expelled, there was not one of the Com, a Consul. What of that? ought no new thing to be ordained, and which hath not been already taken up afore? For many things have not yet been practised, (as in a state newly incorporate) ought not such then to be put in use, if they be thought expedient? While Romulus reigned, there were no Bishops nor Augurs: by Numa Pompilius they were created. There was no setting of the people at all in the City, no description of Hundreds and Clases, by S. Tullius they were instituted. Coss, were never heard of before: when the KK, were driven out, they were elected. The time was, when neither the absolute rule nor yet the name of a Dictator was known. In our fathers dayes it first began, that there have been none: it was ordained they should be made. Within this ten years, we have both created and also abolished out of the common-wealth, Decemvirs for the making and penning of our laws. And who doubteth, but in a City founded for ever to endure, and increasing (still infinitely, there will be brought in new Governments, new Priests-hoods and sacerdotal dignities, new privileges both of kindreds and private persons? And even this one thing in question, to wit, that the Com, and Nobles might not joy in marriage, were not the Decemvirs they that first within these few years made that Edict? A most shameful ensample and precedent in a free state, and tending to the manifest wrong of the Commons. Can there be any greater or more notorious injury, than that there should be in a City one part and member, as defiled and polluted, thought unworthy of the bond of marriage? What else is this, but to suffer exile and confining within the same walls, when they debar us that we should not be either allied in affinity or knit in kindred? They provide (forsooth) and take order that blood should not be mixed, nor families confused. How then? If this do pollute this great gentry of yours, which most of you descended from the Sabins and Albans, have not by right line from the Patricians, but by cooption and election into the number of the Nobles, as being chosen either by the favour and grace of the Kings, or else by the peoples voices after the KK, were expelled? could not your wisdoms have kept your blood uncorrupt by some private means and provision, namely, by taking heed neither to elopse wives from among the Commons, nor to suffer your daughters and sisters to be married to any other than Nobles? No commoner (ye might be sure) would have forced a daughter of any noble house: no, these insolencies of lascivious lust are appropriate to Gentlemen only of the Nobility: none of us would have compelled any of you against his will, to make covenant and contract of matrimony. But I wot, that by an express law it should be forbidden, and that marriage between Nobles and Commons should be condemned, that is, which to the commonalty is a plain contumely and open injury. And why conserge not and lay your heads together, that the rich may not marry with poor? That, which at all times and in all places, hath been a matter left unto particular policy and consideration; namely, That into what house soever a woman cast a liking and fancy, there she might be married: and into what family a man obliged himself by word, promise and covenant, from thence he might take a wife: even that, restrain ye within the bonds of a most proud and tyrannical law: whereby ye might break in under all civil society, and of one City make twain. Why forbid ye not by a positive Law, that a commoner should not dwell by a Noble-man, or go the same way that he doth, or frequent the same feast, or converse in the same market or common place of assembly? For in effect what difference is there, if a Gentleman marry a commoners daughter, or a commoner elopse a Gentlewoman? What right I pray you or condition of state is thereby changed? surely the children still take after the father. Neither seek we for any thing else by matching with you, but only this, that we may be reckoned in the number of men and of citizens. Neither is there any cause, why you should contend and stand upon it (unless it do you good to cross and take a pleasure to exercise your selves in working us disgrace and shame.) Finally I would gladly know whether the foreign government of the state reflect in you or in the people of Rome? When the Kings were driven out, got you thereby to your selves Lordly sovereignty, or purchased all men equal liberty? It must needs be granted, that the people of Rome may at their pleasure publish and ordain law. And will ye then as soon as any law whatsoever, is by them propoed, appoint a muster presently for their punishment? And as soon as I that am Tribun, shall begin to call the wards to give their voices, shall you that are Consuls by and by swear all the younger sort, press them to warfare, lead them forth unto the field, and menace the Comitiens menace I say the Tribuns also? What? If ye had not twice already good experience, how little these goodly threats of yours prevailed against the Comitiens when they agreed and link together, it were somewhat. Will ye say, that ye forbore to live, ye tendered our good, and yet pity spied us? Nay rather, to say a truth, was not this the cause that no fray was made for that men longer live was also the more cool and modeller of the twain? Neither (O ye) will there now, I warrant you, be any combat, nor blows dealt: they will all ways keen and found, what stomachs and hearts ye have, but never will they feel your fits, and try how keen your words be. Therefore to these wars (be they falsely pretended, or truly intended, reported) O ye Comitiens, the Comitiens are ready preit to follow you: provided always, that by granting them liberty of mutual marriage, ye will make at length this City one: that they may be linked, joyned and united unto you by private alliance and affinity: that hardy and valiant men may have hope and possibility, to honors and dignities: that they may be allowed fellowship and society in the Common-weal: Finally, that (which is due unto equal liberty) they may one with another in alternative courtes, obey annual Magistrates, and be obeyed again in their turns. If any of you shall gain say and withstand these conditions, prate still and talk at your pleasure of wars: multiply and make them as many and as great as ye will: There is not one shall give his name, not one shall take arms, not one shall fight for those proud Lords, with whom they can have neither fellowship of dignity in the Common-weal, nor alliance of marriage in private estate. Now when as the Consuls also were come forth into the open assembly of the people, and that they fell on all hands from continued and long Orations: to short dispute and altercation: the Tribuns demanded why a commoner might not attain to a Consulship? Unto whom the Consul returned an answer, as to the substance perhaps truly, for the present contention not very wisely and to the purpose: Namely, because that no commoner had the Auspices: which was the cause why the Decemvirs ordained distinct marriages, left upon a doubtful and mingled issue, there should follow a troubled confusion of the Auspices. But hereafter, the Comitiens stormed and stamped most of all: that as odious men unto the immortal Gods, they were flatly denied and deemed unworthy to observe the flight and singing of birds. And never gave they over their heats of clamorous debate (whiles the Comitiens had gotten unto them a most sharp Tribun to set them at work, and were themselves in obduracy no whit behind him) until at length the Nobles were overcome and driven to grant, that the Law as touching marriage should pass: supposing by that means especially, that the other Tribuns would either clean give over their suit for making commoners Consuls, or at least wile put it off, until the war were ended: and that the Comitiens in the mean while being well pleased and contented with marriage among the Nobles, would be willing and ready to levy a mulier. Candianus for this his victory over the Nobles, and for the favours he gat among the Comitiens, became a great and mighty man. Whereupon, the other Tribuns were kindled to the like combat: and for the proceeding of their Law also, endeavourd with all their might and main. And albeit the rumour of the war encreased daily more and more: yet they hinder the levy of soldiers. The Consuls seeing now that no decree and order could pass the Senate-house by reason that the Tribuns interposed their negative voice: took counsel together with the chief of the Nobility at home in their private houses. And well they saw that they must yield either the victory to their enemies, or the buckler to their own citizens. Of all the Senators that had been Consuls, only Valerius and Horatius were not present at these counsels. C. Claudius his opinion was, That the Consuls should put themselves in arms against the Tribuns: But the two Quintus, Cincinatus and Capitolinus, abhorred all blondd and violent proceedings against those whom by a solemn covenant made with the Comitiens, they had received and accepted for to be sacrosanct and unviolable. But in these counsels they grew to this point in the end, that they suffered military Tribuns of equal power with the Consuls, to be created indifferently from out of the Comitiens and Nobles: provided a wayes, that as touching creation of the Consuls, there should be no alteration from the old manner aforetime. And herewith were both Tribuns and Comitiens well satisfied and contented. A general assembly therefore was proclaimed for the chusing of three Tribuns in Consuls authority, which being once published: forthwith as many as had spoken or done ought tending to sedition, and above all others those that had been Tribuns of the people, began in their white robes to take hold of men and run to and fro about the common place labouring for this dignity. At the first, the Nobles especially in despair of obtaining the place (seeing the Comitiens to set a fote) partly for disdain and indignation to bear any honourable office joyntly with them of so base condition, were feared and affrighted from standing therefore: at the last (but they were forced thereto first by the heats and the chief Lords of the Senate) they were content to be competitors and suiters for the dignity: lest they might seem to be fully excluded forth of the possession of the Common-weal and leave it entirely for the Comitiens. The event and effect of this Court, shewed plainly, that mens minds are otherwise affected in contending about liberty and dignity, than presently after such contentions laid away, they are in weighing and judging: right without passion and affection. For the people satisfied herewith, that there was some account made of the Commoners, and that they were not shut out, elected military Tribuns all the Nobles. This modestly this equity, this noble mind, where shall a man now, dayes find in one person, which then was to be seen in the whole people? In the three hundredth and tenth year after the City of Rome was founded, were the first military Tribuns created, that bare office in the room of the

Con-

A Consuls, to wit, A. Sempronius Aruianus, L. Aruianus, and C. Cecilius: in whole government concord at home called also peace abroad. There be writers, who affirm, That upon occasion of the Veientian war, and the rebellion of the Ardeates, because two Consuls were not able to manage so many wars at once, therefore were three military Tribuns chosen: without making any mention of the Law published, concerning election of Consuls of the Comitiens: and that they were invested both in the jurisdiction, and also in the ornaments of the Consuls. Howbeit, the exercise of that government, stood not fast and sure, nor continued long. For within three months after that they entered, they forewent their office, by a decree of the Angurs, as if there had been some error in their creation. It was alleged that C. Cornutus, who was President of that Court of Election, had taken his quarters amiss for the observation of the lucky signs by flight of birds, and not according to the Angurs skill.

There came from the Ardeates to Rome, Embassadors, complaining of wrong received, in these terms: That if it might be redressed, and amends made, and their grounds restored, they seemed willing to abide till in league and amity. Answer was made them by the Senate, that the judgment of the people, already passed, could not be recovered by the Senate, if it were so: nothing else but for concord sake and agreement of the States: besides, they had neither any precedent to lead them thereto, nor Law and authority to warrant them. Marry, if the Ardeates would wait their times and put to the Senates arbitrement and discretion. Marry, if the Ardeates would wait their pretended, it would come to pass, that in process of time they should not repent of governing their passions and bridling their choler: and should well know, that the Nobles had a good regard, offered, it should not long continue. Thus the Embassadors, promising to make a true report, unto their citizens of the matter, wholly as it was: were friendly dimitted, and had their discharge.

The Senators seeing now the Commonweal, without any sovereign Magistrate of the chair and of State, went together, and made an Interregent: and whiles they strove whether Consuls or Tribuns should be created, the Interregent continued many dayes. The Interregent and the Senate laboured, that there should be an Election of Consuls: the Tribuns on the other side, and their feeling they were to confer the one office or the other, upon the Nobles, increased to strive in more: and also the chief of the Comitiens, chose rather to have that Election, wherein they should not be once propounded, than wherein they were sure to take the repulse, as unworthy. The Tribuns also gave over to contend any longer to no purpose, and without effect, seeming thereby somewhat to gratify and pleasure the LL. of the Senate. So T. Quintus Barbatus the Interregent, chose for Consuls L. Papirius Mugilanus, and L. Sempronius Aruianus. Whiles these were Consuls, the league with the Ardeates was renewed. And this is the only evidence and proof, that they were Consuls that year, for that neither in the ancient yearly records, nor in the Calendars of the Magistrates, they are found at all. I take it, because the military Tribuns were created in the beginning of that year: and therefore, although these Consuls were in their stead chosen, yet their names were left out, as if the other had remained in office the whole year.

L. Lucius Maccus affirmeth, that they are mentioned both in the composition with the Ardeates, and also in the linen books or registers in the Church of Juno Moneta. Albeit there had been so many terrors and bravados, threatened from the borderers, yet both abroad and at home, all was quiet. And whether Tribuns only, or Consuls also chosen in the room of Tribuns governed in this year: certain it is, that the next following, had Consuls M. Geganius Maccerius the second time, and T. Quintus Capitolinus the first time. This was the very year when the Censors office came up first. A thing that role of a small beginning: which notwithstanding afterwards increased to that height, that it had government of the manners and discipline of the Romans: and under the jurisdiction thereof, the Senate and Centuries of the order of knights, the distinction of worship and shameful disgrace, were reduced. Likewise, the survey of publick and private Edifices, and dissection of that office. The beginning of which thing arose upon this occasion: For that the people in many years space had not been assessed and numbered, and seeing the Censile could leisure to go about and accomplish that business: the Senate therefore made a motion, that the charge being painful, and not for the Majesty of Consuls to buy themselves in, required a special Magistrate, and a peculiar officer by it self. Under whom should attend the Secretaries and Clerks: who likewise should have the keeping and charge of the rolls and publick records: and at whose discretion should pass the seditious and instruments of all Assessments. The Senators therefore accepted gladly of this overture, although it were but a trifling matter: yet because there should be the more Magistrates of the Nobility. Supposing (I waver) it would come to pass as (it proved indeed) that shortly the power and wealth of those, who bare the office, should win more authority and credit unto the thing. Yea, and the Tribuns also made no great ado, but suffered it to pass, being an office (as it was in truth, no other at that time) rather of necessity and attendance, than of new port, or honor: because they would not seem to be cross and peevish in every small matter. When as therefore this dignity was of the principall of the City received, the people by their voices chose to that Office, Papirius and Sempronius, of whose Consulship there was some doubt: to the end, that by that office they might supply and make up indifferently among all, by forcing every man to confesse what corn he had, to open his garners, to bring it forth, to vent and sell that, which he had more then would serve a month. But when by this practise, and by demanding servants a portion of their daily food, and by accusing the corn-mungers and exposing them to the furious ire of the people, he had with all his hard courtes and sharp inquisitions rather laid open then eased the present need and necessity: many of the common people despairing of all hope, rather then they would live thus miserably tormented, pining and wearing away in hunger, covered their heads, and threw themselves headlong into Tiber. Then Sp. Melius by calling a Knight or Gentleman of Rome, a man (as in those days) exceeding rich, enterprised a thing, commodious I must needs say, but a dishonest precedent of dangerous consequence, and proceeding of a worse mind and intent of his. For having with his own money bought up the corn out of Hetruria by the means of his friends and vassals, whose ministry he used: which thing I believe verily was an hindrance that all the publick care and providence took small effect, and nothing heaped the general want and scarcity, he devised to bring up a free dole and distribution of corn: and to the end that when he had once by this benefit and liberality won the hearts of the Commons, then he might, what way soever he went carrying a port and majesty with him above the degree of a private person, draw after him a train of the people, promising him by their favour of support, undoubted and assured hope of a Consulship. But himself (as mans nature is unsatiable) not content herewith, aspired to higher matters then fortune promised him, and those unlawful, and beyond his reach. And for as much as even the very Consulship was to be wrested from the Nobles against their wills, he plotted to make himself a King, and thought that, the only guerdon due for so deep reaches and designs, and worthy that great contention and strife which he was to abide with much toil and sweat of brows. Now drew the Election on apace for Consuls, which thing prevented him afore he had brought his devices to full ripeness and perfection. Consul was created L. Quintus Capitolinus the sixth time, a man most unfit for his turn, that should go about innovations and to change the state and with him was joined Agrippa Menenius, furnished Laenas. And L. Minutius, was either made again the master vicualler, or else created he was at first without limitation of time, to continue so long as the case should require. For there is no certainty thereof, but only the name of Corn-master, recorded both years in the linen Books or Registers among other Magistrates. This Minutius was vigilant and as careful for the Common weal, as Melius for his private wealth: and upon occasion that men of the same quality to wit, the Commons, were conversant in both houses, namely, in his own and in the house of Melius, he came to the knowledge by their means, of Melius his treason: and declared unto the Senat the whole complot. Namely, That there was armor and weapons good store, carried into the house of Melius: that he kept conventicles there, and made seditious Orations, and that it was past all peradventure that he practised to be King. As for the time of working the feat and to put it into action, as yet it was not determined and certainly known: all other things were already agreed upon, Item, that the Tribuns were bribed and hired to sell and betray the liberty of the City: That to certain Captains of the multitude divers charges were appointed. And herewithal, he excaused himself (and said) That because he would not be reputed the author of any uncertain or vain intelligence, he uttered these matters somewhat M with the late, and late well-neer, then might stand with the common safety of the Weal-publick. Which news after they were heard, and that on every side the chief Senators had given both the Cof, or the former year a check; for that they had suffered those Largestes of corn, and tolerated meetings of the Commons in a private house: and rebuked the new Consuls also, for that they had stayed so long and waited till a matter of so great importance was by the corn-master detected and declared unto the Senate, which required a Cof, to be not only the informer, but also the reformer: Then T. Quintius answered, That the Consuls were blamed without just cause, who being bridled with the laws of appealing, tending to the great prejudicing and dismantling of their sovereign government, had not commission sufficient by virtue of their place, to punish the thing according to the hainousness and quality thereof, as they had courage and heart thereto: N and that there was need now, not only of a valiant and stout man, but also of one that was freed from all bonds of laws and tied to none. And therefore he would name L. Quintus for Dictator: in whom there was courage answerable to that absolute authority. When all men liked well thereof, Quintius himself at the first refused: demanding what they meant, to object and expose him, an unwelcome to farstep in years, to great trouble, and manifest danger. Afterwards, when as they replied on all hands, and alleged how in that heart of his for all his age there was more valour, and in his head more policy then in all men besides: heaping on him right due and deserved praises, and commendations: and whilst the Consul also importuned him still and gave not over: then Cincinatus, after he had prayed to the gods immortal, that his decrepit old age in so fearful a case, might not turn either to the loss or dishonor of the Common wealth, was by O the Consul pronounced Dictator. And he forthwith nominated C. Servilius Hala General of the horsemen. The morrow after, when he had set and disposed certain guards in divers places of the City, and was come down into the common place, the common people wondering at the strangeness of the matter, had their eyes upon him: and the adherents and complices of Melius, and he himself their Captain, saw well that the force and power of this so great a magistrate was bent against them. But they that were not acquainted with those plots and designs that tended to the setting up of a King, asked one another, what tumult or sudden war, should require either a Dictators

A Dictators majesty, or that Quintius after four score years of age, should be the only Ruler of the City. With that, Servilius the General of the horsemen was by the Dictator sent to Melius: Who said unto him, The Dictator calleth thee. Whereat he being afraid, asked again, What he would? and Servilius said, That he was to make his answer and purgation, of a crime that Minutius had informed against him, before the Senat. Then Melius began to retire himselfe back into the rout of his followers, and looking about at the first, shrunk only away from him, and related to obey. At the last the Apparitor at the general of the horsemen's commandment, began to force him to go with him: but he being refused by the standers by, found his feet and began to fly, and brought the aid of the Commonalty of Rome: saying, That the faction of the Nobles conspired his overthrow, and persecuted him for the good he had done unto the Commons, and for his liberality bequeathed upon them: beseeching them to help him in that extremity, and not to suffer him to be murdered afore their face and in their very sight. As he spake these words, Il-la Servilius overtook him, and killed him out-right: and being sprinkled with his blood thus slain, and guarded with a company of tall Gentlemen of the Nobility, he brought word to the Dictator, how Melius being cited to come unto him, put back the Apparitor, and raised the multitude: and now had suffered due punishments for his delicts. Then (quoth the Dictator) On forth in this valor and virtue of thine, O C. Servilius, thou deservest great praise, and hast delivered the Common-wealth this day from tyranny. Then as the multitude murmured and made a stir upon some doubt, what they should think of the fact, and what might be the occasion thereof: he commanded them to asseemble together, and openly avowed the deed, and pronounced that Melius was justly slain: yea, albeit he had been clear from seeking to be King: for that being summoned and convened before the Dictator, and that by the General of the horsemen, he refused and came not: "for my self (quoth he) was set judicially to examine and enquire of the cause: and "upon the trial thereof, Melius should have sped no worse then his cause desired: but the Dictator, "because he went about by violence to withdraw himself from judgment, by violence "therefore was he restrained. Neither was he to be proceeded against as a Citizen, who "being born in a free state, where justice and law were in force: and in that City, where- "out he was not ignorant that the KK, were sometimes expelled: and where in one and "the same year, Collatinus sisters sons, and the sons of that Cof, that was deliverer of "his Country, detected of a complot and conspiracy of receiving again into the City the "KK, blood, were by their own father beheaded: out of which City, Tarquinius Col- latinus Cof: for the detestation only of the name, being commanded to give up his office, "suffered exile: in which City, many years after Sp. Cassius for practising and plotting only "to be King, suffered condigne punishment: wherein also of late time, the Decemvirs, "for a tyrannical pride, where deprived of their goods, banished their country, and bereft "of their lives. That in the same City (I say) Sp. Melius should conceive any hope "of reaching to a Kingdom? And a man (I pray you) of what quality and condition? And "yet, no gentility of birth, no dignities nor delicts were sufficient to make way to any "for lordly rule and tyranny. Howbeit, the Clundius and Cassius, by reason of the Consul- "ships and Decemvirships of their own, by reason of the honourable estate and reputati- "on of their ancestors, and the worship and glory of their lineage, took upon them, be- "came haughty and proud, and aspired to that, whereunto Sp. Melius had no such means "to induce him: who might have sit him down, well enough, and rather wished and "prayed to God, then hoped once for so much, as a Tribuneship of the Commons. And "supposed he, being but a rich corn-master, that with a quart (or measure of corn of "two pounds) he had bought the freedom of his fellow Citizens? or thought he by ca- "sting morsels of bread and victuals afore the common sort, that the victorious people, "conquerors of all nations about them, might be allured into thralldom? and whom the "City could hardly brook to be a Senator, him they should endure their King, to have "the regal ensigns and the government of Romulus, the first founder of the City, de- "scended first from the gods, and to them ascended up again: why, it was a thing, not so "wicked as monstrous. Neither was this yet sufficiently satisfied for, with the shedding "of his blood, unless the house and walls, within which so horrible madness was conceived "and forged, were cast down and razed: and unless these goods, which were tainted and "infected with the prices and hire that should have purchased the Kingdom, were forfeit "and confiscated. He commanded therefore the Quetors, to sell those goods, and "to bring the money into the common Treasury. And then he called forth with his dwell- "ing house to be overthrown and made even with the ground, that the plot or floor the roof, "might be a monument of a wicked attempt, smothered and stifled in the very hope and "hatching thereof. This is the place which was called afterwards Aquilum. As for L. Minutius he had an Ox with gilded horns given him for an honour and reward without the gate Trigemini. The Commons therewith were not discontented, for that to them he divided Melius his corn, at the price of one As a Modius. Among some others I find

I find, that this Minutius forsook the Nobles and went to the Commons, and was taken up to be the eleventh Tribune of the Commons, and appealed the mutiny that arose upon Mellius his death. But it was not like that the Senators suffered the number of the Tribunes to be encreased; and especially, that such an example should be given and taken up by a man of their coat: or that the commonality would not keep it still, if it had been once allowed, or at leastwise attempt it again. But above all, this consuetude and reproveh the false title of Tribune set upon his image, for that a few years before, it was by a statute expressly provided, That Tribunes might not chule and take unto them a Colleague in office, Q. Caelius, and Q. Junius, and Sextus Titinius were the only men of all the College of Tribunes that propounded not the Law for the honour of Minutius, but rather added unto the Commons, both Minutius and Servilius, and ceased not to make complaint of the cruel and unworthy death of Mellius: and in fine prevailed so much, that there should be an election for military Tribunes rather than for Consuls: nothing doubting, but if six were chosen (for so many at that time might be created) some of the Commons also, by promising to revenge the death of Mellius, might step in and be elected. The Commons for all they were called that year with many and sundry troubles, chose no more than three Tribunes with Consuls authority: and among them, L. Quintus the son of Cincinatus: Upon the hard conceit and hatred of whose Dictatorship past, they thought to pick some occasion of quarrel and tumult: and Mamercus Emilius, a man of great credit and reputation, was by voices preferred afore Quintus, and obtained the first place. And L. Julius they created for the third.

Tullius
murdereth the Roman Em-
bassadors.

While these bare sovereign rule, Fidene the Colony of the Romans, revolted to Lars Tullianus, the King of the Veientians, and to the State of the Veientians. And besides their revolting, a more horrible fact they committed. For at the commandment of Alumnus, they slew C. Falcianus, and C. Julius, Sp. Nautius, and L. Roscius the Roman Embassadors, who came to demand the cause of this their change and sudden alteration. Some here do excole and elevate the act of the King, saying that upon a iuxty cast of dice he uttered a doubtful speech, which was by the Fidenatians so taken, as though he seemed to bid the Embassadors to be killed, and that (forsooth) was the occasion of murdering the Embassadors (a thing incredible, that at the coming in of the Fidenatians, his new allies, who were to consult with him and ask his advice, about a murder that should break the law of Nations, his mind should not be turned away from earnest studying about his game) and so this hainous fact proveth to be but an error. More credible it is, that he had a further meaning and deeper reach: namely, that the people of the Fidenatians should be bound unto him, and only rely upon him, being attaint with the guiltinesse of so foul a murder, and not to look and hope for any mercy or favour at the Romans hands. The statues of these Embassadors which were at Fidene murdered, were set up openly at the charges of the City in the Rostra. [A pulchre crosse (as it were) or pulpit in Rome, one of which the Magistrates made. Orators to the people, beautified with the beakheads of ships, and their brazen pikes called Rostra.] Thus was there like to be a cruel conflict with the Veientians, and Fidenates. M. Who besides that they were people confining on their frontiers, had also in the beginning of their war given so wicked and horrible a cause of quarrel. Therefore when as the common people and their Tribunes, in regard of the care for the publick State, were at quiet: there was no question, but that M. Gargamis Macerius the third time, and L. Sergius Fidenas (named I suppose so, upon the war which afterwards under his conduct was fought) should be created Consuls. For this man first encountered with the King of the Veientians on this side Anio, and gat the victory: but not without much bloodshed of the Romans. So that the grief was greater for the loss of his own souldiers, than the joy for the discomfite of his enemies. And the Senate, as in all fearful times and dangerous occurrences, ordained Mamercus Emilius to be created Dictator. Who, out of the brotherhood of Tribunes military in Consuls authority, the year before, named for the General of his horsemen, L. Quintus Cincinatus, who had been a Tribune with him, a toward young Gentleman, and a worthy son of so worthy a father. To those souldiers that were by the Consul mulstered and levied, were the old Centurions, experienced and skilful warriors, adjoined: and the number of those, which in that last battel were slain, was supplied. The Dictator commanded to follow him as Lieutenants, Quintus Capitolinus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus. This greater power and authority, and the man likewise nothing thereto inferior, drove the enemies out of the Roman ground, and set them farther off, even beyond Anio. Who removing their camp still backward, seized upon the hills between Fidene and Anio: neither durst they come down from thence into the open plains, before that the Legion of the Falisci came to succour. Then at length, the Tuscans encamped themselves under the walls of Fidene. And the Roman Dictator likewise rested and abode upon the banks of the Confluent (where both rivers run into one) and flanked himself thereby. And when he had cast up a trench and rampart afront, reaching across from the one river to the other, the morrow after he brought his power forth, and set them in order of battel. The enemies

Amies were of sundry minds. The Faliscians, who hardly could away long with military service farre from home, and truffling withal in their own selves, that they were good enough, required battel. The Veientians and Fidenates had more hope in drawing out the war on length. Tullianus, albeit the advice of his own men liked him better, yet because the Faliscians should not endure lingering warfare, sendeth a trumpet, and proclameth battel against the morrow. The Dictator and the Romans: for that the enemies for the present shifted off fight, took more heart unto them: and on the next morning, when as now the souldiers gave out brave words, and menaced, That unless they might have battel, they would assault both the Camp and the Town: the armies of both parts came forth into the middle of the plain, between the two Camps. The Veientians, as being more in number and having to spare, sent covertly out certain companies to lecha compals behind the Hills, who in the time of the conflict should set upon the Roman Camp. And in this order stood the main Army of three Nations together embattelled. The Veientians kept the right point, the Faliscians the left, and the Fidenates the middle of the battel. The Dictator in the right point advanced his standard against the Faliscians, and on the left Captianus Quintus charged the Veientians: and against the main battel between both, marched the Colonel of the Cavalry, with his Cornets of horse. Thus as they stood arranged in battel array, for a pretty while was there silence on either side, and all quiet. For neither would the Tuscans begin first, unless they were urged: And the Dictator looked ever and anon backward toward the Capitol of Rome, that the Angurs should set up a signal aloft (as it was agreed between them) so soon as the sight of fowls gave approbation accordingly: which he no sooner espied, but he put out presently the men of arms, with a great shout against the enemies. The army of the footmen followed hard after in the tail, and seconded them with a lusty charge. But on no hand were the Tuscan legions able to abide the force of the Romans. The Cavalry stood hardest to it, and made head still. For the King himselfe, the best horseman and most valiant of them all, when as on every side his enemies charged and pressed fore upon him, rode aiong them, held out and maintained fight. There chanced then to be among the Roman horsemen, a Tribune or Marshal, one A. Cornudius Cossus, a goodly tall man of body, and as valiant and strong withal, whoeif before his eyes the noble house from whence he was descended, and carried this mind, as it was right honourable already by his ancestors left him, so to recommend the fame to his posterity more glorious and renowned. This man seeing the troops of Romans waying to and fro, for fear of the violence of Tullianus, which way soever he bent and turned: and knowing him by his rich and royal furniture, wherein he bare himself like a brave Knight, riding all over the battel, "Is this (quoth he) the forsworn breaker of humane league, is this he that hath violated the laws of arms, and of nations? Now will I presently, if it be Gods will that any thing in the world should remain wholly and inviolate, be his Priest, I will sacrifice and betake him to the ghosts of our Embassadors, deceased. Herewith, setting spurs to his horse, with bent spear in rest, he rode full against that one enemy, singled from the rest: smote him, and dismounted him from his horse. Then being upon his flail, alight presently on foot, and as the King was getting up again, he overthrew him backward with the bolis of his target, and laid him stretching long & after many wounds given him, at length fastned him with his spear to the very ground. And when as he was once dead, he disarmed and dispoiled him, and struck off his head: and carrying it aloft on his lance, presented a fearful spectacle to the enemies of their King slain, and to discomfited them. Thus was the strength of the horsemen decleated also, which only had made the battel doubtful. The Dictator having put likewise the legions of footmen to flight, pursued them still, and drove them to their fort, killing them all the way in the chase. Many of the Fidenates which knew the coats of the Country, fled into the mountains, and escaped. Cossus with his horsemen passed over Tiber, and brought home into the City a great booty out of the country of the Veientians. As this battel was in fighting, there was skinnish also in the Roman camp, with that part of the forces, which (as it is afore said) was sent by Tullianus to surprise it. Fabius Vibulanus first defended the rampart, ordering his men all within, in compals like a garland: and while the enemies were wholly bent about the assault, he with the Triarii or souldiers of the reeward, suddenly issued forth at the gate, called Principalis, on the right hand, and gave an hot charge upon them: Upon which they were affrighted, but there ensued the less slaughter, because the number was smaller. Howbeit, they fled no lesse in disarray, than those in the very battel. Thus the Dictator having prosperous success every where, returned with triumph into the City, by the decree of the Senat, and grant of the people. In which triumphs the greatest show and goodliest sight of all, was Cossus, bearing the rich and royal spoils of the King, slain by his own hand. For of him the souldiers chanted divers rude ballads without time and metre, comparing him in their songs with Romulus, which spoils with a solemn manner of dedication he bestowed and hung up in the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, neer unto those of Romulus, which were the first and only spoils, until that time, called Opima Spolia. And as he went he withdrew from the Dictators chariot, the eyes of all the people unto himself, and hee in manner alone, carried away the magnificence and glory of that festive day. The Dictator by order from the people, presented in the Capitol for the honour of Jupiter, a golden Crown, weighing one pound weight, raised out of the common money of the City.

Thus have I set down (as following all other writers before me) that Aulus Cornelius Cossus, a Colonel or Marshal, brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the second royal spoils. Howbeit, over and besides, that those spoils onely are by right accounted Opima, or royal, which a General hath taken from a General, and we acknowledge none for General, but him under whose conduct an high Commission a war is managed, the very title also written upon the spoils, doth check and reprove both them and me. The words whereof are these, [Titus Cossus being Consul, won those spoils.] When I once heard say, that Augustus Caesar himself, the founder or repairer of all Temples, entered into the house of Jupiter Feretrius, which he re-edified, being by injury of long time fallen to decay, and read it to written in a linen Jack or Curuze: I thought it little better then sacrilege, to discredit and cancel the testimony of Cossus himself concerning his own spoils, and of Augustus Caesar, the benefactor of that very Temple. Which error, if it grow hereon, That so ancient Records and Chronicles, and that the Books of the Magistrates, which being of linen, and laid up in the Temple of Moneta, Maecur Licinius doth very often quote and K cite as his Authors, do represent unto us Aulus Cornelius Cossus, the seventh year after Consul, with Titus Quintius Pennus: let every man abound in his own sense, and have his opinion by himself freely. For more then all this may be alleged to prove, that so famous a battle could not be transferred to that year: because that for three years space about the Consulship of Cossus, there was no war at all, in a manner, by reason of pestilence and death of corn: so as some records, as it were, mourning, and bewraying the calamity of the time, deliver unto us nothing but the bare names of the Consuls. In the third year, after that Cossus was Consul, he was military Tribun in Consuls authority, and in the same year General of the horsemen also: in which government he fought another notable battle with horsemen. But hereof a man may conjecture and guesse what he will. L But (as I think) we may toise these things of small importance to and fro, according to every mans opinion: and when all is done, the author of this battle his own selfe, having set up these fresh and new spoils in a holy place, in the sight of Jupiter himselfe standing thereby, to whom they were vowed, and Romulus also, two witnesses, not to bee despised nor abused with a false title, hath written himself, [A. Cornelius Cossus Consul.]

When Marcus Cornelius Maluginensis and Papirius Crassus were Consuls, the Armies were led forth: the one into the Veientians Country, and the other into the Faliscians, and booties both of people and cattel were from thence driven and carried away. As for the enemies themselves, no where in the Country were they to be seen, nor any battle was M fought: and yet for all that, the towns were not assailed, because the people at home died of the pestilence. And within the City, Sp. Melius Tribune of the Commons fought occasions and pretences to move seditions, but without effect. Who supposing by the popular favour of his name to prevail and raise some mutiny, both arrested Minutius to make his answer, and also put up a bill for the confiscation of the goods of Servilius Hala: laying hard to Minutius his charge, that Melius was falsely accused and circumvented by him: and burdening Servilius with the murdering of a Citizen uncondemned. All these fumes were with the people of less credit and importance, than the author himselfe. But the violence of the sickness still increasing more and more, troubled them: besides the fearful and strange prodigious tokens: but especially, the fresh news that divers houses in the N Country were by many earthquakes cast down. Whereupon the people went in solemn procession and made their supplications, whiles the Duumvir going afore pronounced prayers, and the people said after him word for word. But the year following, when C. Julius the second time, and L. Virginus were Consuls, was more contagious by reason of the plague, and caused both in Town and Country, so great a fear of utter desolation, that not only there were none set forth in any roads without the territory of Rome to raise booties, whiles the Nobility and Commons had no mind of making war: but the Fidenates also of their own accord, who before time had kept themselves either within their Towns, or Mountains, or Fortresses, entered now into the lands about Rome, and foraged all the Country. After this, having gotten also unto them a power of the Veientians (for the Faliscians could not be induced either by the calamity of the Romans, or prayers of their confederates, to take arms again) these two Nations passed over Anio, and not far from the gate Collina displayed their ensignes. So the fear was no lesse within the City than in the Country. Then Julius the Consul bringeth the forces abroad, and placeth them upon the rampart and the

A the walls: whilest Virginus assembled the Senate in the Temple of Quirinus, for to ask their opinion. Where agreed it was, to create for Dictator, A. Servilius, (turnamed (as some say) Priscus, or as other, Sirnitus, Virginus making no longer stay than until he had consulted with his Colleague, by his permission declared the Dictator in the night season. And he nominated for his General of the Cavalry, Posthumus Ebutius Helius. The Dictator commanded every man to be ready without the gate Collina, by the break of day: and so many as were able to bear arms were in a readinesse. The Standards and Ensignes were taken forth of the treasury or chamber of the City and brought to the Dictator. Whiles chide things were in doing, the enemies were retired and withdrawn to the higher grounds and B and places of advantage: and thither marked the Dictator with his army in order of battle. And encountering with them not far from Nomentum, he discomfited the legions of the Tuicans, and drave them into the town of Fidene, and cast a trench about it. But neither could the town be scaled for the high rise thereof and the strong walls about it: and to lay siege unto it might not avail: for that they had corn not only to suffice the ordinary need of men belieged, but also plenty to spare, of their old store and provision gathered aforehand. Thus the Dictator, being without all hope both of winning it by assault, and also of forcing them to yield by composition, purposed in certain places for the neednesse to him well known, at the backside of the City which was slenderly guarded, most neglected, and for the natural situation the surest, to undermine unto the Cattle. And he himself in places farthest off from thence, approached close under the walls, with his army divided into four parts, to successe one another by turns in order: and so, by continual skirmishing day and night, he kept the enemies at a bay and withdrew them from all relieving and intelligence of the work under ground: until such time as by digging through the hill from the Camp, there was a way and passage made straight up into the Cattle. And when as the Tuicans were wholly amused upon the vain threatnings, and bravado's of their enemies before them, nothing minding the present danger wherein they stood: behold, the alarm of their enemies even over their heads, made an out-cry, that the town was taken. In this year Cn. Furius Pacilinus and M. Geganus Maecurinus, Centors, appointed and dedicated the Large Hall, named Villa Publica in Mars field: and there first by them was held the Sessing and numbering of the people. I find in Maecur Licinius, that in the year following, the same Consuls were made again, namely, Julius the third time, and Virginus the second time. But Valerius Antias and Q. Tubero, do name M. Maenius and Q. Sulpicius for the Consuls that year. Howbeit in so different report, both Tubero and Maecur protest that they followed the linen Records: and neither of them both conceal that which the ancient writers have set down, namely, That the same year were Tribuns military, in Consuls authority. Licinius without doubt is added to those linen Registers, and Tubero is uncertain of the truth. But among other antiquities, not known by reason of long time, this also is left in doubt and not cleared.

After the winning of Fidene, great was the fear in Hetruria: whilest not only the Veientians were scared, fearing the like destination: but the Falisci also, remembering there began first with them, albeit they were not assitant in their rebellion. When as therefore these two States had sent their Embassadors abroad to the twelve Cities about them, and obtained a Diet or General Parliament of all Hetruria should be assembled at the Temple of Vaturnus: the Senat, as if some great troubles were like thereof presently to ensue, thought good that Mamercus Aemilius should be created Dictator the second time. By whom, A. Posthumus Tubero was named General of the horsemen. And with so much greater endeavor made they preparation of arms than in the last war afore, by how much more danger there was from all Hetruria banded together, than had been from two nations combined and no more. But this business was much more quiet than all men looked for. When F as therefore news came by Merchants, that the Veientians were flatly denied help, and bidden to do that war by their own means and forces, which they had begun on their own heads: nor seek to embark them in the association of their misery and adversity, unto whom they had not imparted their mind & hope in their upright state, and when they were in their height: then the Dictator, to the end he should not seem to be created in vain, seeing all matter of acquiring renown by war was cut off, desirous yet in time of peace, to doe some notable piece of work for a monument, set forth in hand to abate and diminish the Cenforship: either supposing it to be too high an office, or else offended not so much with the greatness of the honour, as with the continuance and length thereof. Having therefore assembled all the people together: "For as much as the immortal Gods (quoth he) have under G taken to govern the Common-Weale abroad, and performed all safe and iure: I for my part concerning that which is to be done at home within the walls, will take order and provide for the freedom of the people of Rome. The greatest preservation, and defence whereof resteth in this, when offices of great command are not long enduring: but when they be limited by term of time which may not be restrained or gaged in jurisdiction. The Oration of Mamercus Aemilius, to the people.

The office of Censors reduced from the term of five years, to one, and an halt.

Mamercus C. pulius disinfranchised and made Erarii.

Tribuns Military in Consul's room, chosen again.

"for other magistracies they are from year to year: but this of the Censors continuing five years, is very heavy and grievous. And hard it is for men to live so many years, even a great part of their life, in danger of the same Rulers still. Minded therefore I am, to propose a law. That the Censorship continue no longer than one year and six months. With great applause and consent of the people, the next day after, he both published the law and enacted it. And now that ye may (quoth he) O Quirites, know in very deed, how I mislike of these long lasting offices, here presently I render up my Dictatorship. Thus having given over his own place, let a limitation to the rule of others, and absolutely ended one, with exceeding congratulation and favour of the people he was brought home to his house. The Censors taking it grievously that Mamercus had abridged an office of the people of Rome, displaced him from his own Tribe, laying on him an eightfold tax in the ludi of Rome, disfranchised and disabled him from giving his voice, and made him no better than a Tributary. Which disgrace (they say) he took with a noble stomach, looking rather to the cause of this shameful note, than to the ignominy it self. Moreover, the Lords of the Senate, albeit they were willing enough that the Censorship nails should be pared and their power taken down, were offended yet, with this example of the rigour and severity of those in place: for as much as they all saw plainly, that they should be both longer time and outlive under Censors, then Censors themselves. But so great an indignation of the people (by report) grew hereof, that by the authority of no man but of Mamercus himself, could they be restrained from offering violence to the very persons of the Censors. And the Tribuns of the Commons, with their continual Orations and Remonstrances, prohibited the Election of Consuls. When as the matter was well near brought to the point of an Interregnum, they obtained at length with much strife and contention, that there should be military Tribuns chosen, with Consular authority. But reward of this their victory, wherewith they floored, could they get none: namely, that a Commoner might be chosen for one. They were all of the Nobility that were created, to wit, M. Fabius Vibulanus, M. Folin, and L. Sergius Fidenas.

The plague that year was the occasion of quietness from all other troubles. A Temple then was vowed to Apollo for the health of the people. Howbeit, great loils was there both in town and country, by the mortality of men and murrain of cattle, one with another indifferently. And fearing lest the husbandmen of the country should be furnished, they sent for corn into Hetruria and the country of Pomptinus, to Cumes, and at last even into Sicily. And not a word all this while about the election of Consuls. So there were military Tribuns elected, with Consular authority, all again of the Patritii, namely, L. Pinarius Mamercus, L. Furius Medullinus, and Sp. Posthumius Albus. That year the violence of the sickness abated: neither was there any danger or fear of scarcity of Corn, because they had made provision beforehand. Great sitting and consultation there was in the general Diets of the Volscians and Equians, and in Hetruria at the aforesaid Temple of Votumina about making war. There, the matter was put off for one whole year: and by an Act or Decree it was provided, that no Assembly or Parliament during that time should be held: notwithstanding the M people of the Veientians complained but all in vain, that the same fortunes were like to happen unto Vetii, which had fallen already upon Fidene, even the utter subversion of the State. In this mean season, at Rome the chiefs heads of the Commons having aspired and gaped now a long time, but still in vain, after higher place of dignity and honour, took their vantage while all was quiet abroad, and began to have their convencicles and meetings in the houses of the Tribunes, and there entertained secret Counsels. Some complained that they were much despised of the common people: for whereas in so many years, There were Tribunes Military created with Consular authority, yet never was there any one of the Commonalty advanced to that Dignity. Our forefathers (say they) in great wisdom and deep fore-nest, have done well to take order, that none of the Nobility at any time should have access to any office of the Commonalty: for if that were not, the Commons should have had ere this some of the Patritii for their Tribuns: so odious are we become to those of our own coat, and are as little set by of the Commons as of the Nobles. Others excused the people, and laid the fault upon the Senators: by whose ambition, by whose crafty fetches and subtil policies it came to passe, that the Commons were stopped from the highway to advancement and promotion. But if the Commons might have any relief or breathing time, and not be solicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and sovereign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a Law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignity. A small matter now adays, and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious council, and

A not be solicited and tempted by their prayers interlaced with threats: they would remember themselves and those of their own calling, in giving of their voices: and having once gotten assistance unto them, would also win the highest pitch and sovereign type of authority. For the abolishing therefore of this ambitious seeking and standing for offices, they agree and resolve, that the Tribuns should prefer and publish a law, that no man might wear white more then ordinary, or refresh the bright hue of his upper garment, while he sued for any dignity. A small matter now adays and may seem scarcely worth the debating in serious council, which notwithstanding at that time, for both nobles and commons in a great heat of contention. Yet obtained the Tribuns so much, that this law passed: and it appeared, that the Commons when their blood was once up, would assert their own, and wholly in line to them in their outrages. But to the end that they might not have their full scope and put it in practice, an Act of the Senate was, that there should be held an Election of Consuls. The occasion thereof, arose from the Equians and Volscians. T. Quintus Cincinnatus, the son of Lucius (surnamed also Pennus) and C. Julius Mento were elected Consuls. Neither was this fearful news of war entertained any longer. For the enemies having by a far-cred law (which amongst them was of greatest force to levy an army) mustered their power, set forth two mighty armies from both parts, into Algidum, and there met. Where the Equians and Volscians, feverally by themselves encamped strongly, and more earnestly studied the Captains to fortify their camps, and to train and exercise their soldiery, than at any time afore. Whereupon, the news was more fearful that the messengers brought to Rome. So the Senate agreed to create a Dictator. For, although those nations oftentimes had been vanquished by them, yet now they rebelled in more forcible manner, and with preparation, than at any time before. Alas, by reason of the late sickness, the youth and flower of the Romans was fore diminished. But above all, the private discord of the Consuls one with another, and the debate and difference in all their council terrified them most. There be that write, how these Consuls had but unlucky fortune, and lost a field in Algidum: and that it should be the cause of making a Dictator. But this one thing is certain, that howsoever else the Consuls disagreed, yet they jumped in one to cross the wills of the Senators, in that they would not nominate a Dictator until such time as after news brought, fill word and worse, and yet the Consuls would not be ruled by the Senators: one Quintus Servilius Priscus, a man, who right worthy and honourably had born the highest offices, made this speech: "My Masters, ye that are Tribuns of the Commons (quoth he) in this "exigent and desperate case, the Senate calleth for your assistance, that in so great hazard of the Common-weal, ye by virtue of your authority, would force the Consuls preemp-torily to make a Dictator. Which speech being once heard: the Tribuns supposing now they had good occasion offered, to stretch and extend their power to the full, departed aside: and in the name of their College or society, pronounced, That it was their pleasure and will, that the Consuls should be obedient unto the Senate: and in case they proceeded to do farther, then the consent of that most honourable House would bear them out, they would command them to ward. The Consuls chose rather to be over-ruled of them than of the Senate: laying yet wishal, that the prerogative of the highest government was by the Senators betrayed, and the Consulship made thrall and subject to the Tribuns' power, if so be the Consuls might be compelled to do ought by vigour of the Tribuns' authority, and (than which, a private person could fear no more) be sent aloft to ward, or committed to prison. The lot fell to T. Quintus (for in this also they could not agree between themselves) to nominate the Dictator: who named A. Posthumius Tubertus, his wives father, a grim Sir, and a man of most severe and stern government. By whom was L. Julius nominated for General of the Cavalry: Herewithal was proclaimed a vacation or law-sted, and that throughout the whole City they should go in hand with nothing but war. The taking knowledge of such as pretended to be freed and exempt from soldiery, was put off until the war was ended. So that they that were before doubtful, suffered themselves to be enrolled: and soldiery were levied out from the Hernicks and Latins, who from both places obeyed the Dictator to their uttermost. All these things were dispatched with exceeding expedition. Then the Dictator having left C. Julius the Consul, for the defence of the City, & L. Julius the General of the horsemen for all sudden occasions incident unto wars, that they might not be to seek for any thing whereof they had need in the camp, took with him Anlus Cornelius the High Priest, & laying after him certain prayers, word for word, he vowed great and flatly plays, in regard of this tumultuous and troublesome war: and thus departing from the City, and dividing his whole Army between himself and Quintus the Col, at length he approached the enemies. And like as they had discovered the two camps of their enemies, a little place distant one from another, so they also, about a mile from the enemy, intrenched themselves: the Dictator near to Tuscanum, and the Consul to Lanuvium. So these four Armies, and as many fortified camps, had a spacious and large plain in the middle, sufficient not only for small excursions to skirmish in, but also to display their armies of both sides. And all the time that they lay encamped encamped one against another, they ceased not to make light skirmishes: for the Dictator H was well content, that his men by making proof, and comparing their strength and puissance with their enemies, and assaying by little and little to try the event of these skirmishes, should conceive a forehead some hope of the entire and general victory.

The enemies therefore having no hope left, to speed well in a set field and pight battel, assailed by night the Coniuls camp, and put all to the hazard of a doubtful issue. The sudden cry and alarm, awakened not only the Coniuls, Sentinels, his corpo de guard, and so his whole army, but the Dictator also out of their sleep. And where need was of present help, there failed not the Coniul, either in courage or counsel. Some souldiers ward and defend the gates, others compals the trench, ranged in a round array. In the other camp of the Dictator, look how much less stir there was, so much more leisure had they, and studied what was most needful to be done. Forth with aid was sent unto the Coniul his camp, under the leading of Sp. P. Posthumus Albus, a Lieutenant. The Dictator himself in person, with part of his power, fetching a small compals about, gained a place most apart from all noise and tumult, and from whence at unawares he might charge upon the back of the enemies. And leaveth as Vicegerent in the leaguer Q. Sulpicius: and to M. Fabius a Lieutenant, he committeth the conduct of the horsemen, commanding him not before day to stir with his horie, as being unruly and hard to be managed in tumults and troubles of the night. And all things else, that a provident and indolent Captain in such a case might command and do, that commanded he, and did orderly. But for one thing above the rest, he shewed singular proof of policy and courage, and worthy no mean praise: in that he sent out first M. Geganius with certain chosen Squadrons to assail that camp of the enemies, from whence he knew by his espials there was departed a greater part of the forces. Who after that he surprised the enemies there, amused wholly upon the event of other mens danger, careless and secure for their own selves, and therefore neglecting their scouts and guards, wan their hold, in manner before the enemies knew well it was assailed. From whence the Dictator having decried a smook (which was the signal agreed between them) crieth aloud, that the enemies camp was won, and commandeth news thereof to be carried every way. Now it waxed broad day light, and all was clearly to be seen: by which time both Fabius with the horsemen, had given the charge, and the Coniul also had made a fall out of the camp, upon the enemies that now already were scared. But the Dictator on the other side, charging upon the rereward and the middle battel, came on every side with his footmen, and horsemen in train of victory against the enemies: who were forced to turn round and fight every way, according to the dissonant outcries, and sudden alarms. Thus being environed round about, they had in the midst died for every one, and suffered punishment due for their rebellion, had not Vettius Messius, one of the Volscians, a man more renowned for his valiant acts, then noble by his parentage, rebuked with a loud voice his fellows, being ready now to cast themselves into rings, and said: "What will ye here without making your defence, without revenge, offer your selves to be devoured of the enemies sword? What sius to his fel-

"do you with your armour and weapons? Why began ye war first? Are you troublesome and unruly in peace, and cowards in war? What hope have ye in standing still?"
"Do you look for some god from Heaven to protect and deliver you? You must make way by dint of sword. Go to then, and stick to it like men, and that way whereas ye shall see me go afore, follow ye after, as many of you as mind to see again your home, your parents, your wives and children. It is neither wall, nor rampart and trench, but armed men that must withstand armed men. In valour ye are their marches, but in respect of necessity (which is the last and strongest engine of all other) ye are the better. When he had these words spoken, and done accordingly, with a fresh shout they followed after, and made head to that quarter whereas Posthumus Albus had placed against them his cohorts:
and compelled the victors to lose ground, until such time as the Dictator came to succour his men thus distressed, and now ready to retreat: and so he bent thither all the force of the whole battel. In one only man, Messius, rested all the hope and fortune of the enemies. Many a man was there hurt on both parts, and many a one slain outright, and left dead in the place. So as now the very Roman Commanders fought not without bloodshed. Only Posthumus being smitten with a stone, which had broken and bruised his head, went out of the throng: for neither the Dictator, wounded as he was in the shoulder, nor yet Fabius, albeit his thigh was almost nailed to his horie, nor the Coniul, for all his arm was quite cut off, oncrented or departed out of that dangerous combat. But Messius amidst the enemies that there lay dead on the earth, with a guard about him of most hardy & tall men passed through in forble manner, and escaped clear to the Volscians leaguer, which as yet was not lost: and so the whoe battel in lined thither. The Coniul after he had chafed them, scattered in parties here and there, even as far as to the trench, afflicth the very camp and the rampart.
Thither also bringeth the Dictator his power to another side. Neither was the assault less hot there then the fight was sharp afore. It is said moreover, that the Coniul threw an ensign within therampart, to animate the souldiers, that they might more eagerly get up after it: and

A and so by recovering the banner again, was the first breach and entrance made. Thus the Dictator having broken through the mure, came to close fight and hand-to-arms even within the camp.
Then began the enemies every where to fling from them their weapons, and to yield themselves prisoners. So being themselves and their pavilions taken, they were all sold, but those of Senators calling. Part of the pillage was reitred to the Latins and Hernicks, namely, to as many as knew their own goods: part thereof the Dictator sold in port-sale. And leaving to the Coniul the charge of the camp, rode himself triumphing into the City, and gave over his office. Of which his noble and famous Dictatorship, they blemish the memorial, who write, that A. Posthumus (the Dictator his son, for that upon advantage offered of a fortunate service, he departed without leave from his quarter and guard) was after his victory achieved, by his fathers Commandment beheaded.
But I list not to believe it. And lawful it is for me to do so, among so divers opinions: and a good proof it is on my side, that such imperious and rigorous proceedings were called Imperia Alaudina, and not Posthumiana. For like it is, that he who had given the first example of such cruelty, should have noted after all others, that noted title of cruelty, Besides, Messius it was, that was surnamed Imperius. But Posthumus is not marked with any odious note at all.

C, Julius Coniul, in the absence of his Colleague, without any calling of lots, dedicated the Temple of Ap. Quirinus having discharged his army, when he was returned into the City took not that well, but it was no boot to complain in the Senat house. Moreover, in this notable year, so full of brave and worthy acts, there is recorded one thing, that was thought in those days nothing pertinent to the State of Rome, namely, that the Carthaginians (so great and mortal enemies in time to come) passed the seas then first: and (upon the occasion of civil dissention and discord among the Sicilians) with a power landed in Sicily, for to take part with a side and faction. In the City of Rome the Tribuns of the Commons laboured, that Military Tribuns might be with Consuls authority chosen: but it could not be obtained. Consuls were made, Luc. Pappus Crassus, and L. Julius. The Aequians Embassadors suing to the Senat for a league, and for that league, pre-tending very often to yield themselves, and be in subjection, obtained a truce only for 8 years.
The Volscians after their overthrow in Algidum, fell to continual debate and contention, whilst some persuaded peace, and others war: so long, until at length they grew to brawls and mutinies.
So on every side the Romans were at rest. The Coniuls understanding that the Tribuns of the D Commons were comploted (for one false brother among them betrayed and detected all) to put up a bill, and make a law, concerning the estimation of fines and penalties (a thing right pleasing and acceptable to the people) they themselves prevented them, and preferred it. Then were Consuls, L. Sergius Fidenas, the second time, and Hosius Lucretius Tricipitinus. In whose year nothing was there done worthy of rehearsal. After them succeeded Consuls, A. Cornelius Cossus, and Tiberius Quintus Pennus the second time. The Veientians made rodes into the lands of the Romans. And a rumor went, that some of the Fidenatian youths were accellary unto them, and had their hands therein. For which were appointed as Commissioners to make inquisition, *L.
Sergius, Quintus Servilius*, and Mamercus Emilius. Some of them were confined to Hosius, for that they could make no found excuse, and justify their absence for certain days out of Fidene. So the number of the inhabitants there, was increased: and their lands, who were slain in the wars, assigned unto them.

In that year hapned an exceeding great drouth. For not only there wanted rain water from above, but also the very earth lacking her natural moisture, scarcely sufficed to maintain the running stream in main rivers. The scarcity of water besides about springs that were dried up, and the small rivulets and brooks caused a great death and mortality of cattel for default of drink:
whereof some died of the scab: by contagion whereof the people also were diseased generally.
The malady first began among the rural sort, the bond-slaves and bonds: and afterwards spread into every corner of the City. Neither were men only rained and diseased with this infection:
but their minds also were troubled and possessed with sundry sorts of superstitious religious, and F those for the most part strange and forrain: whilst upon vain and foolish prophecies, they brought new rites and ceremonies of sacrificing into mens houses: and made good gain of such as were given to superstitions devotion, and made conscience of every little thing: until such time as now it grew to a public offence, and the chief of the City were ashamed to see in every street and chappel, strange and unaccustomed purgatory sacrifices and expiations, for to procure the favour and mercy of the gods. Whereupon the Aediles late in charge and commision, to look straight-ly to this disorder: and that no other gods were worshipped, then those of the Romans: nor after any other manner than had been usual in their native country. So their anger against the Veientians, and desire of revenge, was put off unto the next year following, when C. Servilius Hala, and L. Pappus Maquilinus were Consuls. And even then, they made some temple to proclaim G war immediately, or to make out any power against them: but they thought good to lend their Heralds afore, to make claim for their own and challenge restitution. For whereas of late years there had been a field fought with the Veientians before Nomentum and Fidene: whereupon there followed no peace but only a truce concluded: both the time was now expired, and also before the day they had rebelled. Yet were there Heralds sent unto them. And when they had demanded amends by a solemn oath and other ceremonies according to the ancient manner, they might have no audience, neither were their words regarded. After this, there arose some question, whether the war should be proclaimed with the peoples allowance & suffrages, or or the Senates decrees were alone sufficient. The Tribuns by giving out and threatening that they would stop the multitudes obtained in the end, that Quintus the Consul should propound this matter concerning the war unto the people. And it passed clear through all the Centuries. Herein also had the Commonalty the better of it, for that they prevailed that there should be no Consuls chosen the year following. So there were four Tribuns military created with Consuls authority, T. Quintus Pennus immediately from his Consulship, C. Furius, M. Postumius, and Cornelius Cossus: of which Cossus had the charge and government of the City. The other three after they had mustered, took a journey to Vei, and made good proof how hurtful in war is the rule of many Commanders. For whilst every man was inclined to his own counsel and advice, and took divers courses one from another, they made way for the enemies and gave them advantage. For the Veientians taking their opportunity and time, entered upon the army thus distracted, whilst some commanded to sound a retreat, others the alarm and to strike up the battle. Whereupon they were disordered and put to flight. But for as much as the camp was near at hand, thither they retired themselves in safety: so as the shame they got was more then the harm in this defeat. The City was penive and hereupon sorrowed, as not used to take foiles and overthrows. The Tribuns they hated, and required a Dictator: in whom rested ever the whole hope and stay of the City. And when as even in that behalf, they made a matter of conscience, because there might not be any Dictator nominated, but by a Consul, the Augurs were consulted withal: who resolved them of that doubt and rid them of their scruple. So A. Cornelius (a consular Tribun) nominated Mamercus Emilius Dictator: by whom he was himself also pronounced Grand Master of the horsemen. At such default was the City then, of right valour and true virtue, that notwithstanding the prejudice by the Censors, yet there was no remedy, but the whole government of the state should rest upon that family, which had been wrongfully disgraced and unworthily noted by the Censors.

The Veientians proud of their late good success, albeit they sent their Embassadors about all the nations of Hetruria, boasting and vaunting that in one battle they had discomfited three Roman Generals, yet could not they with all their solliciting, persuade any to be seen to take part with them in publick action: but they procured divers from all parts for hope of spoil, voluntarily to aid and assist them. The people of Fidene only agreed to rebel. And as though it had been in no wife lawful, to begin any war but with some wicked, heinous and execrable fact: like as aforetime had embrewed their hands, and bathed their swords in blood of Embassadors, so then, they began with murdering their new received Coloners: and so banded themselves with the Veientians. Then consulted the Princes and States of those two nations, whether they should make Vei or Fidene the seat town of the war, Fidene was supposed the fitter and more commodious. So the Veientians passed over the Tyber, and translated the war to Fidene. Great fear was there at Rome to see the army of their enemies removed from Vei, and implanted at Fidene. And being shrewdly danted by their late overthrow besides, they encamped even before the gate Collina. On the walls were armed souldiers placed, vacation in all courts of law was ordained, shop windows shut up, and all more like a Leaguer than a City. Then sent the Dictator the Criers about into all streets and lanes, to summon the Citizens thus terrified, to a general assembly. Where he rebuked them for carrying such wavering and doubtful hearts upon so small accidents and events of fortune, having received but a slight loss and small foil: and that, not through the manhood of the enemy, or cowardise of the Roman army, but only through the disagreement and difference of the Leaders. "Also forth that they were afraid of the Veientian enemy, whom five or six times afore they had put to the world and vanquished. And especially of Fidene, which had been ofner in a manner won, then assailed. As for the Romans and their enemies (saith he) they are even the same (still that always for so many hundred years, they had been: bearing the same minds, the same bodily strength, and the same armor: and even my self am the same Mamercus Emilius, and no other, who heretofore discomfited at Nonentum the Veientians and Fidenatians, with the Pallians power also adjoined unto them. And as for A. Cornelius, he wil no doubt be the same General of horsemen in this battle, as in the former war he was: at what time he being a Knight Marshal, slew Lars Tolumnius the King of the Veientians, in the sight of two armies: and brought into the Temple of Jupiter Feretrius, the rich armor of him deploiled. Whereas ye ought to remember this, that we have on our side triumphs, spoils and victory: whereas with the enemies remaineth the wicked and detestable fact of killing the Embassadors, against the law of all nations: also the massacre of the Fidenatian inhabitants, in time of peace the breaking of truce, and their revolting now seven times to their ruin and overthrow. Take weapon therefore in hand like men: for I trust assuredly, that so soon as we shall join our camps together, and encounter these most wicked enemies, they shall have no long joy of the shameful discomfiture of the Roman army. And the people of Rome shall understand, how much better they have deserved of the Common-weal, who made me Dictator now the third time, than those who for clipping the Censors wings and abridging them of their kingly rule, had disdained and disgraced my second Dictatorship with the shameful blot of ignominy and reproach. After this speech, when he had made his vows accordingly: he encamped a mile and an half on this side Fidene, flanked on the right hand with the hills, and on the left with the river Tyber. And commanded T. Quintus Pennus his Lieutenant, to gain the hills above, and be possessed secretly of that cape or hill, which was on the back part of the enemies. Himself the next morning as when as the Tuscans, (full of pride and stomach for the prosperous success of former dayes, which was much better than their service in fight) came forth into the field: after he had stayed a while, until the Scouts and spies brought word, that Quintus was gotten safely unto the Hill top near adjoining to the Cattle or fort of the Fidenatians, he advanced forth his standards: and with his footmen ranged in battell array, marched against his enemies with full pace: commanding his General of the Horsemen not to charge without his warrant: for that he himself as need should require, would give the signal for the aid of his cavalry to come in, willing him then, to quit himself like a brave Knight in remembrance of his glorious combat with a King: "of his rich present and oblation: and of Romulus and Jupiter Feretrius. Thus the legions assailed one another and encountered right hardly. The Romans kindled and enflamed with rancour and malice, termed the Fidenatians, wicked and godless wretches: the Veientians, Robbers and Thieves: true-breakers both, polluted with the abominable murder of Embassadors: stayed with the execrable massacre of their cohabitants: faithles and treacherous allies, cowardly and daftardly enemies: thus both in word and deed they satisfied their hatred to the full: And at the very first shock forced their enemies to shrink. At which instant all at once, there issued out of the open gates of Fidene a strange army, not heard of nor usual, before that day: A mighty number armed with fireworks, and shining all over with burning lights, after a fanatical and mad manner, ran as if they were carried with spirits, upon their enemies: and with the uncouth sight of this kind of fight, amazed the Romans a pretty while. Then the Dictator busy in fight, having sent both for the General of the Cavalry with his troops of Horsemen, and also for Quintus from the mountains, hastened himself to the left point: which being terrified with a scarier fire more like than a battle, had given place unto the flame, and flepped back. Where with a loud voyce he thus spake: "What will ye be overcome with imoak like a swarm of Bees, and lose your ground, and retreat from your naked and unarmed enemies: will ye not put out this fire with redoubled stroke of brandishing swords? And will ye not every man for his part, if we must needs fight with fire, and not with weapons, pull from them their torches and firebrands, and fling them again at their own heads? Go to, I say, like hardy men, mindful of the renown of Romans, remembering the prowess of your Fathers, and your own selves. Turn this fire upon your enemies City, and consume Fidene into ashes with her own flames: this disloyal Fidene, which by no favors and good turns of yours, ye were ever able to win and pacifie. The blood of your Embassadors, the blood of your Coloners thither sent to people their City, your Frontiers and Borders by them wasted, put you in mind of no meaner revenge. At the Dictators commandment, the whole battailon was moved and encouraged. Some catch the firebrands as they flew, others by force snatch them from them, so that now both battels were armed with fire. The General of Horsemen for his part remueth the Horse service: commanding them to pluck the bits out of their Horses mouths, and was the first himself, that setting spurs to, rode with bridle in Horses neck, into the midst of the fire: and the other Horses also being pricked forward, and eased of their bridles, carried the riders with full career against the enemy. The dust rising together with the smoke, took the light from mens eyes, and Horses both. And that fight which had terrified the souldiers, nothing at all affrighted the Horses. Wherefore after that the men of arms rode, they bore down all afore them as if some Houles had come tumbling upon their heads. Herewith happened a new alarm to be heard, which having caused both armies to wonder and listen thereunto, the Dictator cryeth out aloud, That Quintus the Lieutenant and his Regiment, came upon the back of the enemies: and himself reinforcing the shout, advanced his ensigns forward more freshly. When as now two armies, and two divers battels, pressed fore upon the Tuscans, and environed them both before and behind: and that the enemies could neither flye back to their camp, nor yet retire or withdraw themselves unto the mountains, from whence a fresh supply of enemies, made head, and affronted them: and that the Horses being unbridled, carried the riders every way hither and thither: the most part of the Veientians ran scattering in disorder, and hither and thence, toward the Tyber: and the Fidenatians that remained to the City Fidene. But in that fearful flight they ran upon their own death. Some were killed on the banks of the River, others were driven into the water, and the stream and whirlepoils carried them away. And even they that were swimming, what with weariness, and what with faintness of their wounds and with fright, sunk and were drowned: so that few of many swam over in safety. The other army fled through their camp into the City. The same way also the Romans followed forcibly after: and Quintus especially, together with them who erewhile came down from the mountains, and were the freshest souldiers for fight (as who came last into the battle) and so afterwards entered pell-mell among their enemies into the gate, climbed upon the walls, and from the walls set up a banner to their fellows. In token that they had won the Town. Which as soon as the Dictator espied, (for now by this time had he made an entrance into the forlorn, and abandoned camp of his enemies) he brought the souldiers, upon desire to run to a spoil, and hoping of a greater laccage in the City, straight unto the gate. And being gotten within the walls, marcheth directly forward to the Castle, whereinto he beheld the multitude to flye for refuge and safety. The execution in the City was no less than in the field: which continued until they threw away their weapons, and craving nothing but life, yielded themselves to the Dictator. So both City and camp was spoiled and sacked. The morrow after, the Dictator disposed of his prisoners thus. He drew them by lot, and gave to every Horseman and Centurion one; and to as many as had done more valiantly than other, two spece: the rest he sold in portale. And so with triumph brought home to Rome his vict'neus army, enriched with a great booty: and having commanded the General of the Horfemen to reign up his office, himself also furrendreth his own, upon the sixteenth day after his creation, yeelding up his government in peace, which in time of war, and in a feartful state he had received.

There be some that have recorded in their Chronicles, that there was a battel fought with the Veientians at Fidene by ships upon the water. A thing verily, no leis impossible than in redibie. Considering that at this day, the river is not broad enough for such a purpose: and that at that time, (as by ancient men we have learned) it was far narrower than now it is. Unless haply in crossing over the river some vessels or bottoms, that were put out to meet and to receive them, I were layed. And so, men making the matter greater (as usually it cometh to pass) have desired a vain title of a naval victory at Sea. The year following, there were military Tribuns, with Consuls authority, A. Sempronius Atratinus, L. Quintus Cincinnatus, L. Furius Medullinus, and L. Horatius Barbatus. Then was there a t'rece granted unto the Veientians for twenty years, and to the Aquilans for three years, whereas they had made suit for more. Rest there was also from all feditions and brois in the City. The year following, having neither war abroad, nor yet fedition at home, was famous yet for the playes which in time of war had been vowed: both in regard of the great preparations that the Military Tribuns made, as also for the frequent reioit and concourie of the Nations adjoining. The Tribuns with Consuls authority, were Cl. Crassus, Sp. Nautius Rutilius, T. Sergius Fidenas, and Sexius Julius Tullus. The fight of these games and pattimes, & whereunto those strangers were come by publick consent of the States, was unto them more acceptable, in regard of the courtesy of those friends that gave them an intertainment. After these playes, there ensued feditious Orations of the Tribuns of the Commons, who rebuked the common multitude, for that they being beittout with admiration of those whom they had to hate, kept themselves in perpetual thraldome. And not only durst not attempt to put forth themselves (leaves for to bring in again the possibility to have Consuls of their part, as in times past) no, nor so much as in the creation of Military Tribuns (the Election of whom was indifferent as well for Commons as Nobles) were mindful or thought either upon themselves or their friends, and those of their own body: And therefore they should furcalle to marvel, why no man pleased for the benefit of the commonalty. For, travel is well belov'd, and danger well adventured, where profit and honor might be hoped and looked for. And nothing is to difficult but men would employ themselves to enterprife the same, if for the adventuring of great exploits, there might be propoised as great rewards. But, that any Tribun of the Commons should run desperately and blindly into a world of brawls and troubles, with great hazard of his person, and no hope at all of fruit and profit in the end: for which contention, he might be sure that the Nobles against whom he strived, would persecute him with deadly and irreconcilable malice: and as the Commons hands, for whom he thus contended, he should be honored and advanced: never the more, it was a thing neither to be expected, nor required. The only means to get courage and magnanimity, is advancement to high place of honor and dignity. And as for them, they would not did in the meanest commoner that was, if they themselves might be no more M' deputed. To conclude, the matter were worth the tryal in one of two, whether any commoner were sufficient to bear a great office of state: or whether it were a wondrous thing and strange miracle, that a valiant and hardy man should arise out of the commonalty. With much ado (say they) we got and obtained that Tribuns military with Consuls authority might likewise be chosen out of the commonalty: and men approved both in war abroad and in affairs of State at home, had sued therefore. In the first years they being nipped by you, and lo having the repulse, were had in derision of the Nobility: lo that at length they forbore to give themselves thus contumeliously to be misused and made fools. We see no cause therefore, why that law (so should not be repealed, wherein a dignity was granted, and never like to be obtained. For 'leis shame would there arise, if the law were not indifferent nor respective unto them, than as 'unmeet persons and unworthy, thus shamefully to be passed by and take the repulse. These and such like speeches were heard with so good an ear and general applause, that some of them were incited forward to sue for the Military Tribunship: whiles every one promised in the time of his office to do great matters, and to propose, some one thing, some another, for and concerning the benefit of the Commons. Pretending great hopes of dividing the common Lands, and planting of colonies abroad, and laying tributes and impositions upon landed persons, for to pay soldierys wages. But the Tribuns military then in place, devised to spy out a time, when upon some occasion of the absence of much people departed out of the City, the Senators by a privy and secret warning, should at a certain day be called home: and then, whiles the Tribuns of the Commons were away, an act of Senate should passe in this form: That forasmuch as it was notified that the Volckians were entered into the Lands of the Hernicks to forrage and rob, the military Tribuns should go to see whether it were so or no, and that in the mean while there should be held a general assembly for the Election of Consuls. The Tribuns military took their journey accordingly, and left Appius Claudius the Decemvirs son, Governour of the City, a stout young Gentleman and a forward, who from his very cradle bare an inward grudge and hatred against the Tribuns and the Commons. And bootles it was either for the Tribuns of the Commons to find themselves grieved with those, who made the decree, now that they were absent,

The Tribuns Orations to the Commons.

A absent, nor yet had they cause to quarrel with Appius Claudius, because the thing had been contrived and palli'd afore his time. So, Consuls were created, C. Sempronius Atratinus, and Quintus Fabius Vibulanus.

A forein matter, but yet worthy to be remembered and here inferred, is reported to have happened that year: to wit, that Volturnum a City of the Tuscans, which now is Capua, was by the Samnites taken: and that it came to be named Capua of one Capis their Captain, for (which I would much like a truth) of the champion field. But they wan it by this means, For upon occasion that the Tuscans were wearied with former wars, they were admitted into the society of their City and territory. And on a solemn festival day, when as the citizens had filled their bellies, and were found asleep, these new Coloners the Samnites, let upon the old inhabitants, and in the night season slew them all.

But now to return. Things passing thus (as I said before) the Consuls abovenamed upon the Ides of December, entered their government. By which time not only they which were of purpose sent to learn the news of the Volckians, brought word that war was at hand, but Embassadors also from the Latins and Hernicks, gave intelligence of the same. And namely, that never at any time afore, the Volckians were more busily and occupied, either in chusing of good Captains, or in levying an army, giving out these speeches abroad and in every place, That the time was now come, either to forget warfare, and lay away soldiery, and for ever make account to bear the yoke of thraldome: or else not to give one foot, nor come behind those with whom they strove for sovereignty, either in manhood or in painful travel, or in Discipline of warfare. And surely they were no vain tidings that those messengers reported. But the Senators would take no such knowledge, nor be greatly moved at the matter. And withal, C. Sempronius, unto whom the charge of that war was allotted, presuming upon fortune, as if he were always right constant and at command, and leading an army of a people used to victory, against those that were wont to be overcome, did all things rashly and negligently. So as to speak a truth, there was more Roman Discipline in the Volckian host, than in the Roman. And lo, fortune (as oftentimes else) went with verue. At the first encounter, which by Sempronius was unexpectidly and unadvisedly begun, before that either the battalions were reinforced and strengthened with fresh supplies of succour, or the Horfemen ranged in convenient place, they ran together, add came to hand strokes. And the first token which way the victory would incline, was the manner of shout at the first charge: which by the enemy was more loud, more shrill and continual: but by the Romans distant, unequal, dead and cold, often begun, and often remmed: and by their uncertain and variable noise, they bewayed the inward fear of their hearts. Whereupon the enemies lo much the more eagerly charged them, pressing upon them with their shields, and laying at them thick with their bright swords: on the other side, the Romans helmets wag, and their crests, not every way as they look about them: and as they were to seek what to do, so they tremble and run together on heaps: one while the ensigns stand still, and were abandoned of the foremost fighting in the vanguard another while they retired in again amongst their own squadrons. Yet was not the flight certain, nor yet the victory. The Romans fought more to cover and shrowd themselves than to fight: to ward blows rather than to strike. The Volckians let forward their ensigns, pressed upon the main battel, and saw more enemies under foot than running away. And now in all places the Romans retired, notwithstanding Sempronius the Consul both rebuked and also exhorted them to stick to it: for neither his commandment nor the authority and Majesty of his countenance prevailed ought. And immediately had they all turned their backs on their enemies, if Sex. Tempanius, a Decurion of Horfemen, had not in this desperate case, with a resolute courage and ready advice, helped at a pinch: Who cried with a loud voyce, that those Horfemen which would the safety of the common wealth, should dismount off their Horses. And when the Cornets of Horfemen bestirred themselves at his words no less than if the Consul had given commandment: "Unleis (saith he) this troupe of men of arms, stay the violence of the enemies, we see the last of the Roman Empire. Follow therefore in stead of banner displayed, the point of my lance: let both Romans and Volckians see, that no nation is comparable to you, either for foot or for Horse. Whole encouragement being approved and received with a shout, he advanced forward, bearing his staff aloft: and what way soever they go, they enter and make room with forcible sway: and where they see their fellows in greatest distress, thither they make speed, opposing their targets afore them. And thus in every place whereas they thrust themselves forcibly, was the fight renewed: and doubleles the enemies had turned their backs, if possible it had been, for so few to have performed every thing at once. Now when as the General of the Volckians, saw his men not able to withstand them, he gave a signal and charge to give way to this new band of enemies, to wit, these Targeteers: until such time as they had put themselves so forward that they might be excluded from their fellows. Which being done, these Horfemen were encloed on every side: neither could they break through that way whither they went, because the enemies were there thickly, where they had made their lane before. The Consul, then, with the legions of the Romans, having lost the fight of those that had been a shield of defence and bulwark ere while to the whole army, left that so many hardy men thus invironed, should be overpressed by the enemies: rejoyed to adventure any peril or hazard whatsoever. The Volckians were likewise diversly occupied & troubled, For on the one side they bare off the Consul and legions: on the other side they affronted Tempanius fore, & the Horfemen: who seeing that after many allies and officers offers they could not break forth to their fellows, gat up unto a certain little Hill, and cast themselves into a ring and stood to their defence, not without doing some mischief to their enemies: neither gave they over fighting until night. The Consul also maintained the battle so long as he could see, and kept the enemy play. So the night parted them asunder, and uncertain it was who had the upper hand. And for that the event was unknown, who sped the better, so great a terror came upon both parts in their camps, that leaving the wounded and a great part of their carriages behind, both armies as taking themselves losers, recovered the mountains that were next unto them. Howbeit the Hill or bank aforesaid, continued still beset round about, until midnight. But when word was brought thither to the Aſſailants, how that their camp was abandoned: they thinking their fellows vanquished, were also for their part affrighted, and made shift and fled in the dark as well as they could. Tempanius, tearing an ambushment, kept his men there together until day light. Then went he down with a few to discover the coasts: and finding by enquiry made of the wounded enemies, that the tents of the Volſcians were left and forsaken: he was full glad thereat, and called down his souldiers from the mount, and entrench into the Roman camp. Where seeing all void and forlorn, and finding the same desolation which was amongst the enemies: before that the Volſcians upon knowledge of their error should return again, he took with him those hurt souldiers that he could: and not knowing to what quarters the bruit of this unlucky fight, and of abandoning the tents, was arrived. But above all the rest, those Horsemen were bewailed, and great moan and lamentation was made for them as well in private as in public. The Cof. Fabius, seeing the City also terrified with this news, kept ward before the gates: by which time, they might discover the Horsemen aforesaid afar off: but not without some fear of their parts, doubting who they were. But being soon known, they caused to great contentment after former fear, that in most joyful manner, the noise went through the City, how the Horsemen were returned safe with victory. And out of those mourning and sorrowful houses, which a while afore had bid adieu to their friends and kinsfolk, and bewailed their death, they ran into the streets and high ways by heaps. The fearful dames also and wives, forgetting, for joy all decent and womanly modesty, went out to meet the army, fell every one with open arms upon their own husbands and sons, took them about the neck, clipped and kissed them, and with all their hand and heart received them: yea, and for exceeding joy were almost past themselves.

The Tribuns of the Commons, who had challenged and accused M. Posthumus and T. Quinctius, for that by their default, there was an unlucky fight before Vej: seemed to have good occasion and opportunity offered now, by bringing the Consul Sempronius into fresh and new hatred and disgrace, for to renew the conceived displeasure and malice of the people against them. Having assembled together the people together, with open mouth they declared, that the Commonwealth was betrayed first, at Vej by the leaders, and afterwards, because they went clear away without, and unpunished, therefore the army in Polſei was likewise lost by the Consul: and that a troop of most valiant knights were thus cast away and given to be murdered, and the camp flame-fully left and forsaken. Then C. Julius, one of the Tribuns, commanded Tempanius the Horseman to be called, and before him all said, "I would know of thee O Sextus Tempanius, whether thou think that C. Sempronius the Consul, either began battle in good time, or strengthened his battalions with good succors and supplies? or whether thou thyself, when as the Roman legions and footmen were discomfited, of thine own head and policy, causedst the Horsemen to alight on foot, and thereby reinforced the fight? Afterwards, when thou and thy men of arms were shut out from our battle, whether either the Consul himself came to rescue, or sent any succor unto thee? Last of all, whether the morrow after, thou hadst any aid or rescue at all? Whether thou and thy troop of Horsemen brake through into the camp by your own hardiness and valor? And whether ye found in the camp any Consul or army, or rather the pavilions abandoned, and the souldiers left behind, hurt and wounded? To these premises and points, he haſt thou to speak this day upon thy virtue, and the faith of a souldier: by which only, in this war-service the Commonwealth hath found preserved. Finally, where C. Sempronius, and where our legions be? Whether thou were forsaken thyself, or whether thou forsookeſt the Consul and the army? And to conclude, whether we have lost or won the field? To these demands, Tempanius made (as they say) no fine Oration, but a grave pithy speech like a souldier: not full of flattery-praises, nor shewing any gladness for the fault of another, and answered in this wise: How great skill (quoth he) of martial feats, and what sufficiency is in C. Sempronius, it is not for me a souldier to judge, nor yet to make any estimate of my General: but it was for the people of Rome to determine thereof, at what time as by their suffrages and voices, in a solemn Election, they chose him Consul. "And therefore ye are not to enquire of me, and to be informed, either of the policies of a General Captain, or virtues and duties of a Consul: deep points to be examined, O weighed, and discomfited by great wits, reaching heads, and high minds. But for that which I with mine eye saw, I am able to make report and testify; namely, That before himself was excluded out of the battle, I beheld the Consul fighting manfully in the vanguard, encouraging his men earnestly, and even amongst the Roman Standards, and Pikes of the enemies, busily employed. After which I was carried from the sight of my fellows, howbeit by the ill noise and shouting, I well perceived, that the conflict continued until night. Neither was it possible (as I thought) for them to break through unto the Hill which I kept, by reason of the multitude

The modest answer of Tempanius, to the former Interrogatories.

A "of enemies between. As for the army, what is become of it, I know not: But I suppose, that as I myself in an extremity and fearful case, defended myself and my men, by advantage of the ground: so the Consul for to save the army, took some more late place to encamp in. Neither think I verily, that the Volſcians stood in better terms than the Romans fortune was. And the "darkness of the night (no doubt) caused error and confusion on every side, and in all places. After which speech when as he belought them, not to hold him any longer, wearied with travel, and faint of his wounds: he was with exceeding praise both of his valiant service and also of his modest speech, licensed to depart.

Whiles these things thus passed, the Consul by that time, had marched by the way of Lavinium as far as to the Temple of Quies: thither were wains, draught-beasts and innkeeper Horfes sent from the City, to receive and ease the army, toiled out with fight, and tired by journeying all night. Within a while after, the Cof. entered into the City: who endeavoured not more, to put the fault from himself, than to extol Tempanius, and give him his due deserved praises. Now whiles the City was sad and heavy for this hard hap, and angry also with the Captains: behold, M. Posthumus, who before had been accused, was now presented unto the people, for to wreak their choler and malice upon. He had been a Tribune Military in place of a Cof. at Vej, and now was condemned, & a fire set on his head of ten thousand Aſſes of brass. But as for Titus Quintius, his fellow in government, because that among the Volſcians he had served fortunately as Consul, under the conduct of Posthumus Tiberius the Dictator: and likewise at Fidene, as Lieutenant of the other Dictator Manerius Amplius, and laid the whole fault of that other time from himself upon his colleague before condemned: he was found ungilty and acquit by all the Tribes. It is said that the fresh remembrance of his father Cincinnatus, late a right worshipful citizen, helped him much: Yea, and Capitolineus Quintius a very aged man, did him no hurt, who humbly besought them that they would not suffer him, having but a while in this world to live, for to be the carrier of so heavy news unto Cincinnatus. The Commons made Tribuns of the commonalty, Sex. Tempanius, A. Silius, Sex. Antifilius, and Sex. Pompilius in their absence: whom also the Horsemen had chosen for their Captains or Centurions, in the former exploit, by the advice and counsel of Tempanius. But the Senators, because now for hatred of Sempronius the name of Consuls misliked and offended them, determined that military Tribuns with Consuls authority, should be created. So there were chosen L. Manlius Capitolinus, Q. Antonius Merenda, L. Pappyrus Murgilius,

In the very beginning of the year L. Hortensius the fifth Tribune of the commonalty, accused C. Sempronius the Consul of the former year. And when as his other four fellows in office, in the sight of the people of Rome besought him, not to trouble their guiltless Captain, in whom nothing could be blamed or found fault withal, but adverse fortune: Hortensius could hardly abide, but thought it was but to prove and trye his resolute constancy: and that the party accused, trusted not upon the prayer and intercession of the Tribuns, which only for a shew was pretended, but upon their support and assistance. And therefore turning one while to Sempronius himself, demanded what was become of that haughty courage and stomach, so ordinary in those of Senators calling? and where was that magnanimity which relied and relied upon innocency? Since that he having been a Consul, was fain to shelter and throw himself under the shadow and protection of the Tribuns? Another while directing his speech to his fellow Tribuns: but you my Masters (quoth he) what will ye do? if I prosecute mine action against him still, and convict him in the end: Will ye take from the people their right, and overthrow the authority of the Tribuns among the Commons? When they again said and inferred, that the people of Rome had absolute power to do what they would, both with Sempronius, and all others: and that they neither would nor could abridge the people of their judgment. But if (say they) our prayers in the behalf of our General, who was to us in stead of a father, may not avail, then will we together with him change our weed for company. Nay, God forbid (quoth Hortensius) The Commons of Rome shall never see their Tribuns arrayed in soiled and mournful apparel. And as for C. Sempronius, I have now no more to say to him, since that he hath carried himself off, whiles he was General, as that he hath gained thus much, as to be so dearly beloved of his souldiers. Neither was the kindness of those four Tribuns more acceptable to the Commons and Nobles, than the good nature of Hortensius, who at their reasonable request, was so easily to be pacified and intreated.

It was no long time that fortune frowned upon the Æquians: who embraced the doubtful victory of the Volſcians, and took it as their own. The next year after, when Cn. Fabius Vibulanus, and T. Quintius Capitolinus, the son of Capitolineus, were Consuls: by the leading of Fabius, unto whom was allotted that Province, nothing was done there worthy of remembrance. For when as the Æquians had made semblance of a battle, and brought their army only in fight, they were in fearful wise soon discomfited, and shamefully fled, mislittering no matter of great honor to the Cof. And therefore was he denied triumph. But yet because the ignominy of the loss which happened by Sempronius, was partly allayed, it was granted that he might enter Orant into the City. [A General was said to enter Orant into the City, when ordinarily without his army following him he went on foot, or rode on Horseback only, and the people in their Acclamations for joy redoubled Oho or Oho. So that Orant is as much as Oratio: Howsoever, some think that Orant took the name of sacrificing a sheep. But he rode in triumph, when his souldiers attended him in his chariot, crying Io Triumph. In this he carried a branch or wreath of laurel, in the other of Myrtle. So that the Ovation was a less honor than the Triumph. And it was granted to inferior persons, and for meaner desert. Whereas, none usually might triumph, unless he were Dictator, Cof, or Pretor, and had slain in field 5000 enemies at the least, won much spoil and pillage, and augmented the State of the Roman Empire. Like as the war was dispatched with less ado than they feared: so in the City, after a calm and peaceable state, there arose between the Commons and Nobles, a world of discords and troubles more than they expected. Which began upon occasion of doubling the number of Questors. For when the Consuls had propounded, that besides two Questors or Treasurers of the City, there should be other twain ready to attend upon the Consuls, for all services and charges belonging to war: and when the Nobles also with all their power had approved it, the Tribunes of the Commons entered into a contention with the Consuls, and required that some of the Questors (for until that time they had been created from out of the degree of the Patrij) might be likewise of the Commons. Against which demand, at the first, both Consuls, and also the Nobles, laboured with might and main. But afterwards having granted this much, that as the use and practise was in creating of Tribunes with Consuls authority, so in like manner, in the Election of Questors, the people should have their free liberty to chule. And seeing they gained little thereby, and could effect no good, they wholly let fall their former matter, about increasing the number of the Questors. But although it were thus by them given over, the Tribunes took it in hand again, and set it on foot: yea, and other tedious actions besides very often sprang forth, and among the rest, that also concerning the Law Agraria. Upon which troubles, when as the Senate was of mind, that there should be Consuls rather than Consular Tribunes created: and by reason of the Tribunes stepping between with their negative voice, no decree of the Senate could passe, the government of the Commonwealth was devolved from Consuls to an Interregnum, but not without exceeding great debate: for that the Tribunes kept the Patrij from meeting and packing together. Now when as the greater part of the year following was spent, with much strife and contention between the new Tribunes and certain Interregents, whiles one while the Tribunes stayed the Nobles from assembling together about the chusing of an Interregent, and another while crossed the Interregent for granting out any Act of Senate or warrant, for the election of Consuls: at the last, L. Papirius Mugillanus, being declared Interregent, sometimes rebuked the Nobles, and sometimes blamed the Commons, and said: "That the Commonwealth neglected and forsaken of all men was taken into protection of the Gods, and guided by their care and providence: standing upright, and safe only, upon the truce observed by the Veientians, and the slow speed of small halt that the Aquians made to war. From whence, if any trouble should happen to arise, it is your will (quoth he) and pleasure belike that the state should be surprised and assailed, while it is without any Magistrate of the Nobility. For neither is there an army ready, nor yet a Captain to raise an army. What? think ye to put back forsworn war abroad by civil discord at home? What? if they both should come together, there were no other remedy, though all the Gods in Heaven should set to their helping hand, but that the Commonwealth of Rome should utterly be subverted. Yet rather remit every one of you somewhat of the rigor of your full jurisdiction, and (for the love of God) take some indifferent course to joyn in unity: the Nobles for their part, by suffering Military Tribunes to be created in lieu of Cof, the Tribunes again by no more thwarting and interposing their negative, but that four Questors may be chosen by the free voices of the people, from out of the Commons and Nobles, one with another. First therefore was the High Court held for choosing sovereign Tribunes: and Tribunes there were created in Consular authority, all of the Nobility: namely, L. Quintus Cincinnatus the third time, Sex. Furius Medullinus the second time, M. Manlius, and A. Sempronius Atratinus. When this Tribunal last named, was president of the Election for Questors, and the son of Atratinus a Tribune of the Commons, and a brother besides to another Tribune, one S. x. Pomplius stood for the dignity, among certain other of the Commons: neither all their own means that they could make, nor all the voices they could procure, were able to prevail, but that the people preferred persons to replace according to their gentry and high birth: namely, whole fathers and grand-fathers they had seen Consuls. All the Tribunes of the Commons stormed and chafed at this, but especially Pomplius and Atratinus, being set on fire at the repulse of these their friends. "What should this mean (say they) that none of the Commons, neither in regard of their own merits, nor considering the injuries at the Nobles hands nor yet for desire they might pierce to the first handle of that authority, which now was lawful, and never heretofore: that none of the Commons (I say) was created, if not a Military Tribune, yet not so much as a Questor? What, that neither the fathers prayer in the behalf of his son, nor a brothers suit in favour of a brother, being Tribunes both of them, invested in that sacred authority, and which first was erected for the maintenance of common freedom, could ought at all prevail? Surely there is some fraud and juggling in the matter: and A. Sempronius, hath in the Election used more art and cunning than truth and fidelity. O Complaining that by his injurious and indirect dealing, their friends had taken the foil. When as therefore they might not by any violence touch his own person and attach him, being fenced with innocency in this action, and secured by virtue of the office which then he bore: they wreaked their selves and discharged their choler upon C. Sempronius, the cousin german of Atratinus: by the brother: and with the help of M. Canuleius, one of their colleagues, arrested him for the ignominious service in the Volscian war. Ever and anon, also the same Tribunes made some words and motion in the Senate-house, concerning the division of Lands, and revived the law

Agraria

Agraria (which C. Sempronius at all times most sharply and eagerly had withstood, Supposing, as it fell out indeed, that the accused person should either by giving over the cause, be lets esteemed of the Nobles: or if he stood to it till until the time of judgment drew near, he should displease and offend the Commons. But he chose rather to be the object of the displeasure and malice of the people, that were opposed and bent against him, and so to wound his own private estate: than to betray the common and public cause: and perished resolute in the same made (till that there should no bribing donative be granted, that might win and procure favour unto those three corrupt Tribunes: "For it is not land and living (quoth he) that they shoot at, for the benefit of the Commons: that is not their seeking: but their drift is to work and procure displeasure unto me: and therefore I will stormy part, abide that storm and tempest with a resolute mind. And the Senate ought not to esteem either of me, or of any citizen else so highly, as to buy the sparing of one man so dear, even with the harm and damage of the whole state. The day of judicial trial came. When as he had pleaded for himself, and seemed nothing daunted at the matter: yet for all that ever the Nobles could do, who tried all means, but in vain, to mitigate and delay the heat of the Commons, condemned he was in "fifteen thousand Asles. The same year P. P. h. m. a Vestal Nun, was called in question for incontinency and in chastity, and came to her answer. A Virgin guileless for any deed done: but scarcely of good name and fame: by reason that she was suspected for her apparel and going more light and garish in her attire: yea, and for her wit, more concited and pleasant, than became a maid, and nothing respective of the speech of the world. Her trial was put over to a farther day, and she (after she had twice pleaded) in the end was acquitted: only the high Priest by the advice, and in the name of the whole college, rebuked her, and gave her warning to leave her sports, taunts, and merry conceits: and in her payment to be clean not to go as devout, and wear her garments rather sanctity than lightly. The year following had military Tribunes with Consuls authority, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus, P. Lucretius Tricipitinus, Sp. Nautius Servilius. A year, by the happiness and good fortune of the people of Rome, more notable for a danger elapsed, than for any harm received. Certain bond-servants had conspired to fire the City in divers places far and near: for this intent, when the people should be busily occupied, here and there, to divers their houses, then by force and armes to surpris the Castle and Capitol. But Jupiter turned away and disappointed their wicked design. For by the peaching and information of twain, the rest of the malefactors were taken and executed. For those that disclosed and revealed the conspiracy, had ten thousand pound in brass money (which was in those days thought to be great riches) weighed them out of the City chamber, and freedom besides, for their reward.

After this, began the Aquians to renew war: and word was brought to Rome by credible persons, that certain new enemies also, to wit, the Lavicans, joyned together in counsel with the old. These Aquians, were good neighbours: for once a year ordinarily, they were put to the City of Rome to the pains of warring with them, and not mis. Embassadors then were sent to the Lavicans, who brought doubtful answers from thence: whereby it appeared that neither at that instant they were ready to war, nor yet were like to continue long in peace. The Tribunes were charged, to take good heed, and have an eye that way, that no new stir and trouble should arise at Lavice. There came Embassadors from Tusculum, to L. Sergius Fidenus, M. Papirius Mugillanus, and C. Servilius, the son of Q. Servilius Priscus: (by whom, being Dictator, Fidenus was won) who were Military Tribunes in Consuls authority the year following. These Embassadors brought news that the Lavicans were out, and in armes, and joyning with the Aquians army, had foraged the country of Tusculum, and encamped themselves in Agidium. Then was war proclaimed against the Lavicans. And when by a decree made by the Senate, that two of the Consular Tribunes should go to war, and one manage the affairs of Rome: there arose a contention on a Sunday, among the said Tribunes. Every one thought himself the meekest and most sufficient man, to be General of the war, refusing the charge of the City, as a bale, dishonourable, and thankless office. As the Senators mused and wondered, to see amongst those that were fellows in government so undecent a strife and contention; then Q. Servilius: "Seeing that (quoth he) there is no reverent regard, either of this honorable house, or of the Commonwealth: the father his contentment e, "dread Majesty, shall end this debate. My son without any lot calling, shall govern the City as President. God grant, that they which love war so well, may manage it with more discretion and concord than they wish it. As for a general muster to be levied out of all the people indifferently, that was not liked of. So ten Tribes were drawn by lot, out of which, the younger sort were prest forth to war under the conduct of the two Tribunes. The strife which began to be kindled among them in the City, through the same desire fill of sovereignty, brake forth and grew much hotter in the camp. In nothing agreed they, striving whose opinion should stand: each one would have his own way: his own commandments obeyed and none else: one despised another, and were despised one of the other: until at length, upon the Lieutenants reproof, they grew to this point, and this order was taken: That they should each on other day, rule one alone by himself absolutely. Which news being brought to Rome, it is reported that Q. Servilius, a man for his years and long experience right skillful, prayed of the immortal Gods, that by the variance and discord of the Tribunes, the Commonwealth sustained no more harm, than they had received at Fiden. As if there were no doubt, but that some great loss and overthrow was ready to happen, he was instant upon his son, to levy souldiers, and to provide munition for war. Neither proved he a false and vain Prophet. For by the leading of L. Sergius, whose day it was to rule, when as the enemy under a colour of fear, withdrew unto the trench, and to trayed them thither upon a foolish hope to win the camp, even under the very camp of the enemies in an uneven ground of disadvantage, they were suddenly charged by the Æquians, discomfited and chased down the valley: and many in their fall, which was greater than the flight, were trod under foot and slain, and with much ado that day kept they their own tents. The morrow after, when as now the enemies had beset a great part of the camp, they shamefully fled away, at the back gate, and forsook the camp. The Captains, Lieutenants, and the strength remaining of the army, which kept to their ensigns and colours, went to Tusculum. Other that were scattered here and there about the fields by sundry ways, made halt to Rome, and reported there the overthrow to be greater than indeed it was. Left was the trouble and sorrow, because men looked for no better issue and success: and also for that, there was help and succour (which they were to have an eye unto in to fearful a case) provided by the Tribunes aforehand. At whose commandment, when as the tumult was by the inferior Magistrates appeared in the City, espials were sent out in haste: who brought word that the Captains and the army was at Tusculum: and that the enemy had not removed his camp. And then (which encouraged them most of all) by the Senates decree, Q. Servilius Priscus was chosen Dictator, a man whose Providence over the Common-wealth, the City as many other times afore, so in the event of that war had experience of: for that he only suspected the contention of the Tribunes afore this unhappy toil. Who having nominated General of the Horsemen, his son (as some say) by whom being military Tribune, himself was declared Dictator (for others there be that write how Servilius Hala was that year General of the Horse) went forth with a fresh army to war, and having joynted unto him those which were at Tusculum, he pitched his tents, two miles from the enemy. But see the fruit of good success. The pride and negligence which had been amongst the Roman Captains, went from them to the Æquians. Therefore in the first beginning of the conflict, when the Dictator with his Horsemen whom he sent against them, had disordered and put out of array the foremost ranks of the enemies, then commanded he the ensigns of the legionary footmen with all speed to follow hard upon: and one ensign-bearer of his own, who made some stay, he flew with his own hand. Then were they to earnestly set to give an hot charge, that the Æquians could not abide their force: and being in fight overthrowen, when as they fled all main to the camp, the assault thereof was both shorter and with less ado, than was the battel. When the camp was taken and spoiled, and that the Dictator had given the pillage unto the souldiers: and that the Horsemen, which chased the enemies from the camp, had brought word back, that all the Lavicans were overthrowen, and a great part of the Æquians were fled to Lavicos: the day following was the army also led thither, and the Town compassed and beset round about, scaled, and sacked. The Dictator having brought home to Rome his victorious army, upon the eighth day after he was chosen, gave over his office. And in very good time, before there was any edition stirred up about the Law Aggraria, by the motion of the Tribunes of the Commons, for the division of the Lavicans Lands: the whole body of the Senate appointed that a Colony should be sent to Lavicos. So there were sent from the City M a thousand and five hundred to inhabit there, and two acres apiece given them of Land.

A Colony
planted at Lavicos.

After the winning of Lavicos, there were created Military Tribunes with Consuls authority, to wit, Agrippa Menenius Lanatus; and L. Servilius Structus, with P. Lucertius Tricipitinus (all three the second time) and Sp. Velutius Crassus: and the year following A. Sempronius Atratinus, the third time, and these twain, M. Pappius Mugillanus, and Sp. Nauius Rutilius the second time: for these two years there was peace abroad, but discord at home about the Laws Aggraria. They that troubled the people, were Sp. Mælius, who now the fourth time, and Mætilius, who the third time were made Tribunes of the Commons, both absent. And when they had published their Act, That all Lands conquered from the enemies, should be divided by the poll: by which Ordinance, the possessions of a great part of the Nobility became confiscate, (for since their City was situated and built in a strange ground, there was in a manner no Land lay to it, which had not been purchased by the sword: neither enjoyed the Commons any, but that which either had been sold or assigned to the Commons) this seemed to be a bone cast between the Nobles and the Commons, to set them together at strife and contention. Neither knew the Military Tribunes any way to take counsel in this case, albeit one while they assembled the Senate, and another while met in private conference with the Nobility. Then Appius Claudius, (the nephew or grandson of notorious Appius the Decemvir, created for the making of Laws) the puny of all the council of the Nobility, made (as it is reported) this speech, and said, "That he would impart unto them that which he had received by tradition from his ancestors, to wit, an old device, and appropriate to his house, for that his great grandire Appius Claudius, had shewed unto the Nobles "the only way, to abate and take down the Tribunes power: namely, by the coming between "and negative voice of their fellows. For men new come up, and risen to promotion, might "soon by the authority of the chief rulers be brought from their purpose, and made to change "their mind, if otherwhiles those great men in place would use some speech upon them fitted and "framed rather to the time and present occasion, than respective to their own high place and dignity: for evermore the heart and courage of such, is according to their degree and wealth. And "when they see once their fellows possessed with force of the cause, and thereby creep wholly

A "into all the favour with the Commons, and that no room is left for themselves to have any "part thereof, they will be willing enough to encline and ondescend unto the Senate, and take "their part: by means whereof they might wind into the love and good grace of that univer- "sal State, and particularly with the principal Lords of the Nobility. Which speech, when they all had approved, and especially Q. Servilius Priscus, who praised the young Centurion, for that he was not grown out of kind, nor degenerate from the stock and race of the Clauus, then every man was set about this business, to see whom of the College or company of Tribunes they could win and draw to cross and stop the Act for going forward. The Senate now being broken up, the chief of the Nobles caught hold of the Tribunes, and were in hand with them, perswading, exhorting, and assuring them, that they should every one in private gratify not only, but also the whole body of the Senate in general: and never gave over, until they had procured fix of them to interpose their negative, and to cross the Law. The morrow after, when as of purpose a matter was propounded afore the Senate, about the edition which Mætilius had raised, by a Largess of dangerous consequence: such speeches were by the principal of the Nobles delivered, that each one for himself confessed, that now they were to seek for counsel, and saw no other help nor remedy but in the authority of the Tribunes: to the protection and safeguard of which Magistracy, the Common-wealth becom her self, and fled for succour, as being beset with danger, like some poor private person, and had no other means to save herself: saying, That it would be good for themselves, and also for their authority, an honorable thing, if it might appear, that the Consul and of their Tribuneship were not more employed in molesting the Senate, and making discord amongst the States than in reuniting the peevish wills of their colleagues. Whereupon arose a great noise through the whole company of the Senators, whiles out of all parts of the Court there assembled, they called upon the Tribunes for their helping hand. Then after silence made, they (who for the favour of the Lord of the Senate, were made aforehand to their cause) declared and confessed, that they were ready to cross that Act, by their fellows published, seeing the Senate judged it to be prejudicial to the Common-wealth. These Tribunes for the offer of their good service, were by the Senate highly thanked. But the Authors and Patrons of the Act afore said, calling together an assembly of the Commons, when they had inveighed against their fellows most sharply, terming them betrayers of the Common-wealth, and slaves to the Nobles: and using other bitter speeches, gave over their action and suit.

Two grievous wars had continued all the year next following (wherein P. Cornelius Cossus, C. Valerius Potitus, Quintus Cincinnatus, and M. Fabius Vibulanus, were military Tribunes in Consilium) but that the Veientian war was deferred by the superstitious fear of their own Princes: whose grounds, Tybris (overflowing the banks) had spoiled, and overthrowen also the villages and houses that stood thereupon. The Æquians likewise by reason of their loss received three years before, made no great haste to aid and assist the Volans, a people of their own nation. For they had made certain rides into the Lavicans Country, confining upon them, and warred upon the inhabitants, lately there planted. Which trespass by them done, they hoped to have been able to maintain by the banding and assistance of all the Æquians: but being forsaken of their allies, they lost both their Town and territory, only by siege, and one light skirmish, and never fought for any memorable war. L. Sextius also Tribune of the Commons, assayed to make an Act, that there might be sent to Vole as well as to Lavicos, Colonisers to people it: but by the negative of his Associates, who shewed, that they would not suffer any Statute of the Commons to pass without the assent of the Senate, it came to nothing.

In the year following, the Æquians having recovered and won again Vole, and brought a Colony thither, fortified the Town with a fresh power, at what time were Tribunes Military in Consilium authority at Rome, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, L. Valerius Potitus, Q. Fabius Vibulanus the second time, and M. Posthumius Regillensis. The war against the Æquians, was committed to this Posthumius, a man of a crooked disposition, as his victory shewed more than the whole craft of the war. For having levied an army in haste, and brought it before Vole, after some small skirmishes, he turned the Æquians and at length entered the Town. And when he had done with the enemies, he began to quarrel with his own souldiers: for whereas during the time of the assault, he had given out by Proclamation, That they should have the facage after the Town was won: once he brake promise with them. For I am induced to believe that this was the cause rather why the army murmured and was discontented, than for that in a Town lately sacked before and in a new Colony there was found less spoil than the Tribune made boast of. But this displeasure and anger once conceived was made the worse after that he returned into the City: for being sent for by his fellows upon occasion of the Tribunitian seditions, there elapsed him an indelible speech. I must needs lay yea, and without all fence, wit, and honesty. Which he let fall in an assembly of the Commons: wherein it happened that as Sextus a Tribune of the Commons, was preferring the law Aggraria and saying withal, That he would propose an Act that Colonisers should likewise be sent to Vole for that they were worthy to have both the Town and Lands of Vole, who had by sword and spear conquered the time. Posthumius caught the word out of his mouth: And that shall my souldiers, dearly abide (quoth he) unless they be more quiet, which word being overheard offended not to the Commons presently there in place assembled, as the Lords of the Senate awhile after. Moreover the Tribune afore said an active man, and eloquent withal, having among his adversaries met with a proud humorous spirit, and an insolent and intemperate tongue, which walked to ireeily and so long by his provocation, that he uttered these speeches, whi. h bred not only ill will and displeasure to himself, but also wounded the cause, and the whole state of the Patrii; This Sextus (I say) was busy, and quarrelling with none of all the Military Tribuns: more than with Posthumus. And even at that time, taking advantage of the same cruel and inhuman speech of his: Hear ye not, O ye Commons (quoth he) how he threatneth mischief unto his soldiers, as unto bondslaves? "And yet this beast ye will think more worthy of io great dignity wherein ye have placed him, than thole that induce you with house and lands, that lend you abroad to inhabit Colonies, that provide habitation for you against old age, that tending your wealth, take part and defend you against io cruel and proud adversaries. Begin now henceforth to marvel why io few take in hand to maintain your cause: For what may they look for, and hope at your hands? for honors, which ye bestow rather upon your adversaries, than thole that are affectionate defenders of the people of Rome. Ye fought even now and groaned again, at the words uttered out of this foul mouth. But what matter makes that? If ye were now to go to an election, and to give your voices, ye would no doubt for al that, prefer this man (who threatneth to mischief you) afore them that are willing and desirous to establish your Lands, your dwelling places, and the whole state of your substance and living. But when that lowd language of Posthumus was reported once to the soldiers, it bred a far greater indignation (be sure) within the camp. How now? (say they) is he, who hath interpreted our booty, and de-frauded us poor soldiers of our due, not content therewith, but must menace mischief besides unto us, as his varlets? When as therefore they openly muttered thereat, and the Quetior or Treasurer P. Sestius thought that the mutiny might be restrained with the same violence by which it was first raised: he sent an Officer to one clamorous soldier, that kept a noise above the rest. Whereupon arose an outcry and a brawl: and he got himself a good rap with a stone for his labour, that he was faine to go out of the press. And he that smote him, spake aloud besides, and bad the Quetior take now that for his pains in a mischief, which the General had threatened his soldiers. Posthumus in this hubbubly was sent for, and he, when he was come, made all worle and worle with his sharp examinations, tortures, and cruel punishments. At the laits, when he could not see to make an end nor bridle his cholier: they all ran on heaps together, at the lamentable cry of thole whom he commanded to be choked in the mire and killed under the hurdle: and he half besides himself, full foolishly stepped down in more haft than good speed from the Tribunal feart, to chastise one that contended with him, and made a great brawling. Now when as the Li-tors and Cenensors every where laid about them to make way, and il intreared the multitude in the throng they moved their patience to much, that in that furious fit of the soldiers: the Military Tribun was by his own army stoned to death. Which horrible act, after it was noised at Rome, and the Military Tribun by the Senates authority, were about to sit in commission for the examination of the death of their colleague, by way of rigour and torture: the Tribuns of the Commonalty oppoyed themselves, and resisted them. But that contention depended upon another quarrel. For the Senate doubting lest that the Commons for fear of those examinations intended, would in their anger create Tribuns military from out of their own body and degree: were very careful, and studied all they could, that Consuls might be chosen again. But when as the Tribun of the Commons would not suffer an act of the Senat to pass, and hindered also the election of the Consuls, the matter came to an Interregne. But in the end the Nobles had the upper hand. For when as Q. Fabius P. Valerius, the Interregent, held a Court for the said Election, there were created Consuls A. Cornelius C. Sossus, and L. Furius Medullinus.

An inquisition about the murder of Posthumus.

In the beginning of these Consuls year, the Senate made a decree: that the Tribuns with all speed possible should propoie unto the Commons, concerning the inquisition of Posthumus his death: and that they should make chief Commissioner and Judge, whom they would. The Commons by the consent of the whole people, gave the Consuls commission to see it done, and performed acordingly. Who notwithstanding, that with exceeding moderation and lenity, they dispatched and ended the matter, by punishing a few, who (as it was credibly thought) made themselves away: yet could they not for all that bring about, but the Commonalty took it very haينfully, and in the highest degree, saying, That the Acts and Ordinances, which had been propounded concerning their weal and commodities, thole lay a long time asleep in the deck, and nothing done: but an order granted for their bloudshed and death, that was presently put in execution. Of io great force and importance was it. Now this had been the fittest time, that after these mutinous soldiers were chastised, the division of the Volane territory, should have been offered unto them for to comfort their poor hearts again. By which deed (no doubt) their hot desire and longing after the law Agraria, had been abated, which tended to dispossefs at length the Nobles of the common grounds, which they injuriously were seized of. But this indignity stuck in their stomacks, and was taken neerer to the heart, when they saw the Nobility so stiffly bent, not only to keep the common grounds in their hands, which they held by force: but also unwilling to divide among the people io much as the waist and void ground, lately gotten by conquest from the enemies: but that it was like, within a while (as all the rest) to be a booty, and di-vident, to be shared among a few.

The same year were the legions led by Furius the Consul, against the Volcians: who foraged the borders of the Hernicks. But finding not the enemy there, they van Ferentinum, whither a great number of the Volcians had retired themselves. The booty there was less than they hoped for:

A for: by reason that the Volcians, seeing small hope of keeping the Town, trussed up and carried away both bag and baggage in the night, and quit the Town: which was won the morrow after, being left well near destitute and empty. All the Lands were given freely to the Hernicks. When this year now was passed in a good quiet by the modesty and peaceable carriage of the Tribuns, then in place, there succeeded another Tribun of the Commons, L. Scilius, when Q. Fabius Ambrosius and C. Furius Pacilius were Consuls. Whiles this man in the very beginning of his year, was busy in stirring new seditions (as if it had been a task imposed upon his name and lineage) by propoing of the Agrarian laws: behold, there arose a pestilence, more fearful than hurtful, which turned away mens minds, from their publick assemblies and accustomed contentions, to tend their houses, and to care for the cherishing of their bodies. And (as men verily think) the sickness was less dangerous, than the seditions were like to have been. When as the City was now excised, as it were, and well elapsed, with the sickness only of many, and death of very few: presently after this pestilent year, followed (as it is commonly seen) a great dearth of corn, by reason of the neglect of tillage. M. Porcius Cato, and C. Nauius Rutilius being Consuls. This famine would have been more grievous, than the plague, had they not provided well for corn, by sending forth their Embassadors to the neighbour nations all about, inhabiting along the Tufcan Sea and the Tyber, for to buy grain. Proudly were the Embassadors prohibited all commerce and traffique with the Samnites, who held at that time Cappia and Cumes: but contrary-wile bountifully were they relieved, by the Tyrants or Potentates of Sicilia. And such was the willing endeavour of C. Horatius, that great store of victuals came down the Tyber. In what desolation the City was during this affliction, the Consuls, tried by this: that when they could not furnish an Embassage, but with one Senator, they were compelled to adjoin two Knights unto them. And letting aside the sickness and dearth, there was no trouble either at home or abroad for those two years. But when these storms were once overblown, and that care pats then began again the old troubles wherewith the City had usually been disquieted: diffention at home, and war abroad.

When M. Aemilius and C. Valerius Rutilius were Consuls, the Aequians made preparation for wars, and banded with the Volcians. Who albeit they took arms by no publick commission: yet such as would of themselves serve for hire or wages, followed the wars. At the bruit of which enemies (for they were already come over into the Countrey of the Latins and Hernicks) whiles Valerius the Consul mustered his men and levied soldiers: M. Menenius a Tribun of the Commons, and a publisher of the Agrarian laws, opposed himself against him. And when as by reason of the protection and assistance of the Tribun, no man would be compelled to take a soldiers oath against his will: suddenly news came, that the Cattle of Carmentis was by the enemies forced. This dishonor thus received, as it was a cause that Meneius was hated among the Noblemen, so it gave to the rest of the Tribuns, who were already framed and prepared to withstand the law Agraria more just cause to resist their colleague. The matter being thus for a long time protracted by much debating, the Consuls called both God and man to witness, that whatsoever shame or loss, either had been already received, or were like to be sustained by the enemies: the blame the Consuls imputed to Meneius, who hindered the mustering. And Meneius protested again aloud, that if the unlawful Landlords, would surrender the tenure of the common fields which they unjustly de-tained, he would not stay the musters. Then the nine Tribuns, by setting down a decree between them, made an end of the strife: and pronounced by authority of their colleague, that they would assist C. Valerius the Consul, (all contradiction of their colleague notwithstanding) to award any penalty, restraint or chastisement, upon them that refused to be enrolled for warfare. The Consul, being armed with this decree and warrant, after he had caused some few to be had away by the neck and laid fast, that called upon the Tribun for help, the rest for fear were sworn to serve. Thus the army was led forth to the Cattle of Carmentis. And although the soldiers were as odious to the Consul, as wickedly bent against him, yet at the very first coming, having manfully and lustily dispossessed the garrison, they recovered the fort. The soldiers who were flit away from the hold, and gone a plundering, by their negligence gave the Romans a opportunity to enter and to surprise it. And a good booty there was: by reason that they had customarily gotten prizes, and laid up all there as in a place of safety. Which being told in portale, the Consul commanded the treasurers for robbing the money into the common Chamber of the City: giving out these words withal, that the army should then have part of spoil, when they denied not their service in war. Hereupon both Commons and soldiers were more angry with the Consul. And therefore when as by a decree of the Senate he entered the City Quintus in a pety triumph, the soldiers according to their licentious manner (in that case permitted), followed after with long and sonnets, answering one another in rude time and groles meter by a alternative flaves. Wherein the Consul was greatly blamed, but Meneius the Tribun, his name was set out to the height, his praises were blasoned and ex-celled aloft: and at every time that he was named, the affectionate favour of the people that stood in the streets appeared, by clapping of hands and great applause, striving much to exceed the songs chanted by the soldiers. Which caused the Nobles to look to it, and troubled them more than the misappert sauciness of the soldiers, with their Consuls, which is an ordinary and usual fashion among them. And Meneius (who doubtless had been one of the Military Tribuns, if he had lived for it) was excluded from that dignity by an Election of Consuls. So there were created Consuls, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, and L. Furius Medullinus the second time.

Never took he Com, the matter more to the heart, that the Election of Tribuns escaped their hands:

hands: which grief of theirs in the Election of Questors, they both shewed and revenged. For this was the first time that the Questors were made of the commonalty: so that in choosing of them, there was but one place left for C. Fabius Ambulustus, a Nobleman: and 3 of the commonalty, Q. Silius, P. Atilius, and P. Papirius, were preferred before young Gentlemen of most noble houses. I find that the partisans of the people to use their full liberty in bestowing their voices, were the three Ididj (descended of that house, which ever was most maliciously bent against the Nobles) who were for that year chosen Tribuns of the commonalty, and possessed the peoples heads with a world of great matters, after which they gaped greedily: but so, as they flatteringly gave out and said, They would not stir at all, if the people had not courage enough, so much as in the election of Questors, which only the Senat had left indifferent to the commonalty and Nobility, to effect that which so long they had desired, and now by law was warranted. Thus the Commons assured themselves hereby of a mighty great victory: and esteemed not the dignity of Questorship to be the end and type of honor, but that thereby they seemed to have made a way and overture for new risen upstarts, to be advanced to Consulships and triumphs. The Nobles contrary wisely flattered, not for that their dignities were made common and imparted to other, but for the better loss thereof: protesting that if things went to no end, they would neither get, nor bring up children any more: who being put from their Ancestors place, and seeing others in possession of their dignity, should be disabled for bearing rule and authority in the state, and be good for nothing but only to be made Priests for Mars, and Flamines for Jupiter, employed about nothing else but to sacrifice (soforth) for the people. Thus on both parts were their minds nettled and provoked, and whilst the Commons took heart, and had three champions of great reputation to back them, and maintain their cause: and the Nobles, seeing all would prove like to the Questors Election (if it lay in the peoples choice) addressed themselves to the Election of Consuls, which as yet was not so free, and indifferent both for Commons and Nobles. Contrary-wise, the Ididj perished still, and urged the point, that in any hand Tribuns Military should and must be created. For now it was more than time that the Commons had their part in offices of state. But no action hitherto belonging to the offices and charge of the Consuls had been presented unto them, by the hindering whereof they might wing from them, that which they desired and fought for. But see, how even then, in wonderful good opportunity; word was brought that the Volcians and Aequians were departed out of their own Confines; and made an expedition into the Latine pale for to rob and spoil. To the which war, when as by virtue of an order from the Senat, the Consuls began to muster: the Tribuns laboured tooth and nail to hinder it: giving out that this occasion befell them happily on their sides and the Commons. Three there were of them, and all most quick, brave and courageous men: yea (and for commanders) of good birth, and worthily defended. Whereof twain took in hand, by their continual travel to attend and watch the Consuls, to keep them asunder, and either of them to hold one occupied: the third, was appointed to entertain the commonalty: and in all assemblies, with their Orations, one whilst to rein them in, another while to give them the head, as occasion required. But all this while, neither Consuls went through with the musters, nor the Tribuns with the election which they desired. But afterwards when fortune began to incline to the Commons side, Messengers came with news, that whilst the souldiers had lay in garrison at the Castle Carventina, were steps afield to get a booty, the Aequians having slain a few wanderers that kept the hold, entered it: and thence all the souldiers were slain: some as they ran into the fort again, others as they were scattered in the fields. This thing falling out so cross against the whole State, gave strength yet unto the designs of the Tribuns. For being dealt wial, that now at length they would force out from hindering the war, nothing would prevail: for that they neither gave place to the public calamity and necessity, nor yet regarded their own private peril of displeasure: and they obtained in the end that an Act of Senat was granted for to chuse Tribuns Military. Howbeit with this expresse proviso, it was capitulated: That none of them who had been Tribuns that year of the Commons, should be eligible and propounded: no, nor chosen again Tribuns of the Commons for the year following. Whereby no doubt, the Senat intended and pointed at the Ididj, whom they charged to seek to be Consuls, for a reward of their sedulous Tribunship. Then went the mustering forward, and preparation of war, by consent of all the States.

Sundry Authors write diversly and make doubt, whether both the Consuls went to the Castle Carventina, or whether one of them stayed behind in the City for to hold the foresaid Election. In this they disagree not, but set down for certain: that when they had assailed the Castle a long time without effect, they were compelled from thence to remove: and that Verrugo in the Country of the Volcians by the same army was recovered, and that great foraging there was, and driving of booties, both in the Country of the Aequians and also of the Volcians. Now at Rome, as the victory of the commonalty rested in this, that they had the Election which they desired: so in the issue and success of the Election, the Nobles had the better. For besides all men's hope and expectation, there were three Tribuns Military chosen with Consuls authority, all of the Nobility, C. Julius Tullus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Servilius Hala. Men say that the Nobles used a subtle practise and cunning device, which even then the Ididj charged them with: to wit, that by intermingling a many of unworthy and unmeet competitors with others of mark and quality, they had alienated the peoples hearts from the commoners, seeing them to be men of no worth, and loathing the notable baseness that appeared in their persons.

After

A After this, tidings came, that the Volcians and Aequians (were it that the Castle of Carventina which they held and guarded still, put them into some hope: or their garrison and fort lost at Verrugo drove them into anger) were up in arms, with allforce ready to make war: that the Antians were the principal and chief in this intended action: that their Embassadors had solicited the people of both nations, rebuking their cowardize, for keeping within their walls, and suffering the Romans the year before, to forrage and drive booties in their territories, and the garrison of Verrugo to be surprized and lost. Moreover, that not only hoils of armed men were sent against them, but Colonies also were placed in their frontiers and marches: and that the Romans not content to divide their lands and goods among themselves, had bestowed upon the Hernicks the town Ferentinum, which they had won from them. At these speeches they were kindled and set on fire: and in all places whither they went to solicit, the younger fort and able men in great number were levied. So the youth and manhood of all those nations, gathered together to Antium, where they encamped themselves, and expected the enemy. Which tidings being brought to Rome, caused more fear then need was. And the Senat presently (which in all fearful occasions was ever their last remedy and refuge) gave order that a Dictator should be created, Which thing Julius and Cornelius, two military Tribuns (they say) took in great displeasure. And hereof ensued much heart-burning and dissention, whilst the LL. of the Senat of one side complained in vain of their grievances, That the Tribuns Military would not be ordered by the authority of the Senat: and at the last had recourse to the Tribuns of the Commons for helpalleging wial, that the very Consuls power upon the like occasion had been by their authority overruled and set down. And the Tribuns of the Commons on the other side, rejoicing at the discord of the Senators, made answer again, and said, That for their parts, they were not able to yield any incour at all, who were of no reckoning themselves, being reputed neither in the roll of Citizens, nor yet so much as in the number of men. But if to be (say they) dignities and honors were communicated to us, then would we provide and take order, that by no pride of any magistrate whatsoever, the Senats decree should be made frustrat and disannulled. And in the mean whilst, seeing the Nobles were exempt from all reverence of laws, and regard of magistrates, let them of themselves also exercise the Tribuns authority if they would. This discord falling out so unfitly, when so great war was in hand, occupied and possessed mens heads a long time: whilst Julius and Cornelius one after another, thus reasoned and discoursed: That seeing they themselves were Captains good enough for the conduct of such a war, it was not meet that the honour once bestowed upon them by the people, should be made void and taken from them. Then Servilius Hala, who also was a Tribun Military spake and said: I have been silent thus long, not for that I was doubtful in mine opinion, or to seek what to say. (For what good Citizen (quoth he) would have his advice by himself, and go from the publick Council?) but because I had rather, that my brethren of their own accord should give place to the Senats authority, than to suffer the Tribuns power to be called for, against them. And even now also, if the case would permit, I could willingly give them time and space to retract their too too obstinate, perverse and peremptory opinion. But seeing that the necessities of war, wait not upon human counsel, I will have more respect and consideration of the Weal-publick, than of the favor of my brethren. What, were it the Senat persist still in that mind and resolution of theirs, I will the next night following nominate a Dictator. And if any one withstand me, I will ask no more, than the power and virtue of the Senats Act. By which speech of his, having won deserved praise and thanks of all men, he declared Publius Cornelius Dictator, and was himself by him nominated General of the horsemen. A singular example to teach as many as beheld him and his Colleagues, That otherwise favour and honor sooner fall to them that least desire the same. The war was final and nothing memorable: for in one ease and slight battel were the enemies overthrow and slain at Antium. The army upon this victory wafed the Volcians Country, won by force the Castle upon the lake Fucinus, and within it took three thousand prisoners: having chased all the rest of the Volcians within their walls, not able to keep their frontiers. The Dictator, after he had performed this war in such sort, as only he might not seem to neglect his wonted fortune but keep it still in use, returned into the City with greater felicity than glory, and resigned up his place.

The Tribuns Military, making no words at all of the choosing of Consuls (for anger, I suppose, that a Dictator had been created) published the election of Tribuns Military. But then the Senators were in greater care and perplexity, seeing their cause betrayed even by those of their own company: Wherefore, as in the former year, by sojourn in the basest of the Commons for competitors, they had caused even men of good worth to be deposed: so, now by procuring the principal of the Nobility, both for honour and for favour, to stand for the dignity, they obtained all the places to themselves: so as no one Commoner could be chosen. So there were created four, Gaius having afore born that Magistracy, L. Furius Medullinus, C. Valerius Potitus, Cn. Fabius Ambulustus, and C. Servilius Hala. This man was chosen again to the place, as well in regard of other virtues and worthy parts, as for the late labour which he won by his late moderation, and singular carriage of himself.

In that year, for as much as the time of truce with the Vicentian Nation was expired, they began by Embassadors and Heralds of Arms, to challenge of them amends and restitution. Whom as they entered into their territory, the Embassage of the Vicentians encountered in the way requesting them not to go forward to Vei, before they had presented themselves to the Senat of Rome.

Who

The Oration

Who being thither come, obtained of the Senat, that for as much as the Veientians were at civil discord among themselves, they would not claim any amends at their hands. Lo, how far they were from seeking their own vantage by other mens distresses and calamity. Allot the Volscians hands they sustained damage by loss of their garrison at Ferruge. But (see what a thing it is to slack the time) For whereas the souldiers besieged there, by the Volscians and tending for aid in due time, might have been relieved if speed had been made, the army which was sent for the succour, came too short, and after the fray was ended. Only this exploit they did: The enemies, who after their fresh massacre committed upon the garrison, were gone abroad (dragging for to raise booties, were by them overtaken and put to the sword. The cause of this slackness was imputed to the Senat, rather than the sovereign Tribuns: who because intelligence was given, that they in the garrison resisted and defended themselves most manfully, little considered, That there is no prowess of man whatsoever, but by valour again it may be overmatched, Most brave and valiant souldiers they, that neither whilst they lived, nor after death were unrevenged.

The year following, when P. and Cornelius both furnished Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus and L. Valerius Potitus were Tribuns Military in Consuls authority, began the Veientian war by occasion of a proud and arrogant answer returned by the Senat of the Veientians: Who commanded that the Embassadors which came to claim amends, should take this for their dispatch: That unless they departed presently out of the City and Country, they would serve them as Lars Tullianus had done others before. The Senators of Rome hardly could digest that: and therefore decreed, That the Military Tribuns should propole unto the people as speedily as might be, even the day before to morrow, concerning proclamation of open war, and sending defiance to the Veientians, Which as soon as ever it was noised and published, the younger sort and men of service, murmured and muttered in this manner: "That as yet they had not fully ended the war with the Volscians: that even of late two whole garrisons were lost, and their throats cut, and the forts kept fill with danger and great hazard. There is not (say they) a year passeth over our heads, but one field or other is fought: and as if we had not work and trouble enough already, there was now intended new war with a most mighty nation confining upon us, and which was like enough to raise against us all Hetruria. And as they were forward enough of themselves to conceive thus, and utter these speeches, so the Tribuns of the Commons were not behind to buzze more maliters into their heads, and set all on a light fire: Who gave out till, That when all was done, the greatest warring was between the Nobles and Commons: and that the Commons on purpose were to be toiled out with travel or warfare, and exposed to the enemies for to be murdered: and that they were to be kept far off from the City, and as it were confined and sent out of the way: left by they were quiet at home, and minding their freedom and Colonies, they should contend and devise, both how to dispose of the common grounds, and to give their voices freely. And ever as they could meet with any old beaten souldiers, they would hold them with talk, take them by their hands, reckon up how many years they had done service in war, fall to telling of their gashes and scars, asking them what whole place they had left in their bodies to receive new wounds, and what blood was behind to spend and shed, in the quarrel of the Common-wealth? When as by iterating these and such like speeches, both in their private talk and conference, and also other whiles in their publick assemblies, they had turned clean away the hearts of the Commonalty from taking war in hand: the fore said Act propounded, was put off untill a farther day, and lay still for the time. Which no doubt, had been nipe in the head, and never would have passed farther, in case it had been referred and subject to the hard opinion and conceit of men, as then they stood affected. In the mean whiles agreed it was, that the military Tribuns should conduct an army into the Volscians country. Cn. Cornelius alone was left at Rome. The three Tribuns, after that they perceived the Volscians in no place encamped, and nothing minded to try a battel, parted themselves three ways to waste and forrage the frontiers. Valerius he marched to Antium, Cornelius to Ecetra. And every way as they went, they spoiled all before them, both house and field, and all to amuse & keep the Volscians occupied that way. But Fabius without any foraging at all, came directly to assault Anxur, which was the service most desired. Now Anxur was that, which at this day is called Tarracina, a City seated upon marshes. And at that side Fabius made shew of assault. But there were four cohorts under the leading of C. Servilius Hala sent out to fetch a compass: who having gained the hill that over-looketh and compasseth the town, from that higher ground, with a mighty shout and outcry assailed the wall, where it was dismanned of guard to defend it. At which sudden alarm, they were amazed who manned the wall of the bawle rown against Fabius, and suffered them to set ladders to, and to scale. By which means every place was full of enemies. And upon the walls for a good while there was nothing but killing, as well those that fled, as those that resisted armed and unarmed, one with another. So that, albeit they were too weak, yet forced were they to fight: because in yielding they saw no way but one. But upon proclamation once made, that none but armed men should be killed, all the multitude besides willingly were disarmed. Of which number there were upon a good taken alive. From the sacking Fabius kept the souldiers, until his Collegues were come: saying, that Anxur was taken as well by those armies, which had driven away the rest of the Volscians from the defence of that place, as by themselves. Who being come, the three armies jointly ravaged it, and had the pillage for their labor of that rich town, that had gathered wealth a long time, Which

A Which courtesie and bountifullness of the commanders, was the first thing that reconciled Commons and Nobles together. Over and besides this munificence of the Rulers, the Nobles also began in a most happy hour to be liberal unto the multitude. For before, that either the Commons or Tribuns made the motion, the Senat decreed, that souldiers might have their pay out of the City chamber: whereas before that time, every man in that service had born his own charges. Never was there any thing, by report, so joyfully accepted of the Commons: who ran by heaps together to the Council house: took the Senators by the hands as they came forth, and said, "They were now truly called Patres, Fathers, confesting that now the day was come, that in the quarrel of so bounteous a City, there was no man would so long as his breath lasted, spare either limb or life, Seeing that this commodity they should have to help them, namely, that during the time that their bodies were employed, and busily occupied in the defence of Commons, wealth, their private estate should stand at one yet, and not decay. And forasmuch as it came of themselves, and never moved by any of the Tribuns of the Commons, nor called for and craved importunately, by their importune speeches; that was it, that multiplied their joy, and made the boon it self much more acceptable. But the Tribuns of the Commons (who only had not their part in this common joy and concord of all States) came in with their opinion, and said, that it would not prove so joyous and happy to the Nobles all in general, as they supposed: that this course and order taken, was at the first sight better then it would be found in the practice and execution. For how could that money possibly be made and raised, but by levying a tribute or exaction of the people? they were therefore liberal: but of other mens pities. But admitt to say: that the rest would bear it, yet those neither could nor would endure it, who were paid war-service, and lived upon their pensions and annual salary: who would grudge and repine: that others hereafter should serve in war for more gain then they had in their time done; who having been charged with the pay of their own service, should now again be put to contribute to the wages of others. With these words they moved part of the Commonalty. Last of all, when there was levy enacted, the Tribuns also proclaimed, That they would bear as many out, as would not contribute to the souldiers pay. The Nobles continued still to maintain that which they had so well begun, and were the first that opened their purse, and for that as yet they had no silver coin, some of them carried gross pieces of brass in Vains to the treasure house, and made goodly shew of Contribution. When as the Nobles had most faithfully paid according to the rate of their wealth: the chief of the Commons also, friends of the Nobility, as it was storied began to lay their penny to theirs: whom when the common fort law both to be commended of the Nobles, and to be admired and revered of the souldiers as good Citizens: they all upon a sudden, refusing the Tribuns assistance, began to strive who should pay first. And the decree or act being once passed, of proclaiming war against the Veientians, the new Tribuns Military led an army to Veios, consisting much upon voluntary souldiers. Now the Tribuns were T. Quintus Capitolinus, P. Quintus Cincinnatus, C. Julius Tullus the second time, A. Mamilius, L. Furius Mcallinus the third time, and M. Emilius Mamercus. And these were the first that besieged Veio.

E About the beginning of which siege, when the Tuscans held a Council in a solemn assembly at the Temple of Votumna, they could hardly agree upon this point, Whether the Veientians should be defended by general war of the whole Nation, or no. The year following was the siege not so hot, by reason that some of the Tribuns, and part of the forces, were called away to the Volscian war. The Tribuns Military in Coss. authority, that year were, C. Fabius Potitus the third time, M. Servilius Eidenas, P. Cornelius Maluginus, Cn. Cornelius Cossus, C. Fabius Ambustus, P. Naucius Rutilius the second time. With the Volscians there was a pight field fought between Ferentinum and Ecetra: wherein the Romans had the day. Then the Tribuns began to lay siege to Artena a Town of the Volscians: where, by reason of a falling forth by them attempted, the enemies were driven back into the town, and the Romans took occasion and vantage thereby, to break in with them pell mell, and so they won all, save only the Castle. Into this fort naturally fenced, a good company of armed men betook themselves: but beneath the Castle, many a man was either slain or taken prisoner. Afterwards was the fortress besieged also. Neither could it by assault be forced, for that there was a guard sufficient to man it, considering the bigness of the place: nor gave the assailants any hope of yielding, for before the town was lost, they had conveyed all their publick provision of corn into the Castle. So that the Romans had for very reason, some departed from thence, but that a bondslave betrayed it unto them: who let in certaine souldiers at a steep high place, and those were they that won the fort: for when the warders were by them slain, the rest of the multitude with sudden fright were soon overcome, and ejected. Thus, when both the Castle and town of Artena was sacked and spoiled, the legions were brought back from the Volscians, and all the Romans power employed against Veio. To the traitor aforesaid, there was given besides liberty, the pillage of two householders for a reward. And he was named ever after Servilius Romanus. There be that think Artena was a town of the Veientians, and not of the Volscians: the occasion of which error is, for that there was a town of that name between Cere and Veios. But that town the Roman Kings destroyed: and it belonged to the Cereres, and not to the Veientians: but this other, whereof we have reported the destruction, was in the country of the Volscians.

The Fifth Book

The Breviary of L. Flarus upon the fifth Book.

AT the siege of Veii, the souldiers had hold made them for a winter in, which being a new kind of service, struck an heat in the Tribunes of the Commons, who complained that they had no rest from warfare, so much as in the winter season. Then the Gentlemen of Rome began first to serve upon their own horses. When the Alban lake overflowed, a certain Prophet or Wizard was taken captive from the enemies, who should interpret that strange wonder. Furius Camillus, after ten years siege, was Veii: he translated the Image of Juno from thence to Rome. The tenth part of the spoil and sacrifice he sent to Apollo at Delphi. The same Camillus being Tribune military, whilst he laid siege unto the Falisci, sent back again to the parents his enemies sons that were betrayed unto him: Whereupon the Falisci yielded themselves, and so by his righteous and just dealing, obtained victory over them. When one of the Censors C. Julius was deceased, M. Cornelius was substituted in his place which was never done again afterwards, because in that five years space, Rome was taken by the Gauls. Furius Camillus, being indicted by L. Apuleius a Tribune of the Commons, departed into exile. When as the Senates a people of the Gauls, besieged Clusnum, and the Embassadors sent from the Senat to conclude a peace between them & the Clusines, fought themselves in person against the Gauls in the Clusines army. The Senates hereupon made quarrel, and with a cruel army came against the City of Rome: and after they had defeated the Romans at the river Allia, they were Masters of the City, all but the Capitol, into which the able and serviceable young men of the City broke themselves. The elders with their ornaments of state belonging to the officers had each one had borne, they flew sitting in the porches and streets of their houses. And when they were now gotten up to the top of the Capitol, by the back side of the hill, they were discovered by the galling of Geese, and were turned down, principally by the valour of M. Manlius. Afterwards when through famine the Romans were forced to capitulate and grant for to give them the sum of 1000 pound weight of gold, and for that to buy their redemption from the siege: Furius Camillus, who was created Dictator in his absence, came with an army, whilst the gold was in weighing: and drove the Gauls out of the City, after they had been possessed of it six months, and slew them. A Chappel was built to Locustus: in that place where before the taking of the City, there was a voice heard, that the Gauls were coming: whereas it was whispered and propounded to remove to Veii, because the City of Rome was burnt and razed: that came by the advice and authority of Camillus was crossed and dispatched. The people was moved thereto the rather, by occasion of the omen of a word spoken by a Centurion, who being come with his band of souldiers into the Forum, was heard to say thus, Stand souldiers, here will be our best abiding place.

The fifth Book of T. Livius.

Vhen peace elsewhere was obtained, the Romans and Veians were at war, with such mutual malice and hatred: it that seemed, whether part were vanquished, should come to final destruction. The assemblies for the election of the Rulers of both Nations, far differed one from the other. The Romans augmented the number of Tribunes Military in Consuls authority: for eight of them (so as never afore) were created: M. Emilius Mamercus the second time, L. Valerius Potitus the third time, Appius Claudius Crassus, M. Quintilius Varus, M. Julius Tullus, M. Posthumus, M. Furius Camillus, and M. Posthumus Albus. The Veientians contrariwise, being weary of suing for dignities every year (a cause sometimes of civil discord) made themselves a King. Which offended the people of Hetruria: who as they abhorred all regal government, so they hated the person of the King himself. He had aforetime oppressed that nation, in regard of his greatness and pride: withal in that he had violently put down their solemn plays, the intercession whereof was held unlawful and detestable. For upon a time, in an anger that he received a repulse, and by the suffrages of the twelve Nations, another was preferred before him to be high Priest, in the very midst of their solemn Games and sports, he took from them the very Players and Actors, whereof a great sort were his own servants. That people therefore given to superstition above all other, and so much the rather for that they excelled in the skill of religious observing the same, decreed to deny the Veientians their aid, so long as they were governed under a King. This decree was suppressed and not spoken of at Veii for fear of the King, who would accompany him that should report such rumor, for a lower sedition, rather than an author of news. The Romans, albeit they heard that all was quiet from Hetruria, yet because they were advertised that in all the Dicts and Councils of that Nation, the question was on foot and much debated, made their fortifications at Veii, so as they stood two ways: some looked towards the City against all sallies and eruptions of the townsmen: others toward Hetruria, to stop all succours that haply might come from thence. But the Roman Captains having greater hope in long siege, then in quick assault, began to build winning harbours (a strange thing to Roman souldiers.) Their intent was all winter time to keep continual war. Which after it was told at Rome to the Tribunes of the Commons

A Commons (who now a long time could find no matter and occasion of troubles and alteration) they leapt forth into the assembly of the people, founding and soliciting the minds of the Commons, and often saying, "That this was the only matter, why a set way was appointed for the souldiers: and that they were not ignorant, that the gifts of enemies would prove to be belmeared with poison: That the freedom of the Commons was bought and sold: That their young men were sent away far off, and as it were banished from the City and Common wealth, so that now they had not so much spare time as winter, nor any reason else of the year, for to visit home and see unto their estate. What think ye (say they) is the cause of continuing this warfare? No other verily should they find it but this, left by reason of the frequent number of those young men, in whom the whole strength of the Commonalty consisted, there might be something dealt in, and effected, concerning their commodities. Over and besides they complained how they were much more hardly used, then the Veientians. For as for them, they spent the winter within their own houses, defending their City, fortified both with goodly walls, and also by natural situation of the place: but the Roman souldiers abode by it still in labour and travel, shrouded under booths of poor hides, overwhelmed with snows and frosts, not laying away their harness and weapons, so much as in winter the ordinary time of rest from all wars both by sea and land. This manner of hard bondage, neither the Kings, nor those proud and imperious Consuls (before the Tribunes authority was ordained to take them down) nor yet the Lordly ruling Dictator, nor the insolent and unportable Decemvirs, ever enjoined: thus to dwell in continual souldiery, as these Tribunes Military do: who exercise upon the Commons of Rome, an absolute and kingly authority. What would they do another day, when they were Consuls or Dictators indeed, who now but representing only the Consuls government (as Vice-Consuls) are so cruel and unreasonable? But we are well enough served, and justly have deserved no less, for that there was not so much as one place for a Commoner amongst eight Tribunes. Afore time, the Nobles were wont with much labour and toil, to fill but three rooms: and now they go eight in a rank together, to obtain all charges and dignities of State and Government: and in that throng, a Commoner cannot have a place amongst them, to put his Colleagues in mind (if he did nothing else) that they that go to warfare were free-men yet, and Citizens with them, and not bondslaves. Who in winter at the least, ought to be brought again to their houses and homes, and once a year visit their loving parents, their sweet children, and best beloved wives: to make some use of their liberty, and chuse their Magistrates: These and such like speeches, whilst they broadly uttered and multiplied, they met at length with an adversary that was able to match them, Appius Claudius, left for the purpose at home by his brethren in office, to restrain the Tribunes seditions: a man ever from his tender youth trained up in the broils and contentions of the Commons. Who certain years before (as we have said) gave shrewd and unhappy counsel to dissolve and put down the Tribunes authority, by the contradiction and inhibition of their own Colleagues. This man being not only in wit prompt and ready, but also exercised by long practice, made at that time this or such like speech: "If ever doubt were made, O Quirites, whether the Tribunes of the Commonalty have for love of your good or their own particular advantage, been always the authors and beginners of discord and dissention, this year I know assuredly, ye need no more stand in doubt. And as I rejoice ye are at length come to an end of this your long wandering, so I congratulate both you, and the Common-wealth for your sake, that this error is cleared, and especially in the midst of your prosperity. Is there any man maketh question now, that the Tribunes of the Commons were not offended, nor took snuff so much at the injuries at your hands received (if haply there have sometimes been any) as at the bounty of the Nobles, towards the Commons, in allowing pay to those that serve in war? What think ye else, either they feared then, or would at this day disturb and disquiet but only the concord and agreement of the States? Which they suppose tendeth most, and is sufficient, to abolish and overthrow the Tribunes authority. And verily, as naughty Artisans or lewd leeches, seek for work still, and would be ever doing: so they likewise desire to have something or other out of frame and amiss, in the Common-wealth, that to the repair and cure thereof, they might be ever sent for and employed. For whether do ye (and speak truth) maintain or impugn the commonalty? Are you the adversaries or the advocates of them that serve in the wars? Unless peradventure this be your saying, Whatsoever the Nobles do, it misliketh us, be it for the good of the common people, or to the prejudice and damage. And even as masters forbid their own servants and slaves, to have any dealing at all with strangers, and think it meet and reason, that they meddle neither hot nor cold with them: even so forewarn ye the Nobles from all commerce and enticement with the Commons: to the end, that neither we by our courtresie and liberality, should allure and win them: nor they again become dutiful and obedient to us. How much more ought you (I pray you) if there were any spark (I say not) of civillie, but of common humanitie and good nature in you, rather to favour, and as much as lieth in you, foster and cherish, as well the gracious kindnes of the Nobles, as the willing service and obedience of the Commons? Which accord, if it were perpetual, who would not undertake to warrant, that this Seignory and Empire, within a while, might prove the mightiest and most renowned of all those States that border hard upon our confines? As for this purpose intended, and plot devised by my Colleagues, whereby they would not have the army withdrawn away from the siege of Veii, before the service were brought to an end:

"how it would not be only profitable, but also necessary, I will hereafter argue and prove. Now, for this time, I list rather to treat and speak of the present condition and state of those, that are employed there in warfare. Which Oration of mine, if it were pronounced, not before you only, but also in the camp, and there canvassed and scanned of, by the very army itself, I suppose, would seem equal, and be received for good and reasonable. Wherein, if nothing else should come into my head to speak, I would content my self, and rest satisfied with the only speeches given out by the very adversaries. They said of late, That pay was not to be allowed to the soldiers, for that never before it had been allowed. How then can they now be offended, and to male-content, if they who have some new commodity coming to them, be enjoined also new labour proportionably? For never lightly is there travel any where without gain, nor gain commonly without travel and employment. Pains and pleasure, things of themselves in nature most unlike, yet by a natural kind of society (I know not how) are linked together. The soldier (as of late) thought much to bestow his labour & service upon the Common-weal, at his own private charge; yet was he glad with all his heart, that one part of the year, he might look to home, husband his land, and get maintenance to feed himself and his, both at home in Italy and abroad in war. Now, take he contentment, and is well pleased, that the Common-weal is gainful to him; and with joyful heart receiveth his wages. Let him likewise be content, with patience to forsook his house and family (since he is at no great charge) somewhat longer than ordinary. Might not the Common-weal, if he would call him to reckoning, justly say: Yearly pay thou hast, perform therefore thy yearly service? Dost thou think it reason, to receive full wages for the whole year? and to be employed but six months for it? Much against my stomach, O Quirites, enforce I this point, and dwell still in this one part of my Oration: for in this wise ought they to reason that have mercenary and hired soldiers: but we will use them as fellow Citizens, and think it meet likewise that they treat us kindly, and speak unto us as to their native Country. Either it behoved us, not to have begun the war at all: or else to proceed forward, now it is begun: yea, and for the honour of the people of Rome, to finish it with all speed possible. And finished it will be, if we press upon our enemies thus besieged: if we depart not afore we have accomplished our hope, by the winning of Veii. And surely, there were no other cause but this, even the very shame and indignity of the thing, might force us to continue siege unto the end. In old time the whole power of Greece laid siege full ten years to one City, and that for one only woman: How far (good god) from their own home? how many lands and seas between? Are we then loth and weary being within 20, miles of our dwelling place, and almost in the sight of our own City, to endure the toil of one years siege? Because (forsooth) we have but small cause given us to war: and not griefs enough that might justly provoke us to abide and see the end. Seven times already they have rebelled: In peace never were they true. Our Country have they spoiled and wasted a thousand times. The Fidenates they have caused to revolt from us. Our inhabitants there by us placed, they have slain: and against all law of nations they were the principal instruments of that unworthy and unhuman murder of our Embassadors. All Hetruria would they have raised up against us, and at this day about it they go. And when our Embassadors came to demand amends, they had like to have run upon them and killed them. And ought we then with these kind of men to stand at a bay and to war coldly and by lease? But if you just an hatred as this move us not: do these things (I pray you) move what move you neither? Their City is environed and beleaguered with deep trenches: blocked with mighty sconces, whereby the enemy is pent up and pinned within his own walls. His fields he cannot till, and what so ever was afore tilled, hath been destroyed by war. If we dislodge and withdraw our army back, who doubteth, but that they (not for desire only of revenge, but upon necessity also and constraint to prey of other towns goods, having lost their own) will invade and over-run our country? So that by this means we defer not the war, but bring it within our own borders and confines. But now as touching that which properly indeed concerneth soldiers (of whom our good Tribunes of the Commons would now in all the haste seem to have too great regard, from whom erewhile they would have wrested their wages): but what is that (I say)? At trench they have cast, a rampart and platform they have raised, (matters of exceeding travel and labour) so far about: sconces at the first a few, but after as their army encreased, they have erected very thick in every place. Ports they have built, not only to command the town, but also looking toward Hetruria, to impeach any relief, if any aid should from thence come. What should I speak of the rolling frames and towers, the mantlets and other Fabricks? What should I speak of the Tarraces, Tortoises, Rams, and all other engines of assault and battery? Think ye it meet, that after so great toil and pains taken, now that the works at length are brought to an end, these things should be left and abandoned, that against summer we should be new to begin again, and sweat afresh about the same? How much less travail rather is it to keep these munitions already made? to be instant, and constant to endure, and abide? yea, and to rid our hands off all the care at once? For surely we may soon dispatch the service, if it be plyed thoroughly and followed on till without stay: and if we ourselves by these intermissions and respites between, make not a long piece of work off, and draw our hope at length. Thus much of the labour and toils of time. What else? Considering these so many Parliaments, these Diets and Councils continually in Tuicany, about sending aid to Veii, can we forget the danger that we incur by deterring the War? Indeed (as things

A "now presently (and) I confess the Tuicans with the Veientians are angry, they hate them and deny to send: and for any thing by them done, we might win Veii out of hand. But who dare warrant, that if the war be delayed, they will hereafter be of the same mind? Seeing that if the Veientians have any rest and breathing time given them, they are like to fend off their Embassadors, and those more honourable than heretofore. All the King who newly is set up and created at Veii (the only thing that now offendeth the Tuicans) in process of time, may be charged for another governor, either by agreement of the State (thereby to reconcile the hearts of the Tuicans) or of his own accord: who will not peradventure that his princely regiment should be hurtful to the safety of his subjects. See how many things, how many inconveniences follow low and ensue upon that course and manner of proceeding. The loss of the fabrick and fortifications, with so great labour already prepared and achieved: the imminent and present waiting of our own borders: the Tuicans war instead of the Veientians. These your devices, O ye Tribunes, are much what like to his, that offering a sick man some kind of meat or drink, for the very present to gratifie him withal, to please his palate and to content his taste, maketh his disease long, and peradventure incurable: who might have been recovered out of hand, in case at once, he would have resolutely endured the right cure of a skilful Physician. And surely, if we were not material to the managing of this war, and, yet would it import much to martial discipline, that our soldiers should be acquainted, not only with the sweet fruit of a victory achieved, but also if occasion required longer time, to abide this tediousness: and to wait for the end of their hope, be it never so long: and if war be not finished in summer, to stay for winter: and not as summer birds by and by in the fall of the leaf, to look about and seek for housing, harbour and covert. Consider, I beseech you, and see. The love and pleasure of hunting carrieth men into mountains, woods and forests: through frost and snow, after their game: shall not we then the like sufferance in the needful exploits of war, which patimes sports, and delights, are wont to draw and fetch out of us? Think we the bodies of our soldiers to effeminate, their hearts so tender and delicate, that they cannot for one winter abide in a camp, and forbear their home, but must needs war as men at sea, watching times and seasons, and observing the quarters of the year? Cannot they endure both parching heat and chilling cold? They would blush and be abashed verily, if a man should therewith charge them: and they would stand stiffly in this, and avouch, That they had both in body and mind manlike sufferance and patience: and that they were soldiers as well for winter as summer: and that they yet not the Tribunes work for any patronage of cowardice and flattery of idleness: but remembered well enough, that their forefathers were not under shade for fear of sun-burning, nor had their houses over their heads for taking cold, when they first created and ordained that magistracy of Tribunes. This rather is becoming the valour of your soldiers, this fiteth well the name of Romans, not to have their eye upon Veii only, and this war now in hand, but to seek for fame and glory both by other exploits, and also with other nations in time to come. And think ye that there would ensue hereupon a small crack of credg, and hazard of reputation? Would ye have the neighbor nations confining upon us, conceive thus of the people of Rome, That if a City could receive their first brunt, and abide their assault for a very small while, it need not after to fear any more? Or rather should not this dread and terror of our name spread all abroad, both far and near, That no weariness of long siege and assault, no violence of bitter winter, is able to raise the Roman army from any town once by them invetted? as knowing no other end of war but victory? and whose manner of service is not by way of violent force more than of oblique continuance, which (as in all other military occasions) so in besieging of Cities is most needful: the greatest number whereof, being either by strong bulwarks and other fortifications, or by natural situation impregnable, yet by famine, by hunger and thirst, procel and tract of time only doth force and overthrow. As it will (I doubt not) Veii at length: unless the Tribunes of the commonality favour our enemies: unless that the Veientians find that relief and aid at Rome, which they seek in vain throughout all Hetruria. For can there ought happen to the Veientians so wished for, as that first the City of Rome should be full of variance, and then the Camp (as it were by a contagion from thence) as full of munities? But contrariwise I assure you, amongst the enemies, to good order there is and government, that neither the tediousness of long siege, nor yet the loathing of Kingly rule, hath caused any stir or commotion among them. No, nor the denial of help from the Tuicans hath one whit troubled and discomfited their minds: but die he shall forthwith, that is the author of sedition. Neither shall any man there be suffered to speak those words, which are spoken here amongst you without any punishment or controlling. He deserveth the bastinado, to be dry beaten and wel cudgelled that forsaketh his Colours, or departeth from his guard and quarter. But here, in open assemblies, they that perswade and counsel not one or two soldiers, but whole armies to leave their Standards and Ensigns, and abandon the very camp, have audience with applause. Insomuch, that whatsoever a Tribune of the Commons speaketh, although if were to betray the City, and undo the whole State, ye are used to hearken and give good ear to him: and being ravished and carried away with the sweetness of that authority, ye suffer under it to lurk any mischief whatsoever. There remaineth now no more but this, that the words they give out here with open mouth, the same they might iterate in the camp among the soldiers, to corrupt the army, and not suffer them to obey their Captains. For to such licentious liberty they are grown at Rome, that they fear and reverence

"neither Council nor Magistrate, neither Laws nor ancient Customs, neither Decree of Senators, nor yet the Discipline of Military service.

Now was Appius with his Orations good enough for the Tribuns, and able to meet them at every turn: But see: (a thing that no man would have thought) a loss and foil received before Vetius made Appius to have the better hand of the cause, wrought a greater unity among the States, and kindled an ardent desire to assail Vetius more hotly, and to besedge it with more resolution. For when they had raised up a mount near unto the City, and approached in a manner to the walls thereof, with their rolling towers and roofed mantlets, whiles (I say) they were not so vigilant in the night season to tend and watch these Fabricks, as they were buie and earnest in the day time to rear and plant them: behold, all of a sudden the enemies opened a gate, and armed in great numbers, especially with burning firebrands, set all on a light fire: and in the space of one hour consumed both the mount and the mantlets, which had cost so long time in making. And many a man besides that came to help (but in vain) by sword and fire lost his life. Which being reported at Rome, made all men heavy and lad, and caused the Senators to take care and fear, how upon this accident, they might possibly prevent and Ray, either commotion in City, or mutiny in camp: doubting lest the Tribuns would have insulted over the Common-weal, as if they had gotten a great conquest. At what time, they that were by calling Gentlemen and so assailed, and had no horses of service assigned them from the City, after some consultation together among themselves, suddenly came into the Senat: and having liberty granted of speech, promised to serve in the wars with horses of their own. After that the Senat had right honourably thanked and given them most gracious words, the newness thereof was no sooner bruited through the market place and whole City, but behold, all on a sudden the Commons came running unto the Council house, saying, that as they were then to serve as footmen, so they offered their service to the Commonweal extraordinarily without mustering, whether they should be led, either to Vetius, or to any other place whatsoever. And if they were conducted to Vetius, they would not return again (they say) from thence, before they had won that City from their enemies. At which words, the Senators rose exceedingly joyed above measure, that hardly they could temper themselves. For they took not order, as they did by the Gentlemen and horsemen afore, that they should be praised by the mouth of the Magistrates thereto appointed, nor called them into the Council house, there to give them an answer, neither could they keep themselves within the Council house door. But every one of them in his own behalf, so well as he could signified from aloft, both by word of mouth, and gesture of hand, unto the multitude standing in the Comitium, a general joy conceived: saying, That the City of Rome in that concord and unity would be happy, invincible, and perpetual: commending the horsemen, praising the footmen, extolling and magnifying that very day, and confessing that now they had surpassed the courtesy and bounty of the Senat. So that Nobles and Commons both, for joy wet again who could weep most, until the Senators were recalled into the Court: where a decree was made, That the Tribuns Military should assemble the people, and give thanks both to horsemen and footmen, and promise in the name of the Senat, that they would be mindful of their affectionate kindness to their Country: and to signify that it was their pleasure, that they all, who had offered extraordinary service so willingly. Noly, should have their pay notwithstanding: yea, and for the horses also there were assigned a certain rate and proportion of wages. This was the first time that the Gentlemen began to serve on horseback for money. This voluntary army marched to Vetius, and not only repaired again the works which had been destroyed, but also went in hand to erect new. And from the City was provision of victual brought, with greater care of convoy than afore, that nothing might be wanting to an army so well delivering of the Common-weal.

The year following had for their Military Tribuns in Consuls authority, C. Servilius Hala the third time, Q. Servilius, P. Virginus, Q. Sulpicius, A. Manlius the second time, and M. Sergius the second time. In these Tribuns time, whiles every mans care was bent to the Veientian war, the sort of Ansur being neglected, by occasion that the garriſon ſouldiers were diſbanded and ranged much abroad, and commonly received Volſcan Merchants into the town, was ſuddenly ſurpriſed, by reaſon that the warders of the gates were betrayed. Leſs company of ſouldiers there were ſlain: becauſe that all of them (beſides thoſe that were ſick) found themſelves occupied and traded all the country over, and in the Cities adjoining, like to lawleſſ lackies that follow the Camp. Neither was there better ſucces at Vetius, wherein reſted the chief care now, of all their publick affairs. For not only the Roman Captains were more angered one at an other, than courageous againſt the enemy: but alſo the forces of the enemies were encreaſed by the ſudden coming of the Captains and the Falſci. Which two nations of Hetruria, becauſe they inhabited next, ſuppoſing when Vetius ſhould be forced and loſt, that their turn would be next to be warred upon by the Romans: and the Falſcians beſides, upon a ſpecial grudge and old quarrel of their own, for that aforetime in the Fidenat war, they had intermeddled and intereſted themſelves, ſent their Embaſſadors to and fro, and by binding themſelves by a ſolemn oath one to the other, came unlooked for with their power to Vetius. And by chance they aſſailed that ſide and quarter where M. Sergius a Military Tribun had the charge of a ſconce. Who gave a great alarm and cauſed exceeding fight: becauſe the Romans ſuppoſed certainly that all Hetruria was raiſed one of every part, and there preſent, with all the power they could make. The ſame imagination animated the Veientians alſo within the City, to make a ſally. So was the Camp of the

At the Romans aſſailed on both ſides. And whiles they ran together up and down, and turned their enſigns every way, and could hardly keep the Veientians within the ſtrength of their Fortreſſe, nor yet repulſe the violence from their own fortifications and ramparts, and defend themſelves from their foreign enemies behind: their only hope was to have help from the greater leaguer: that the legions in ſundry places might make head, ſome againſt the Capenates and the Falſci, others againſt the ſally of the townſmen. But Virginus had the charge of that main camp, one that bare a privat grudge and inward malice againſt Sergius, and was hated again of him. This man, when word was brought that moſt of the Fabricks and bulwarks were aſſaulted, that the ramparts and trenches were won, and that the enemies on both ſides charged luſtily, kept his ſouldiers well appointed in arms: ſaying, that if there were any need of help, his Colleague ſhould ſend unto him, if he would. And he for his part was not ſo arrogant and inſolent, but the other was as ſpecivith and wiſul. Who becauſe he would not ſeem to ſeek unto his adverſary, nor crave aid at his hand, choſe rather to be vanquiſhed of his enemy, than to overcome him by help of a fellow-Citizen. Thus between them roſe a good will the poor ſouldiers went to wrack, and were ſlain. At the laſt, forſaking their ramparts, a very few of them eſcaped into the maine camp. But the moſt part, with Sergius himſelf, went through to Rome. Where when he had laid all the fault upon his fellow in government, it was thought good that Virginus ſhould be ſent for out of the camp: and that in the mean while their Deputie, and Lieutenants ſhould command the forces. Hereupon was the matter debated in the Senat, and the two Tribuns kept a taunting and reviling: and many hard tearms were dealt between them. Few there were that tendered the common good, but took part either with the one or the other, as each of them were fancied and beloved. Howbeit the LL. of the Senat thought good: howſoever that ſo ſhamefull chance hapned either through the default, or unlucky fortune of the Captains not to expect the ordinary full time of the election, but that preſently there ſhould be new Tribuns military created, to enter into their office on the Calends of October. To what opinion when they were all agreed, the other Tribuns military nothing gainſaid. But Sergius and Virginus (for whole ſake it appeared that the Senat was weary of the Magiſtrates that year) at the firſt made means & beſought them not to digraſe and diſcredit them ſo: and afterward aſſayed to croſs the decreed election: ſaying that they would give over their place, before the Ides of December, which was the laſt and ſual day of entering yearly into new offices. Amid this buſineſſ, the Tribuns of the Commons, who had kept ſilence even againſt their wills, ſo long as men were at unity and the affairs of the City proſpered, upon a ſudden brake out and threatned ſharply the two Tribuns Military, that unleſs they would ſubmit themſelves, and reſt in the authority of the Senat, they would commit them to ward. Then C. Servilius Hala, a Military Tribun, ſtood up and ſaid, "As for you and your threats, O ye Tribuns of the Commons, in good faith, I would gladly fee once, that there were no more power and authority in theſe here, then will and ſtomack in you. But who ſeeth not that there is no ſtriving againſt the authority of the Senat? And therefore hold ye content: and forbear you to ſeek opportunity and occaſion upon our variance to offend wrong. And my brethren for their parts ſhall either do that which the Senat thinketh good: or elſe if they ſhall continue ſtubborn ſtill in their contumacy, I will preſently nominate a Dictator, to force them to leave their office. This ſpeech was approved with a general accord. And the Senators being glad that without the terrors and affrightments of the Tribuns authority, there was found out another greater power to bridle magiſtrates: the two military Tribuns aforeſaid, were overweighed with the content of all parties, and held a new election of military Tribuns, to begin their government on the Calends of October: and before that day they reſigned up their places. Thus were L. Valerius Poturius the fourth time, M. Furius Camillus the ſecond time, M. Emilius Mamercus the third time, Cn. Cornelius Cofſus the ſecond time, C. Fabius Ambuſtus, and L. Julius Tullus, Tribuns military in Conſuls authority.

In whole time many worthy Acts were performed both at home and abroad. For not only they had war in ſundry places at one time, namely, at Vetius, at Capena, againſt Faleris, and with the Velleſi: to the end that Ansur might be won again and recovered from the enemies: but as Rome alſo, what about muſters and paying the tribute for ſouldiers pay, there was much trouble. Beſides, there was ſome variance, about taking in certain Tribuns of the Commons to the reſt: and the two arraignments of thoſe, who a little before had governed in Conſuls authority, cauſed no ſmall ſtir. But the principal care of the Tribuns military, was that the muſter ſhould go forward. Neither were the younger ſort and ſerviceable men only preſt forth, but the elder alſo compelled to give their names, and to keep watch and ward in the City. But look how much greater was the number of ſouldiers, ſo much more money they needed for their payment. And the ſame was levied by a contribution: but unwillingly of as many as tarried at home. For that beſides the levy they were enjoined to become ſouldiers alſo, in defence of the City and to ſerve in perſon for the Commonweal. Theſe things, grievous as they were of themſelves, ſo by the ſeditious Orations of the Tribuns in their aſſemblies, they ſeemed more grievous and heavy. Who argued and diſcourſed thus, "That wages was appointed for ſouldiers to this end, only that what by warfare, and what with exactions and impositions, they might unto the Commons, and make an end of them at once for ever. One war (ſay they) hath now continued three years, and the ſame, on ſee purpoſe, ill managed, that it might be drawn out the longer. Again, in one muſter there were armies enrolled for no fewer than four wars, whereunto beardless boyes and old craſe men, "were taken up and haled forth. Now there was no difference of winter or summer: so as the poor Commons at no time can have any rest. Who now at last are taxed also and racked to the uttermost, so that after they have brought home with them their bodies overtired with travel, weakened with wounds, and lapt of all, wasted and spent with age: and finding all things at home unassisted by reason of the long absence of the masters and owners, they must beain to pay tribute even out of their poor decayed quick stock, and repay again with great usury to the Common-wealth, their wages received in war, as it were upon interest.

Between the muliers of one side, and the levy of souldiers pay on the other side, and their minds occupied about greater affairs, at the election of Tribuns of Commons, the number could not fully be made up: Whereupon there was great labour made, that into the rooms that were void, there should be some of the Nobility taken in and admitted. When that could not be obtained, yet to assume and overthrow * the Tribuns law, it was effected or brought to pass that they should affume unto them for Tribuns of the Commons, C. Lucerius, and Marcius Attilius, by the might and practise no doubt of the Patritii. It happened, so that the same year C. Trebonius was a Tribun of the Commons, who would seem to undertake the patronage and defence of the Law Trebonia, and discharge it as a duty to that name and house belonging. He spake aloud and said, "That

"whereas the Tribuns Military had won that; whereof some of the Nobles had born the repulse in their first suit, and that the Law Trebonia was dissanull'd, in that certain Tribuns of the Commonalty were taken into their fellows, not by suffrages and free voices of the people, but by the rule and commandment of the Nobles: and that the matter was come to that pass, that either Noble men, or their favourites and followers were to become Tribuns of the Commons: that their sacred laws were taken from them perforce, and the Tribuns authority wrested from out of their hands by violence: all these inconveniences he complained to have happened through the fraudulent practise of the Nobles: and the mischievous lewdness and treachery of his own companions in office. Thus whilst there grew great heart-burning among them, and that not the Nobles only, but also the Tribuns of the Commons, as well they, which were elected, as they that were electors, were hardly thought of by the people: Then three of the Company, P. Cerarius, M. Mellius, and Munius, fearing some shrewd turn, like to fall upon Sergius and Virginius, (the Tribuns military of the former year) and by serving process, giving them a day to answer, turned from themselves the anger and displeasure of the Commons, upon those two persons: publishing openly, "That whosoever were grieved for the muliers and the Tribune, whosoever thought the war long, and the continual soldiery tedious, whosoever sorrowed for the damage and discomfort received at Veii, whosoever for the loss of their Children, Brethren, Kinsfolk, or any of their alliance had heavy and mournful houses: to them they offered liberty and power to vent their publick and privat grief, upon their two guilty persons and offenders, Sergius and Virginius, the very causes of all the mischiefs and calamities that were happened. For why? the adversary charged them with no more then was confessed by the very parties: who finding themselves both faulty, laid the blame one upon the other: whilst Virginius reproached Sergius with running away, and Sergius laid treason to Virginius his charge, in that he denied his help in time of need. For so say they were both of them to inconsiderate and foolishly only, were to speak beyond all compass of belief. But much more likely it was, that there was some packing rather, and that the matter was contrived, and practised of set purpose, and by an ordinary and common fraudulent plot of the Patritii. By whose means both at the first the Veientians got opportunity to fire their works, thereby to draw out and prolong the war, and also now the army was bought and sold, and the Roman camp betrayed to the Falisci. And all this to no other end, but that the youth and flower of the City might wax old at Veii, and that the Tribuns might not propole and consult with the people about the distribution of lands, or any other commodities of the poor Commons, or in frequent and full assembly of Citizens intend and follow their publick actions, and withstand the conspiracy of the Gentry and Nobles. Moreover there is already (say they) a prejudice passed against the offenders, both by the Senat and people of Rome, and also by their Collegues. For as they were displaced and depoted from their office, by an Act of the Senat: so when they refused to give over, they were for fear of a Dictator forced by their own companions to resign up their government: and the people of Rome had created other Tribuns military to enter into their charge, not upon the usual day which was in the * Ides of December, but forthwith in the Calends of October: as who would say, the Common-wealth had not been able to stand any longer, if these men had remained still in place. And yet for all this, these persons thus convicted and fore-condemned by so many prejudices, come now to be judged of the people: thinking they are sufficiently quit, and discharged, yea, and have suffered punishment enough, in that they were two months sooner then ordinary, made private persons: and perceive not, that thereby was taken from them the power only to do any harm, and no punishment inflicted upon them. For as much as, even their very Collegues, who had not offended, were likewise discharged as well as they: Let the Quirites therefore and people of Rome, take that heart to them again, which they had upon the late overthrow fresh and bleeding new, when they beheld the army running in fearful flight, fore wounded and agast, arriving at the gates, blaming no fortune, nor any of the gods, but only their two brave leaders. And as for us, we know assuredly that there is not one of all them here presently assembled, who that day

A "fled not in his heart and drested the head, the house, and whole estate of L. Virginius, and M. Sergius. Neither is it convenient, that upon whom, erewhile every man prayed that the anger and vengeance of God would light against them now when they both may and ought, they should not extend their full power with rigour. Since that even the very gods never lay hand themselves upon sinners and offenders: but it sufficeth that they aim the wronged and oppressed persons with means and opportunity of revenge. The Commons upon these speeches moved with indignation, condemned the two offenders in * 100.000, brazen Aesses a piece: notwithstanding that Sergius pleaded for himself, blamed the common fortune of war, and laid all upon fortune: and Virginius besought them (but both in vain) that he might not be more unhappy, and speed worsted home, than abroad in war. Thus the peoples wrath being diverted upon these two, obscured and darkned the remembrance both of the assumption and admitting of the Tribuns aforesaid, and of deluding and dissanulling the Law Trebonia. The Tribuns thus having got the upper hand, to the end that the Commonalty might have a present reward for awarding this doom, publish the Law Aggraria, and forbid the levying of the Subsidy for souldiers pay: seeing there was need of pay for so many armies: and sped so well they had, in the managing of warfare, as they were like to come to an end, without any waiting at all. For at Veii the pery camp which was lost, being recovered again, was fortified with strong bulwarks, and furnished with good guards. The Tribuns Military, M. Enyllus and Q. Fabius, had the charge there. And as for M. Enyllus in the Faliscan, and Cn. Cornelius in the Capenit Country, they could meet with none enemies without their town walls. But they drove away booties, and waited their manes, by firing their villages and their corn: but as for their towns, they neither assaulted nor besieged them. But in the Volscian country, alter their territory was wasted, Anxur also was assaulted (but in vain) for that it was situate on high. Whereupon Valerius Potitus, who had the charge of that province, seeing that force would not prevail, began by trench and rampart to lay siege to it, and invest it round. The affairs of war abroad standing in these terms, there arose domesticall strife and sedition at home: and the same was followed more earnestly and with greater ado than the wars were managed without. And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no fundies and exactions be gathered, nor money for souldiers pay sent to the Generals, and that the souldiers called on them hard, and were hairy for their wages: the camp also had like to have been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies. During these heats and angries of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people said, That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translating the chiefest dignity from the Sergii and Virginius to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it were to make entrie and take possession in the right of that dignity) Jo. wits, P. Lucinius Calvus, should be created Tribun Military with Consul authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub. Manlius, and P. Titinius, P. Mellius, L. Enyllus, Medullinus, and L. Popilius Volsesus. The affairs of war abroad standing in these terms, there arose domesticall strife and sedition at home: and the same was followed more earnestly and with greater ado than the wars were managed without. And when by reason of the Tribuns there could no fundies and exactions be gathered, nor money for souldiers pay sent to the Generals, and that the souldiers called on them hard, and were hairy for their wages: the camp also had like to have been troubled and infected with the contagion of those civil mutinies. During these heats and angries of the Commons against the Nobles, albeit the Tribuns of the people said, That now the time was come of establishing their freedom, and translating the chiefest dignity from the Sergii and Virginius to the Commoners, such as were men of valour and action: Yet they prevailed no more then thus, that one only of the Commonalty, (as it were to make entrie and take possession in the right of that dignity) Jo. wits, P. Lucinius Calvus, should be created Tribun Military with Consul authority: the rest were all of the Nobility, Pub. Manlius, and P. Titinius, P. Mellius, L. Enyllus, Medullinus, and L. Popilius Volsesus. The very Commoners themselves marvelled that they had obtained to great a thing, and not he only who was created, a man that aforesaid had never been in place, and born no magistracy, yet an ancient Counsellor of State, an elderly person, and well

E slept in years. Neither as yet is it for certain known, why he first and above all others was counted a meet man to have hanfel, or make essay of this new dignity and promotion. Some think, that for his brother Cn. Cornelius his sake, who had been the year afore a Tribun Military, and had given to the horsemen triple pay, he was through favour drawn in, and called to go great honour. Others, for that himself had picked out a convenient time, and made a plausible Oration, that both Nobles and Commons liked very well, concerning the agreement and unity of the States. The Tribuns of the Commons rejoicing highly for this their victory in the Election, remitted and called in the Inhibition of the subsidy or imposition aforesaid, the thing that most of all prejudiced the service of the Common-wealth. By means whereof payment was made in all dutiful obedience, and sent it was unto the army. Then within short time was Anxur (in the Volscians Country) recovered: by occasion that on a festival holy day, the watch and ward of the City was neglected. This was a year notable and famous for the cold and inowny winter, so as the high ways were choaked up, and Tiberis was unnavigable: Howbeit, by reason of provision brought in aforehand, the want of corn arose not. And for because P. Lucinius, as he entered his government without any troubles, and with greater joy and contentment of the Commons than indignation of the Nobles: he so ruled and executed it all the year long accordingly: therefore their teeth watered at the next election also, to make Tribuns military of their own body. Only M. Terentius, of all the Nobility that stood in suit for the dignity, had a place among them. But as for the other Tribuns Military in Consular authority, all the Centuries in a manner chose Commoners, to wit, L. Titinius, P. Menenius Rutilius, Cn. Gennatius, and L. Attilius.

F After this hard Winter, either by reason of a disemperature and disposition of the weather, suddenly changed to a contrary: or upon some other hidden and unknown cause, there followed presently a contagious and dangerous summer, by occasion of a pestilence, noisome to all kind of living creatures. Of which incurable malady, when as neither the reason could be found, nor any end thereof seen, the Books of Sibylla, were by a decree of the Senat perused: and Dumvires, appointed for Divine Rites and Ceremonies, by celebrating a Læstifene (then first instituted in the City of Rome) to appease and pacifie Apollo, Latona, and Diana, Hercules, Mercury and Nephtune: feasted them (as it were) for the space of eight days together, & for that purpose they set out three three beds or banquetting tables, with as magnificent and stately furniture as could be for that time possibly devised. Which solemnity was privately also performed. All the gates and doors through the City flood wide open forsooth of viands were set out abroad to be used in common open house kept for all comers, one with another, as well unknown strangers as their acquaintance, with all friendly welcome, and entertainment. Kindly, and courteously would they talk and devise, even with their adversaries: all chiding and brauling was laid aside and put under foot. The prisoners also for that time were enlarged, yea, and confidence made afterwards, that any should be laid or kept in irons, unto whom the gods had vouchsafed that gracious deed.

But all this while much trouble there was, and many alarms before Vei, by reason that three wars were joyned now in one. For when as all at once the Capenats and the Falisci came (in manner as afore, about the fortifications and trenches of the Romans) for to rescue the besieged, they were forced to make head, and hazzard a doubtful battel against three armies. But the best help here had, was the remembrance of the late condemning of Sergius and Virginius. Therefore having conducted by a nearer way, their forces from the greater camp (which before lay still and would not come to incur) they set upon the Capenats backs, as they turned against the rampart of the Romans. The battel there begun, made the Falisci also afraid: in which affright of theirs they suddenly sallied out of the lesser hold, in so good time that they forced the enemies to turn their backs, all quaking for fear. And having got the upper hand, they followed the train of the victory, and in the chase made a very great slaughter and destruction of them. And not long after, the foragers that wasted the land of the Capenats, as they ranged abroad here and there, encountered the residue and remnant of this battel, as if fortune of purpose had presented them to their hands, and swept them up clean. Also many of the Veientians as they fled back into the City, were cut in pieces before their very gates: whilst they within for fear lest the Romans at once should rush in, made the gates fast and so shut out the hindmost of their own men. These were the achievements of this year.

And now approached the Election of the Tribuns military, whereof the nobles had in a manner a great care then of the war: as who saw now that the sovereignty rule was not only parted with the Commonalty, but welnear on their own behalf quite lost. Therefore albeit of set purpose they had prepared most noble and excellent men to stand in suit, whom to pass by and let slip, they thought the people would have been ashamed: yet nevertheless they themselves (as if they had been the parties that stood tried every way, and not only sought the help of men, but also craved it at the hands of the gods: making it great scruple and a matter of conscience: and alledging that the elections for two years past were not according to the wil of God: as appeared by this, say they, that in the former year there was an intolerable winter, and such asportended some heavy judgements from above: how also the year following, there were no prodigious tokens shewed abroad, but even the very events and effects thereof, were seen and felt: namely, the pestilence both in Country and City, through the very indignation, no doubt, of the gods, for that in the fatal Books of Sibylla it was found out, that they ought to have been pacified, for the diverting away of that pestilent influence. As if in those solemn assemblies which ought in the name of the gods & religiously to be held, the gods thought it an indignation and unseemly thing, that the honourable offices of state should be made common: no distinction of degrees, no difference of honours observed, but all confused and shuffled together. The people therefore being driven into amaze, not only in regard of the Majesty and Dignity of those that were competitors, but also of a very remore of conscience, chose for Tribuns military in Coff. authority: all of the Nobility; and a good part of them, the most honorable personages of the rest, to wit, L. Valerius Potitus the first time, M. Valerius Maximus, M. Furius Camillus the third time, L. Furius Medullinus the third time, Quintus Servilius Fidenas the second time, Quintus Sulpicius Camerinus the second time. Howbeit in this year no great exploit worthy record, was performed at Vei under these Tribuns. All the service that was, consisted in foraging and wasting. The two Lord Generals raised huge booties, to wit, Potitus from Falerii, Camillus from Capena: leaving behind them nothing whole and untouched, that might be spoiled by fire or sword. In this mean time many fearful prodigious tokens were reported, the most part whereof were slenderly credited, for that there was but one only author: and because there were no soothsayers, by whom they might make procuration therefore (since that the Tulsans were now professed enemies) they were altogether neglected. But one especially there was, which all men had an eye and regard unto, namely, for that a certain pool within the Alban forest, without extraordinary rain from above, or any other occasion which might make the thing seem less miraculous and wonderful, was risen unto an unusual height. Certain Orators therefore were sent to the Oracle of Delphi, to know what the gods foresignified by that prodigious token. But they, as god would, met with an interpreter of the Destinies nearer home, to wit, an ancient Veientian, who (upon a time, when as the soldiers, both of the Romans and Tulsans, let fly one at the other taunts and scoffs from their stations and guards) thus spake in propheticall wise: That until the water were drained and let out of the Alban poole, the Romans should never be masters of the town of Vei. Which saying of his was at the first condemned as a foolish word: rashly let fall from him: but after, it began to be much talked of, so long, until a certain Roman souldier from out of his ward, enquired of a townsman that warded next unto him (for now by reason of long war they had encrease of speech one with another) what he was who had cast out such an ambiguous riddle of the Alban Lake? When

A When he heard that he was a soothsayer, being himself also a man not without some sense of religion, he strained that wildfirth to communication, pretending that he would gladly be resolved himself, as touching a particular prodigious object that troubled his mind: & therefore requested him at his good leisure, to take to much pain as to confer with him, and give him counsell about the expiation and diverting the danger thereof. Now when they were both gone a good way from their fellows, unarmed, and without all fear and suspicion of the other, the Roman being alittle tall young man, caught the feeble old fellow in the sight of them all, and notwithstanding a great stir that the Tulsans made, but all in vain had him away perforce to his own company; who being brought before the General, was sent afterwards to come into the Senat. And being demanded what the meaning of that should be, which he had prognosticated and presaged concerning the Alban lake, answered thus: "Certainly the gods were offended with the people of Vei that day on which they put this into his mind to betray the fatal and inevitable destruction of their State and country: and therefore that, which is the people being stirred by divine inspiration had prophesied, neither might he call back again his utterance, and besides, happily by concealing those things, which the immortal gods would have to be published, there might be committed as great sin, as by disclosing mysteries to be concealed. Thus therefore (quoth he) it is written in the fatal books of fortunes, and thus in the Tulsans learning, to us is delivered, that when the Alban water overflowed, if then the Romans with due and religious ceremonies let it out, they should have the victory of the Veientians: but before that the gods would not forsake the walls of the Veientians. Then went he on still, and shewed what was the solemn and right manner of draining the water. But the Nobles supposing authority to be the light of credit, and not of sufficient account in so weighty a matter to be believed, resolved to expect the Embassadors, and the answer of the Oracle of Apollon. But before these messengers were returned from Delphi, or any expiation found out for this Alban miracle, the new Tribuns Military with Consuls authority, L. Julius Tullus, L. Furius Medullinus the fourth time, L. Sergius Fidenas, A. Posthumus Regillensis, P. Cornelius Maluginensis, A. Manlius began their government.

In that year there arose new enemies, the Tarquinians; they seeing the Romans busied with many wars at once, with the Volscians at Anagnin, who laid siege to the fort there: with the Aequians at Lavinia, who assaulted the colony of the Romans: besides, with the Veientians the Faliscians and Capenats: and that within the City there was no greater quietness, by reason of variance between the Nobility and Commons: supposing, I say, that hereby they had good opportunity to do some injury and harm, they sent forth certain bands of souldiers lightly appointed, into the territory of Rome, to forrage and make spoil: thinking that the Romans would either put up that wrong at their hands without revenge, because they would not charge themselves with a new war: or encounter them and make head with a small power and the same but slender and disarmed. The Romans were more offended at the indignity of these bravadoes, than they cared much for the spoil done by the Tarquinians. And thereupon they neither made much ado about the matter, nor drove it out any long while. A. Posthumus and L. Julius levied a power without any ordinary muster (for letted they were by the Tribunes of the Commons) even in a manner of voluntary souldiers, whom they had procured with good words and comfortable speeches. And passing throughout the country of the Caris by crofs & crooked waies, surprised the Tarquinians upon the sudden, as they returned from plundering & laden with great prizes. Many they slew, all they cayed of their loading: and thus having recovered the spoils of their lands, they returned to Rome. Two daies were allowed for the owners, every own to own his proper goods: & on the third day, such goods that were unknown (whereof the most part belonged to the enemies) were sold in port-sale: and that money which was made thereof was divided among the souldiers. All other wars, and especially the Veientian, had doubtful issue. For now the Romans despairing of a morsel help, regarded and expected only the courtes of destinies and the will of the gods. By which time the Embassadors were returned from Delphi, bringing the answer of the Oracle, agreeable to the former answer made by the wizard, with taken prisoner: and it ran in this forme: Beware O Romans that the Alban water be not kept too long in the pool. Beware thou let it not discharge it self into the sea. Let it fresh and wear the fields therewith, by sundry rivuluses or streams: thou shalt waste it and draw it dry. Then assault valiantly the enemies walls, remembering that out of that City which so many years thou hast besieged, victory is promised to thee, if by those destinies which now are revealed. And after the war ended and conquest achieved, see thou bring unto my temple, an ample and honourable present: and perform shiftered ceremonies of thy country according to the old custome, and renew those fresh which have of late time been neglected. Here grew this captains prophet above said to be greatly accounted of: and the Tribuns military, Cornelius and Posthumus, began to take his counsel and advice, about the procuration of the Alban miracle, and to appease the gods in due order. And found it was at last where it was that the gods blamed the neglect of ceremonies & for letting the ancient solemnities and sacrifices: and that certainly it was nothing else, but that there was an error committed in creation of the Magistrats: and they created, had solemnized the Latine holidays wrong and celebrated the sacrifices in the Alban manner amiss. The only purging or expiation whereof was, that the Tribuns military should give over their office, and that they should take new Auspices again by the flight & singing of birds, and so to proceed to an Interregnum. All which things were according to a decree of the Senat performed. Whereupon there interreggents succeeded one after another. M. Valerius, Q. Servilius Fidenas, M. Furius Camillus. But all this while no end there was, nor intermission of troubles and dissensions. For the Tribunes of the Commons disturbed and staid the assembly for the election so long, until it was agreed that the greater part of the Tribunes military should be created from the Commons.

During these affairs, the Tribunes held certain Diets and Councils at the Temple of Vulcanus: where when the Capenats and Falisci required that with one common assent and resolution, all the people of Hetruria should raise the siege from Veii, this answer was returned: "That here-fore they had denied the Venicians their help in this regard, that they were not to seek for aid at their hands, from whom in so weighty a matter they had not sought for council: but now their own fortune made answer for them. For such was the difficulty of their present estate, that if they would, yet they well could not: considering especially how into that part of Hetruria there were newly arrived to seat themselves there, the Gauls, a strange nation unto them: with whom they neither had assured peace, nor yet certain war to trust unto. Howbeit for blood sake, and for the very name, and in regard of the present perils of their kindred, they would grant thus much: that if any of their youth would go forth to the war willingly and of themselves, they would be no hindrance. Now was it noised at Rome, that a mighty great number of these enemies were come to raise the siege. Whereby the civil discords of (as it is commonly seen upon a general fear) began to wax more calm and to slacke. For the principall Tribe that had the prerogative to give their first voice, chose P. Licinius Calvus Tribune Military, without his own suit (but not against the will of the Nobles) a man of approved good carriage, and moderation in his former government, but exceeding old. And it appeared evidently, that all the rest for that year, should be choiceworthy after him, out of the College of those that had been Tribunes Consular beforetimes: namely, L. Titinius, P. Menenius, Cn. Genucius, L. Attilius: who before they were elected and pronounced, P. Licinius Calvus spake in this manner (by the permission of the Interreges) unto the other Tribes, that were called in their right and orderly course, to their suffrages. "I see well, my masters O ye Citizens of Rome, that in this election, wherein ye have in remembrance our former Magistracy, ye gaffe and preface happily against the year ensuing, concord and unity: the only thing at this time of all others most profitable: in case I say, you chuse again, those who by experience also are become now sufficient. But as for me, you see I am not the same man I was: but a bare shadow and name only is all that is left of P. Licinius. The strength of my body crasse, and feeble, the sense of my eyes and ears dim and dull: my memory faithle, the quickness of my spirit grown heavy and lumpish. But behold (quoth he, laying hand on his son) this young man, the very image and portraiture of him, whom ye afore time made Tribune Military, the first that ever was out of the commonalty, him I trained and brought up after my own order and discipline, in stead of my self. I bequeath, I give, I dedicate unto the commonweal And I beseech you Quirites, that the dignity which of your selves you have offered unto me, without my seeking, you would bestow upon him at his own humble suit, and the rather shew him this favour at my earnest request in his behalf. The father had his desire granted. And to his son P. Licinius, was with them, whom before we named, declared Tribune Military in Consular authority. Titinius and Genucius Tribunes Military, made an expedition against the Falisci and Capenats: Who managing the war in greater heat and courage, than with sage advice and counsel, plunged themselves headlong into an ambushment of their enemies. Genucius paid for his rashness, and made amends by an honorable death: For he was slain even before the ensignes, valiantly fighting in the vanguard of the battell with the formost. But Titinius, having after much fear rallied his souldiers, retired himself unto an high hill, and made head again. Howbeit he durst not encounter the enemy on even and plain ground. The same of this defeat was greater than the losse of his wife. And yet it had like to have turned into a right great damage and overthrow. So great was the fear, not at Rome only, whither much news came diversly reported: but also in the camp before Veii, that hardly could the souldiers be kept from running away. For it was noised all over the camp, that the Capenats and Faliscians had got the victory, slain the Generals and the whole army: and that all the flour and strength of Tutany was not far off. But at Rome there was much more burly-bury: For there it was verily believed, that the leaguer about Veii was assailed, and that, part of the enemies already were coming in warlike manner against the City: so as they came running on heaps to man the walls. And even the very matrons and dames of the City, whom publicke fear had caused to leave their houses, fell to their beads and supplication in the churches: beseeching the gods to avert and divert destruction from the houses, Temples, and walls of the City of Rome, and to turn away that fear from them upon Veii if they renewed aught their festivity daies, if they made satisfaction by sacrifice for the prodigious fights, and no otherwise.

Now by this time were the solemn plaies & the Latine holidays renewed, now was the water let out of the Alban lake into the fields, now Veii drew neerer to her final end, bated by the course of the Destinies. Therefore there was created M. Furius Camillus Dictator, the fatal captain, predestined to destroy that City, and to save his own country: who appointed P. Cornelius Scipio Collonel of the horimen. The change of the General made a change soon of all things else. The hopes of men were other than afore, the minds of men were altered, yea, the fortune of the City seemed not the same. But first of all, he proceeded by martiall law against them, who in that festivity

A fright at the last alarm, were fled from Veii: and taught his souldiers not to fear their enemies' most, but likewise to stand in awe of their own Commander. And after he had published to take mutters upon a certain day, himself in the mean while rode post to Veii, there to encourage the hearts of the souldiers. From thence he returned to Rome, for to levy a new army: and there was not one that refused to serve under his standard. For even the youth of the forrainers both Latins and Hernicks, came & offered their service in that war. Unto whom, when as the Dictator had in the Senate house yielded thanks, and that all things now were in sufficient readines, by a decree of the Senat he made a vow, that when he had won Veii, he would inclemently celebrat the great games, and redifie and consecrate anew, the Temple to dame Maiana, which afore time had been

B dedicated by King Servius Tullius. Thus when he was gone forth from the City, and his army on foot, with greater expectation of the people then hope: first he fought a field with the Faliscians and Capenats in the Country of Neper, [called at this day Nepe] where he ordered all the exploits with as great discretion and policy as might be: and as it commonly falleth out heaped as well and fortune favoured his designs. He not only defeated his enemies in battell, but also drave them out of the field, and gained a huge booty, wherof the greatest part came to the Treasurer his coffers: and somewhat (though not much) was given to the souldiers. From thence he marched with his armour to Veii, and there he caused more lances and battillions to be made, and to stand thicker together. And having made proclamation, that none should fight without speciall commandment, he withdrew the souldiers to the making of trenches and rampiers, from their skirmishes that they made oftentimes, and that rashly, betwene their camp and the wall of the town.

C The great work of all the rest and most laborious, was the undermining that was begun into the Caille of the enemies. And to the end that this work should not be intermitted, nor yet the continual labour till under the ground might over-toll them: he divided the pioneers into fix parts, and each of them wrought fix hours round by turns, so that both night and day, they never gave over before they had wrought a way to the Caille. The Dictator seeing now the victory as it were in his hands, and a most rich City ready to be taken, and that there was like to be such sacceage, as never had been the like in all the wars put together aforetime: lest that he might incur either any mutiny and anger of the souldiers in pinching and scant parting of the pillage, or displeasure and discontentment of the Rulers and Nobles of Rome, by so prodigall a largesse in sharing all: dispatched his letters to the Senat, to this effect, "That whereas by the goodnesse of the immortal

D Gods, his own policy and direction, and the travell of his souldiers, the City Veii was now in a manner at his devotion; what they would advise, should be done with the rich spoils thereof. There were two divers opinions that mightily distracted the Senat: the one of the old P. Licinius, whose mind being asked of his son, spake first (by report) and said: that his opinion was, there should a proclamation be published abroad among the people, that whosoever would be partaker of the booty, should go to the Leaguer before Veii. The other of Ap. Claudius, who finding fault with this new, prodigall, unequal, and undiscreeit largesse, in that they thought it unlawful and unfit, that the treasure got of the enemies should come once at leastwise to the common purse of the City, which had been emptied to often by reason of wars: was of advice, "That the sould-

E ders should have their pay out of it, that the Commons thereby might be eased, in the charges of the subsidy levied of them: for so should every man house equally feel the poverty and part of that benefit, and the hands of idle persons remaining at home in the town, greedy now of rifling, and who would be fingerling of Pillage, should not pluck from the hardy warriors, their due rewards. For as much as it is usually seen, that as the valiantest man commonly smeth at the greatest part of travell and perill, so the more coward always reacheth at the biggest portion of the spoil, and hath his hand deepest therein: Contrariwise, Licinius, alleged that much money laid up would be always suspected and odious, and would mislead many unto the Commons of examinations & finding one fault or other, wherof conditions and commotions may arise, and would give occasions of new laws to be preferred: and there-

F fore better it were: that by this gift and boon the hearts of the Commons were won and reconciled: who being spent and eaten out by reason of their charges of so many years, here with might be well relieved. And that they ought to tast the fruit and sweetnesse of the booty out of that war, in which they had spent their years, and were waxen old men: And that it would be more welcome and acceptable, that every man should be his own carver, and with his own hand catch from the enemy what he could, and bring it home with him, than if they should receive much more by a great deal at the discretion and pleasure of another. And the Dictator himselfe (saith he) hath avoided as neer as he could, the displeasure, hatred, and offence that might arise thereof, and therefore posted it off to the Senat: the Senat ought likewise seeing the matter is put to them, to let the Commons alone therewith, and permit every man to

G have such share as the fortune of war will allot him. This advice which made the Senat gracious with the people, was thought to be the safer and better of the twain. Whereupon proclamation was made, That whosoever would have part of the spoil of Veii, should shew himselfe before the Dictator in the camp. So there went a huge multitude, that they filled the camp againe. Then the Dictator after sacrifice done, and advice taken of the lucky signes of birds, went forth and commanding his souldiers to take armes and weapons in hand, spake these words and said: "By thy conduct and the instinct of thy divine power O Pythius Apollo, I let forward to the winning of the town of Veii, & now to thee I vow the tenth part of the spoils thereof.

Difference in the Senat:
about the pill-lage of Veii.

"And thee withal (O Queen Juno) who at this hour dost inhabit within the compass of these walls, I beseech, that thou wouldst vouchsafe, to follow us after conquest into this city, ours now, and thine within awhile: whereas thou mightst be shrined in a Temple meet for thee, and the grandeur of thy majesty. Having made these prayers, with an exceeding multitude he invested the city, and assaulted it round on all parts: to the end that they within might have less perceivance of the peril intended towards them from the undermining. The Venicians little knowing that they were betrayed, partly by their own prophets, and partly by the Oracles abroad, and that some of their gods were invited and bidden to part of the spoil and massacre, and other by vows and prayers trained and called out of their own city, began to look after the temples of their enemies & their new habitations little weening that this was their last day, & fearing nothing less than that their walls should by undermining be overthrown, and that their Castle was full already of enemies: every man for himself ran armed to the walls, marvelling what the matter should be, that whereas for so many daies space no man stirred out of the Romans Leaguer, then of a sudden (as if it were in a wood rage) they ran upon head [so rashly to the assault. But hereto belongeth a tale.] That when the Venician King was at sacrifice, this voice of the Southsister was overheard out of the mine under ground, That he whose day was to cut forth the Inwards of that sacrifice should obtain victory, and moved the Roman souldiers, to break out of the undermining, and to catch up the entrails and bowels, and carry them to the Dictator. But as in things of great antiquity it is fittest me, that those which carry some likelihood of truth, be received for true: so for fabulous matters fitter indeed to make a show in a stage play (where people take delight in such miracles) than to be sadly believed, it will not quit for the pains either to avouch them, or disavow them. The mine or cave at the same time (no doubt) full of chosen souldiers, yielded forth all at once armed men into the Church of Juno, which was in the castle of Veii, and some of them set upon the backs of their enemies that were on the walls: others pluck up the portcullis of the gates: some of them, whilst from the houses the women and servants flung down stones and tiles, cast fire abroad. So that every place was full of cries and voices, partly of them that frightened others, and partly of those that were afflicted, with a confused screeking of women and children. When as now in a moment, the armed souldiers were thrown down from the walls eke every where, and the gates let open: whilst some entered marching in array, others scaled the naked walls, the city was filled with enemies a and skirmishes there were in every place. After great massacre and execution committed, the fight began to quail: and the Dictator commanded the Bedles to proclame and give commandment, to spare the unarmed. Thus the bloodshed ended, Whereupon the unarmed people began to yield: and by permission of the Dictator the souldiers ran to the spoil. Which being brought in sight of the Dictator, of greater price and value a good deal, than either was hoped or looked for: it is said that he stretched forth his hands towards heaven and praised, "That if his own fortune and the felicity of the people of Rome were thought by any good or man to be excessive, the envy belonging thereto might be mitigated with as small a privor losse of his own in particular, and with as little common calamity of the people of Rome in general, as might possibly be. And it is recorded, that in this manner praying and worshipping, as he turned himself about, he slipped forward and caught a fall. And as men afterwards guesse by that which fell out, it was supposed that the ominous token presaged the condemnation of Camillus himself, and the ruin of the city of Rome, which hapned within a few years after to be forced and sacked. Thus was that day spent in the slaughter of enemies, and in rifling of that most wealthy city. The morrow after, the Dictator sold in portsale the bodies of as many as were freeborn. That money only came into the common treasury not without some anger and repining of the Commons. And as for that booty and spoil which they brought with them away, they counted themselves beholden therefore, neither to the General himself (who to colour and excuse his own negligence had referred the matter to the Senat: wherein he might have used his own liberty and discretion) nor to the Senat: but unto the House of the Licinius, whereof, the son propounded the matter before the Senat, and the father was the author of so popular an overture.

When as now worldly and earthly riches, were carried forth and tumbled out of Veii by heaps, then began they to remove and have away the sacred gifts and oblations of the gods with the gods themselves, but after the manner of devout worshippers, rather than of greedy spoilers. For chosen there were out of the whole army, certain youths in the flower of their age, who having their bodies clean washed, and being arrayed in robes, had in charge to carry Queen Juno to Rome, and entered into the Church with great adoration and reverence: and at the first very charily and religiously laid hand upon her, for that (after the Tuscan manner) there used none to handle that Image but the Priest of one certain tribe. After this, when as one of them, wherewith were upon a certain divine inspiration, or in some youthful sport, call out these words, Wilt thou march to Rome dame Juno? The rest with one voice cried aloud, That she gave a nod, and seemed thereto to give assent: whereupon this also was added to the tale, that she was heard to say, I will. But for certain it is reported, that she was stirred out of her footstall, with the help of a small lever, and that as she willingly was displaced, so she was easily removed & translated, and so safe and sound conveyed into the mountain Aventine, there to abide and remain forever; which was the place assigned unto her by the vows of the Roman Dictator. And there Camillus according to his vow, dedicated to her afterwards a temple. This was the final end and fall of Veii, the richest City of all the Tuscan, which which even in the last and utmost calamity shewed her mightiness, and having been besieged round about continually the space of ten summers and winters, & in that time done much more annoyance and hurt then it received, was now at last through the necessity of final death, gained rather by long siege and secret undermining, then won by forcible assault and violence:

When tidings came to Rome of the winning of Veii, albeit both the prodigious signs that were seen, had been expiat by sacrifice, and that the answers of the Prophets and wilemen yea, and the Oracles of Apollo were well known: and that so far forth as mens counsel and policy might help, they had chosen for General M. Furius, the most noble captain and warrior of all others: yet considering they had there waited for many years with variable fortune, and received in any losses and overthrows, their joy was exceeding great, as if a thing had hapned unlooked for. And before that the Senat could make a decree, all the churches were full of the dames of Rome giving thanks to their gods. And the Senat ordained by an act, that supplications should continue for four daies, the like as never had been before time in any war. The Dictator also was met upon the way as he came home by all degrees and estates in great number, and was more welcomed and honoured then any man before time, to that day. And the triumph far exceeded the usual manner of the solemnity to that day belonging. But most of all was he himself all goodly to be seen, entering into the city in a chariot drawn with white steeds. And that was thought an honour, not only unmeet for the quality of a citizen, but hardly becoming the condition of any man whatsoever. For they made it matter of conscience, that their Dictator should be equal with Jupiter, and the sun, in respect of their honours: for which only cause especially, the triumph was more glorious than gracious, and taken in good part. Then assigned he & set out to Queen Juno a church in Aventine hill, and dedicated another to dame Minerva, and so having achieved and performed those divine and human deeds, he reigned up his Dictatorship.

After this began some speech about the Present to Apollo. Unto whom, when as Camillus said that he had vowed the tenth part of the spoil: and the Priests and Prelats thought good that the people should discharge their conscience in that behalf: there could no ready mean be found how to command them to give back again the spoil, that the due portion thereof might be set apart for the holy oblation. At the length they grew to this point, which was thought the easiest course of all, that whosoever would acquit himself and his house in conscience, should, after he had made an ultimatum to himself of his own share in the spoil, bring the value & price of the tenth part into the common Chest: that thereof might be made a golden oblation, meet for the state of that Temple, becoming the power of that god, and answerable to that dignity of the people of Rome. Yet even this contribution alienated the hearts of the people from Camillus.

Amid these affairs there came Embassadors from the Volscians and Equians, to treat for peace, and peace obtained they, rather because the city, wearied with continual wars, might now take rest and be at quiet, than for any defects of them that sued for it. After Veii was taken, the year following had his Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, two P. Cornelii, namely, Cassius and Scipio, M. Valerius Maximus the second time, C. Fabius Ambulstus the second time, L. Furius Medullinus the second time, and Q. Servilius the third time. Unto the Cornelii fell out by lot the Faliscan war, to Valerius and Servilius the Capenates. Who neither assaulted their cities by force, nor wearied them with siege: but foraged the countries, and drove booties away of such things as were in the fields, not a tree that beareth fruit, not any fruitful things besides, escaped their hands. This distress and calamity subdued the Capenates: who thereupon sued for peace, and had it granted. But amongst the Faliscians the war continued still. In the mean time, at Rome there were sundry seditions. For the appeasing whereof, it was thought good to send a Colony to Volsci, and thither three thousand citizens were appointed in checkroll. And Triumvirs were thereto chosen, who divided to every man three acres of ground and a half, and one twelfth part. That began to be despised, because they thought it but a poor comfort offered to stop their mouths withal, and to put them beside a greater hope. For why should the Commons be sent away into the Volscians land, seeing there was Veii within their eye-sight, a most fair city, and the land about more plentiful and large than that of Rome? And as for the city it self, they preferred it, either for the site, or for the private or public buildings and other places, before the city of Rome. Moreover a motion also was made (which, after that Rome was won by the French, was more hotly followed) concerning a General transmigration and removing to Veii for ever. Many, they intended that Veii should be inhabited, partly by the Commons, and partly by the Nobility: saying, That the people of Rome might well enough inhabit two cities jointly in one state of Commonwealth. Against all this, the LL. of the Senat laboured what they might, and plainly said, they would sooner dye in the sight of the people of Rome, than any of those matters should pass. For why? if there were now in one city so much contention, what would there be in twain? Would any man be so mad, as to prefer a conquered city, before his own country that had conquered the same? and suffered Veii after it is won to be in better estate then it was afore, even when it was at the bell? Finally, well might they be forsaken at home in their own country by their citizens, but to forsake their country and citizens, they would never be brought by any force whatsoever. They would not follow to Veii, T. Sempronius as their founder, for he amongst the Triumvirs for the Commons perswaded this Act: and leave their god Romulus the son of a god, the first flourisher and beginner of the city of Rome. Whilst these matters were in handling with so much stir and much debate and variance (for the nobles had won to their opinion some of the Tri- Tribunes) there was nothing else that staid the Commons hands from outrage, but this, that when there was an outcry made to begin the quarrell, and to let them together by the ears, the chiefs and principal Senators first came forth to the multitude, and offered themselves to be laid at, smitten and slain. In regard of whose age, dignity, and honour, they forbearing to do violence, were likewise for shame staid in their mood, for any the like attempts besides. Camillus taking vengeance hereof, ever and anon in all places, made speeches unto the people, and said: "That it was no marvel truly, that the city was in a rage and madness, which being charged with a vow, made more care of all things else, then to discharge their conscience thereof and let it perform. As for the collation and gathering of a small donative, rather then a tithe, he laid nothing of it: seeing that every man privately bound himself thereto, and the body of the people stood free of it. But one thing there was that his conscience would not suffer him to hold his peace, that out of that booty only which was of moveable things, the tenth was appointed to be levied: as for the city and ground that was won, which also was comprised within the vow, there were no words at all made. When as the debating of this matter, which to the Senat seemed doubtful and hard, was put over to the Priests and Prelats: their college calling to them Camillus, thought good, that whatsoever the Veientians had before the vow made, and whatsoever after the vow, came into the hands of the people of Rome, the tenth part thereof should be consecrated to Apollo. So both the city and the lands were valued: and many taken forth of the city chamber. And the Tribunes military Consul enjoyed therewith to buy gold. Whereof there being not store enough, the dames of the city, having their assemblies and meetings by themselves for to consult therabout, by a common decree made promise to the Tribunes military, and brought into the exchequer their own gold, and all the ornaments and jewels they had. This was as acceptable a thing, and as well taken of the Senat, as ever any had been: and for this liberality (men say) they had this honour granted unto them, as to ride to church and to plaies in hanging or ship-coaches, and as well on working daies as holidays, to be at their wagoes. When the gold was of every one received by weight and priced to the worth, that they might again be paid money therfore: it was agreed that a standing cup of gold should be made thereof, and presented as an oblation to Apollo at Delphi. So soon as they had eased and disburdened their minds of this religious vow, the Tribunes of the Commons began edition anew. So as the multitude was incited and stirred up against all the peers, but above all other against Camillus; charging him that what by consecrating and consecrating the booty of the Veientians, he had brought it to just nothing. Those nobles that were absent they blamed and they cried out against mightily, but of such that were present in place, and offered themselves unto them in their anger, they had some reverence. Now so soon as they saw the matter in question to be deferred and continued past that year, they chose again for the year following, those Tribunes of the Commons, which were the authors of that act and law. The Nobles likewise endeavoured the same for those that should oppose themselves against the law. So the Tribunes of the Commons (a good part of them) were chosen the very same again. But at the Election of the Tribunes Military, the Patrij after very much ado got at length, that Furius Camillus was created. They made semblance and pretended, that they would be provided of a General for war, but indeed their purpose was to be furnished of an adversary to withstand the acts and proceedings of the Tribunes. Together with Camillus were made Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, L. Furius Medullinus the first time, C. Aemilius, L. Valerius Publicola, Sp. Postumius, P. Cornelius the second time.

In the beginning of the year, the Tribunes of the Commons stirred not untill M. Furius Camillus was gone against the Falisci, as his charge required for that war. And by delays afterwards the matter was well cooled. As for Camillus, whom of all other they most feared to be their adversary, he waxed great and glorious by his service against the Falisci. For when as at the first, the enemies kept themselves within the walls, thinking it the safest way: he by waiting their country, and setting fire upon their villages, forced them to come forth of their town, howbeit they feared to be too bold, and to go far forward: and encamped themselves a mile and less from the town, N repositing their safety and security in nothing else, but in the dangerous and hard passage, the walls about being rough, ragged, and stony, in some places straight and narrow, in other up hill and steep. Camillus having taken a prisoner out of the fields, and being guided by his direction, late in the night dislodged his camp, and betimes in the morning at break of the day, showed himself upon the higher rounds a good deal. The Romans on three sides, fell to fortify by trenching and casting rampiers, whilst the rest of the army stood ready ranged for the battell. And whereas the enemies assayed to hinder the work, he discomfited them and put them to flight, whereupon the Falisci were so frightened, that as they fled again in dismay, they passed beyond their own camp, which was nearer; and made as fast as they could to the town. Many were slain and many wounded, before that in this assault they could hit upon the gates. Their camp being taken, O the booty thereof came into the Quæstors coffers, with the great gridding and anger of the soldiery. Howbeit yielding to the severity of discipline and good government: the same virtue which they had hated before, they now honoured and held in admiration. After this was the city besieged, and sconces and platforms raised about it. Otherwhiles also, as occasion was offered, the townsmen would fall forth and assault the Romans camp, and make light skirmishes. Thus the time passed without any great good hope of either side: for that they within the town, besieged, had of their former provision more store of corn & other necessities than they that A that lay at siege without. And it seemeth they would have had as long a peeces of worke there, as they had at Veji, had not fortune yielded to the Romans Generall, both a trial of his approved vertue in war and also speedy victory.

It was the manner among the Faliscians, to entertain for the government of their Children, one that should teach and instruct them in school, and withall bear them company wheresoever they went: and many children together (as the guile continued full even to this day in Greece) were committed to the charge and tuition of one man. As for the Nobles and principall mens sons of this City (as it is usually every where else) a speciall man had the teaching of them, such an one, as was thought most learned and the greatest clerk of all other. The man, having in time of peace begun to bring the children forth before the town side, to dispose and exercise themselves, gave not over his wonted manner now in time of war. And using still to train them abroad one while neerer, an other whiles further off from the gate, it fell out so, that one day what with pastime, and what with pleasant talk and discourses, he drew them further then he accustomed: and seeing his time, went forward as far as the enemies corps de gard, and so forth on, till he had brought them within the compass of the camp, and even to Camillus his pavilion. Where to his wicked intended act, he added also a more gracefull speech, saying, "That he yielded * Falerij into the Romans hands, in that he gave them those children to do with what they would, whose parents were the rulers and commanders of the city. Which words when Camillus heard, thou comest not (quoth he) lewd wretch as thou art, with thy lewd and curled pretence, either to a people or to a captain like thy selfe. We have not indeed with the Faliscians any league at all, by covenant of C man concluded and established: yet by nature, theris and will befall a kind of amity or society between us and them. There are laws due for war as well as for peace: and those have we learned to observe no less justly, than valiantly. We bear arms not against that filly age, which usually is spared in raising and lacking of towns, but against armed men, and those who being, by us neither harmed nor provoked, have assailed the Romans camp at Veji. And yet those enemies (as bad as they be like as thou hast for thy part exceeded them in a new and strange kind of wickedness: to will I conquer I doubt not, by fears that the Romans profess: by vertue, by travel, by hardy fight: like as I have done Veji already. After this he caused him to be stripped naked, and so with his hands bound behind him, he delivered him to the children, for to bring him back to Falerij; and gave them rods withall, wherewith they might whip and drive this traitorous D person forward into the city. At which sight the people at the first came, running together: and then the Magistrats called a Councell, to sit upon this strange occurrence. But see what a change it wrought in their hearts. They who a while before were with hatred and anger so cruelly set, as that they wished rather in a manner to be destroyed with the Veientians, then to accept of peace as the Capenates had done: now through out the whole city required to be at accord with the Romans. No talk in the Market place, no speech in the Councell house, but of the faithfulness and truth of the Roman, and of the justice of their Generall. And with one general consent of all, Embassadors were sent to Camillus, into the camp. And from thence by permission of Camillus to the Senat of Rome they went, to deliver up Falerij: and being admitted into the Senat house, in this wise (by report) they spake: "In that victory (right honourable) which neither God nor E man can chide but allow, are we by you and your General overcome and vanquished. And here we render our selves into your hands: supposing this (than which to a conquerour there can be nothing more honourable) that we shall live better under your government, than under our own proper laws and liberties. The event & issue of this war, hath afforded to mankind two worthy examples to follow. Ye for your part have made choice to observe faithfulness in war, rather then to achieve a present conquest: and we again, by this your faithful dealing induced and provoked, have willingly yielded unto you the victory: confessing our selves now presently to be your liege & lawful subjects. Send whom you will to receive our armor, our hostages, our town with open gates. Neither shall you ever repent of our allegiance nor, we think much of your rule & government. Camillus had thanks both of the enemies and of the citizens. The Falisci were charged F with money for that years pay, that the people of Rome might be freed of their subsidy. Thus when peace was granted, the army was brought back again to Rome.

When as Camillus was returned after this conquest of his enemies into the City, with much better commendation, than when as in triumph he rode in a chariot drawn with white horses through the city, as being now famous for his just dealing and faithfulness: fiercely the Senat was abashed for very reverence of the man, and could no longer bear, but without further delay to acquit him of the vow he made. So there were sent L. Valerius, L. Sergius, A. Manlius as Embassadors in one galley unwitted, to present unto Apollo at Delphi by way of obligation, a standing cup of gold. Who not far off from the narrow seas of Sicily, were encountered & boarded by certain Liparian Pirates or men of war, and had to Lipara. Now the manner was of that city, as common rovers use to do, for to divide the prize among them. Haply the chief officer or Magistrat for that year, was one Timarchides, a man more like to the Romans than his own countrymen. Who having himself some reverent regard of the name of Embassadors, and the present of the god to whom it was sent, and the occasion thereof: possessed the multitude also (which also rightly relembreth their governor) with due religion and prick of conscience. This head ruler guided the Embassadors into their lodging, & entertained them courteously at the cities charges, waited them with the convoy of a sufficient fleet: accompanied them in person to Delphi, and from thence conducted them struction was toward: but also the help of man (which rested only in Furius Camillus) they did out of the City. Who being arrested to appear at a day by L. Apuleius Tribune of the Commons, and to make answer for the sacrifice of Vesta, and having buried about the same time his son, a forward young Gentleman, sent for home to his house, those of his own tribe, his skinfolk and followers, whereof a great part were of the Commons. And when he had sounded their minds, and received this answer from them, That they would defray and lay down so much, as he should be condemned in: but as to acquit him, that they could not possibly. Hereupon he departed in exile: praying to the immortal gods, that as he was guiltless and wrongfully dealt withall, so he would with all speed, cause that unthankful City to stand in need, and to have a mischief of him. In his absence condemned he was in* fifteen thousand pounds of brass coin. When this citizen was thus expelled, who if he had tarried still, (for as we may make reckoning of any earthly security) Rome could never have been won: behold, ambassadors came from the Clusines, requesting aid against the Gauls.

This nation (as it is reported) allured with the Sweetness of corn and wine especially (dainty chaffer and a new delight in those daies) passed over the Alps, and possessed those countries which had been storetime by the Tuicans inhabited. The voice goeth, that there was one Arnus a Clusine, who had brought wine into Gaul, to ensue that people withall, upon an anger and displeasure that his wife had been deflowered by one Lucanus (whose grandfather Arnus himself had been) a young gentleman of great might and power, and whom Arnus could not chastise and bridle, without assistance of foreign forces: This man was the Gauls guide in passing over the Alps, and the principal instrument to set them a work for to assault Clusium. I would not for my part deny, but that the French were brought to Clusium by Arnus or some other Clusine: but most certain it is, that they who assaulted Clusium, were not the first that passed the Alps. For the Gauls two hundred years before they assaulted Clusium and won the City of Rome, came over into Italy. Neither fought the Gauls first with this nation of the Tuicans, but long after, and that oftentimes with those that dwell between Arvernus and the Alps. For, the Tuicans had all sovereign command, both by land and sea, before the Roman Empire was erected. The names of upper and nether sea, wherewith Italy is compassed about, as it were an Island, may be a sufficient proof, how great and puissant they were: seeing, that the one is by the general name of the Nation, called of Italians, the Tuican sea; the other the Adriatick, of a town of colony or the Tuicans called Adria. The Greeks do call the self same seas that (a) Tyrrhene and the Adriaticke seas. These Tuicans bending to both seas, inhabited those countries, consisting of twelve Cities: having first before on this side Arvernus, toward the nether sea, and afterwards beyond the (b) Arvernus, as many Colanics in number according to the Princes at the first beginning, and held in possession all those parts beyond the Po unto the Alps, except that Angle only of the Venicians, that are seated about the gulf of the Adriatick sea. And doubtless, the Nations about the Alps, especially the Rhetian, had their beginning thus whom the very country itself made savage, so they as retained nothing of old, but the found of their language, and the same broken and somewhat corrupted. Now for the coming of the Gauls over into Italy, thus much we have learned. In the daies of Priscus Targuntius King of Rome, the (c) Celtes which are athrid part of the Gauls, were under the rule of the (d) Bittur who chose a King over the Celtes, named Ambigatus, a great potentate and mighty, both in regard of valour and virtue, and also of his own private wealth and publick weal: for that under his regiment, Gaul was so fertile of corn, and grew so populous, that the exceeding number of the people could not well be governed. This man being of great age, and desirous now to disburden his Realm of that pestering multitude, declared that he would send Belovefus and Sigovefus his sons (two forward young men) to seek adventures, into what lands soever the gods and goddesses should by their token direct them: giving them commission to gather what number of men they would, to the end that no nation might withstand their coming. So it fell to Sigovefus lot, for to enter the forrest and woodland country of Herminia. Belovefus his fortune was a good deal better, to take his way (by the gods guidance) unto Italy: and he leaved of the Bittur rages, (e) Arvern (f) Sonnes (g) Helvi (h) Ambarri and (k) Ambri, those that might be spared out of those Countries: and setting forward with a mighty power of footmen & horsemen, came unto the (l) Tricardians. Now flood the Alps all against them in their way, which I marvel not were thought & insuperable impassable, as having not as yet any way made over them, (so far as any constant record maketh date) unless we list to believe the tales of Heracles. Now (as was the Gauls there, were hemmed in as it were on every side with those high mountains, and that they looked every way about them, how they might get over those high hills reaching up to the heavens, and so pass (as one would say) into an other world, they were fainted there and went no further, upon a scruple of conscience, for that it was reported, that certain strangers seeking land to inhabit, were by the people of (m) Salus set upon and assailed. These strangers were the (n) Massilians, who sailed from Phocis. This the Gauls supposing to be a fortunate preiuge of their success helped them forward, and took part with them: so as what place first they gat after they were landed, they fortified within the wide or broad forrests. They themselves passed through the Country of (o) Taurini, and over the fountains of the Alps, called (p) Tulia: and having vanquished the Tuicans in fight not far from the river (q) Ticinum, hearing that the Country wherein they abode (and sealed, was called Insubrium (after the name of a territory and thire of the Heduns) they following and embracing the lucky name of that place, so conformable to the other of their own,

A. builded a City and called it (r) Mediolanum. Afterwards another power of Germans with their captain Eluvius, following the steps of the former Gauls, by the same streights (with good leave and favour of Belovefus) passed over the Alps, and remained there: and where now (s) Brixia and (t) Verona two towns stand (the (u) Libri than inhabited those parts) made their abode. After this, the Saluvii passed over, who expelled all the Ligurians that dwell on this side the river Ticinum, but only the Levi, an ancient nation. After them the (x) Baii and (y) Langones passed over the hill (z) Pennini, dispossessed the Tuicans & the Umbrians of their territories, yet so as they kept them within Arvernus. Then the Sonnes which had the last command of those strangers, inhabited the country from the river (a) Verna unto (b) Athesi. This nation I find to have come to (c) Clusium, and afterwards from thence to Rome; many it is not certain whether this nation alone came, or that they were aided by all the Gauls, that dwell on this side the Alps.

The Clusines terrified with this new war, advising well both their number and the unaccustomed looks, and villages of the men, which they had not seen afore, and the strange armour withall: & hearing besides, that the legion of the Tuicans both on this side the Po and beyond, had been oftentimes by them discomfited: Albeit in the Romans they had no interest at all in regard of any league or amity, only this, that they had not maintained their kinsfolk the Venicians against the Romans, sent their Embassadors to Rome, to crave aid of the Senat. Aid they obtained none: Embassadors there were sent three, the sonnes of M. Fabius Ambulius, who in the name of the Senat and people of Rome should treat with the Gauls and perfwade with them, not to set upon the confederates and friends of the people of Rome namely, such as at whose hands they had received no wrong: saying moreover, that if they would put the Romans to it, the Romans were to defend "Gauls by war, bowbeit they thought it better, if it might be, to have no wars at all: but that the them a new-come nation should grow into knowledge and acquaintance, rather by peace than by war. The embassy was mild and modest enough, but the Embassadors themselves were over fierce & hally, and more like Gauls than Romans: Who having done their message in the assembly of the Gauls, were thus again answered, "Although the name of the Romans was but of late heard of, yet they, yet they were perfwaded that they were hardy men, whose hands the Clusines in their fear, sought and requested succour. And whereas they choote rather to defend their allies by way of embassy, than by open war, they likewise neither desired nor refused peace: which they offered: If the Clusines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit) "a part of their marches, whereof they held in possession more than they did well people and ac-cupy: Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer whiles the Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the Romans face, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other men in valour & chivalry. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to require ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interest or title had the Gauls in *Tu-*cany? They again stoutly made answer: that they carried their right in their swords point, and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both sides to set on fire, that they ran to their weapons & skirmish'd with the Tuicans. Then against all law of nations (a thing that bafened the destruction of the Roman City) the Embassadors took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known; For even before the engines of the Tuicans, there were seen three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight: so far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clusines. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabius riding out of the battell on horseback charged his lance upon the captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the engines and battell of the Tuicans, ran him through and slew him: and as he killed and disarmed him, the Gauls took knowledge of him, and throughout the whole host notice was given, that it was an Embassador of the Romans. So leaving their quarrell against the Clusines, they founded the retreat, and threatened the Romans. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome: but the elder sort prevailed, that there should be sent Embassadors first to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabii should be yielded unto them. When as the Gaul Embassadors had declared their message according to their commission, the Senat notwithstanding of the Fabii deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit suit of friends and private respects, would not permit to make an act of that, in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requit. The answer of the Gauls to the Embassadors of Rome.

D. their allies by way of embassy, than by open war, they likewise neither desired nor refused peace: which they offered: If the Clusines would grant the Gauls (which wanted ground to inhabit) "a part of their marches, whereof they held in possession more than they did well people and ac-cupy: Otherwise, no peace would be had. And hereof would they have an answer whiles the Romans were in place: and if they were denied ground, they would also fight even before the Romans face, that they might make report at home, how much the Gauls went beyond other men in valour & chivalry. And when as the Romans demanded again what right they had to require ground of the owners or to threaten war? For what interest or title had the Gauls in *Tu-*cany? They again stoutly made answer: that they carried their right in their swords point, and that valiant men were Lords of all the world. So they were on both sides to set on fire, that they ran to their weapons & skirmish'd with the Tuicans. Then against all law of nations (a thing that bafened the destruction of the Roman City) the Embassadors took arms. Neither could this be so secret but it was known; For even before the engines of the Tuicans, there were seen three most noble & valiant knights of the Romans for to fight: so far exceeded the valour of those strangers above all the Clusines. Moreover and besides, Quintus Fabius riding out of the battell on horseback charged his lance upon the captain of the Gauls, as he fiercely assailed the engines and battell of the Tuicans, ran him through and slew him: and as he killed and disarmed him, the Gauls took knowledge of him, and throughout the whole host notice was given, that it was an Embassador of the Romans. So leaving their quarrell against the Clusines, they founded the retreat, and threatened the Romans. There were of them, that thought good presently to advance forward to Rome: but the elder sort prevailed, that there should be sent Embassadors first to complain of the injuries, and to require that for the law of arms broken, the Fabii should be yielded unto them. When as the Gaul Embassadors had declared their message according to their commission, the Senat notwithstanding of the Fabii deed, and thought the barbarous Gauls required nothing but just and reason. Howbeit suit of friends and private respects, would not permit to make an act of that, in personages of so great mark and nobility, which they deemed meet and requit. honour, and according to their virtue and deserts: in their most stately garments and habiliments, which they wear when they carried their sacred chariots upon festival daies; or wherein they rode in triumph, now sat upon their ivory chairs in the very midst and entry of their houses. There be that write, how they willingly devoted and bequeathed themselves to die for their Country and Citizens of Rome: and that M. Fabius the High Priest read and pronounced unto them a certain hymn and precript form of prayer, to that purpose. The Gauls, both for that now they had rested from fight a whole night, and for their choler was somewhat cooled, and also because they had not in any place fought a bloody and dangerous battell with them, nor even at that time won the City by any assault or force, entered the morrow after into the City, without anger and heat of furious rage, by the gate Collina standing wide open, and so passed forward to the common place of assemblies, calling their eyes about them towards the Temples of the gods, and to the castle, which only presented one shew of war. And there leaving a sufficient guard, left haply from the Castle and Capitol they should be violently assaulted, after they were once aunder parted, they fell to raniack and rife: and meeting none at all in the void streets, some rush by heaps into the houses next hand, others go to those that were further off, supposing them at leastwise to be untouched, full of riches, and fit for to fill their hands. From thence again (as frightened by reason of such desolation, and fearing lest haply any fraud of the enemy might entrap them as they wandered one from another) they returned round in a ring together, into the market place, and the places near thereto. Where, when they saw the Commoners houses fast shut to & locked, and contrariwise the stately palaces of the Noblemen and chief Senators standing wide open, they were at a stand, and doubted more in a manner to enter upon the open places than the shut. And they beheld as they were with capping and crouching after a reverend manner, certain ancient personages sitting in the porches and entries of their houses, who besides their ornaments and apparel above the ordinary estate of men, for a certain majesty which they carried in their countenance and gravity of visage, resembled the gods. And when as they turned to them, & stood looking upon them, as if they had been Idols and sacred Images, M. Papirius, one of them; when a Gaul began to stroke his beard (which then they used all to wear long) with his ivory staffe (as they say) gave him a rap on the pate, and moved his patience. Whereupon he was the first that was murdered, and so the rest were all killed as they sat in their chairs of state. After this massacre of these honourable personages of the Nobility, they fell upon all the rest, and spared no creature: they raniacked their houses, and when they were empty, set fire on them. But whether it were that they were not all of them desirous to destroy the City utterly, or that it was the mind of the Leaders and chief of the Gauls, that for a terror there should be (see some sayesfires (if haply for the love of their houses, they that were besieged, might be induced to yield themselves:) or that all their houses were not burned at once, to the end that the remainder of the City might be as a pawn and pledge to mollify their enemies, and make their hearts to relent: howsoever, I say it was, the fire for the first day (as usually in Cities forced and won) spread not all abroad every where, to make a general havoc. The Romans from the Castle, seeing the City full of enemies, and in every street running up and down, and in all places fresh calamities and miseries one in the neck of another, were not able to conceive the same in mind and spirits, nor, nor so much as to have the right use of their ear: and eyes. For to what place soever the shouts and noise of the enemies, the howling and wailing of women and children, the noise of fire, and the rading and cracking downfalls of houses turned them aside in exceeding fear, thither they bent their minds, their faces, and eyes, as men by fortune set up aloft, as upon a stage or scaffold, to behold the fall and ruin of their Country: reserved to save nothing of all their wealth and substance, but only their own bodies: by thus much, more miserable and pitifull above all others that ever were besieged, in that being shut out from their native Country and City, they were besieged and beheld it, and all that they had in the enemies hands. Neither as ill as the day was spent, followed there a better night. Yea & when after this trouble some night the like morrow was come, there was no time but misnifed still some heavy object: and one impediment or other of new and fresh calamities. And albeit they were laden and overwhelmed with so many miseries, yet they nothing at all let fall or abated their courages, but resolved still, notwithstanding they saw all fired, all ruinate and laid even with the ground, manfully to defend that poor naked little hill which they held, and was their only hope left them to recover their freedom. And now seeing the same desolations daily happen they were so inured to misery, that past all sense and feeling of their own state and private fortune, they regarded nothing but their armour on their backs, and swords in their hands, as the only remnants and reliques of their hope. The Gauls likewise for certain daies, had made war with the poor houses only of the City, and all to no purpose: and when they perceived in all this burning and ruins of the City, no conquered, nothing now left but armed enemies, who were not, for all so many calamities, one jot terrified, nor their minds once inclined to yield without further force and violence were used: they determine to try the utmost, and to make an assault upon the fortresse. So on the morrow morning very early at sound of trumpet, all the whole multitude of them, arranged themselves in the market place. From whence with an out-cry and shout, under a fence of targets over their heads, they approach the Castle. Against whom the Romans behaved themselves, neither unadvisedly, nor fearfully, strengthening their wards and quarters, with a good Corps de guard against all Advences: and whereas they saw the banners displayed, that

A that way they opposed their strongest guards: and suffered the enemies to climb up the hill, supposing that the higher they were got up, so much the easier they might be beaten down. And being come up to the midst of the cliff, there they staid: and thence from the higher ground, which of it self in manner bare out against the enemy, with all their force they charged upon the Gauls, overturned them, and sent them down headlong: so as never after that, their any part of them, or all together would attempt that kind of service. Being therefore past hope to get up by force and arms, they make preparation for long siege: whereof until that time they had no mind: both for that the corn which was within they had consumed in burning of the City, and in the mean space, that which was in the country about, was carried and brought to Vei. Whereupon they divided their Army, purposing with one part thereof, to forrage and drive booties all about the nations thereby adjoining, and with the other to inveit the Castle: to the end, that the forragers abroad might bring in corn to serve them that lay at the siege. Now as those Gauls departed from the City, it was their hap and fortune to come to Ardea: (where Camillus abode in exile) there to make triall of the Romans vaieur. This Camillus being more penive in the behalf of the publicke calamity, than careful of his own: spending his spirits and wasting his body with crying out upon gods and men: thus fretting and chafing with himself, and wondering what was become of those valiant and hardy men, who under his conduct won Vei and Falerii, and who had fought other wars more valiantly alwaies than fortunately: of a sudden he heard that the Army of the Gauls approached, and that the Ardeates in great fear, fell to consultation thereabout what to do: and even as if he had been inspired from God above, he put himself forward and entered into the midst of the people assembled, who heretofore had obtained and forborn such publicke meetings and consultations. And thus he said: "You my Masters of Ardea, mine old friends sometimes, and now my new neighbours and fellow-Citizens, for so it is fallen out by your kindnes & desires, and by mine own fortune and condition: let no man think that I, forgetfull of mine own estate, am come thither hither into this audience. But the present object and publicke danger forceth every man to utter and bring forth in to fearful a time and business as this is, what help he can. And when shall I ever be thankful unto you for your favours and demerits, if now I stand still and do nothing? Or where shall I ever stand you in stead, if not in war? By my skill herein, I flourished in my Country, and being in war invincible, was in peace by unthankfull neighbours and unkind Citizens banished. And now have yegood occasion offered, and opportunity (O ye Ardeates) both to make recompence, for those great pleasures and curtesies in times past received of the people of Rome, as your selves do well remember, (and therefore be it spoken without upbraiding and reproaching of any mindfull persons) and also to win great honour of war, unto this City, by defeating a common enemy unto both. This nation, which thus cometh towards us with a dissolute and disordered army, are those to whom God and nature hath given bodies more big and corpulent than strong and able, hearts more stout and courageous than constant and resolute: whereby they bring with them alwaies into the field more few of terror, than true valour and execution. Whereof the late fall and disconsure of the Romans may be a sufficient proof and triall. They won the City when the gates stood open unto them: a small power from the Castle and Capitol was able to withstand and repell them. And weary already of the tediousness of siege, they are faine to depart. Stragling up and down, and wandering along the country. Their manner is when they have filled their bellies with wine and good victuals, (which they devour full greedily and hastily whereforever they can come by it:) so soon as night cometh on, without any place of defence, without watch or ward to lay themselves along like brute beasts, here and there by the waters sides. And now upon their good luckes, are they more secure and retchless, than they were wont to be. If ye be disposed to defend your walls, & not all to turn French, gather your selves together & at the first watch of the night arm, and to your weapons: Follow me to a massacre, and not to a skirmish: for if I do not deliver them unto your hands fast asleep to be hewn in pie like sheep and oxen, I refuse not to see the same end of mine estate at Ardea that I have found already at Rome. There was no one there, howsoever affected he was, friend or foe to Camillus, but was perswaded that the like warior was not in those daies to be found again. The assembly being broken up, they refresh their bodies, ready to fight so soon as ever the Signall should be propounded. Which being put forth, in the beginning and first watch of the night, they were ready with Camillus at the gates. And gone they were not far from the town, but they found (as it was foretold them) the Gauls camp without Corps de guard, neglected on every side: and it with a mighty cry they assail. There was in no place fight, but killing every where: and their naked bodies (as they lay fast asleep) were hacked and cut in pieces. However, some of those that were furthest off, being scared out of their couches, not knowing what violence or from whence it was, took to their heels and fled: other some stumbled at unawares upon the very enemy. A great part of them being come into the territory of Ardea, were by the townsmen who fellied out upon them as they were dispersed, environed and slain. The like slaughter to this there was of the Tuscans in the Country of Vei: who had so little pity and compassion, to see a City which well near forsook hundred years space bordering upon them, was now surprised by a strange enemy not heard of afore, that even at that very time they made rides into the Territory of Rome, and laden with booty from thence, purposed to assail even Vei also and the garrison, being the only place and means of rescue, and the last hope of the Roman name.

of Camillus in the Assembly of the Ardeates.

The Roman soldiers that lay in garrison there, had espied these Tuscans ranging about the country, and gathered together in a body to drive booties before them: and withall they desir'd their Camp pitched not far from Veii. Where, at first they pitted their own estate, but after, they fell into an indignation and anger that the Tuscans also, from whom they had diverted the Gauls war upon themselves, should in their calamities thus from them and have them in derision: so as they could scarcely temper themselves and forbear, but presently set upon them. But being fasted perforce by Captain Cedius, a Centurion whom they themselves had made their Ruler, they put off this exploit until night: Only their Commander and Leader was not to be compared with Camillus: else all the service was achieved in the same order, and with as good speed and happy success. Over and besides, by the guidance and direction of those prisoners which remained unslain overnight, they went forward as far as Soline, to another power of the Tuscans, and in the night following, upon a sudden they made a greater havoc and slaughter of them, and so in joyous manner with double conquest they return to Veii. At Rome in this mean time, the siege for the most part was but cold and slack, and all quiet on both sides: whilst the Gauls regarded and looked to this only, That none of their enemies should make an escape through their guards. At what time a certain valiant young Roman behaved himself so, as his own countrymen and enemies too had him in great admiration. There was a set sacrifice or solemnity to be celebrated by the house and lineage of Fabii, in the Mount Quirinal. For the accomplishment whereof, Caio Fabius Dorso in his holy robes, after the Gabins fashion, bearing in his hand the holy complements thereto belonging, came down from the Capitol, passed through the midst of the enemies' corps de K guard, and nothing moved whatsoever was done or said to terrify him, went on forth right to the mount Quirinal. And when he had there performed and dispatched all solemnities, returning the same way with like constant countenance and comely pace, hoping assuredly, that the gods would be merciful and gracious unto him, whose worship he had not left undone for any fear of death: he retired again to his company into the Capitol: whether it were that the Gauls were astonished at his wondrous boldness, or rather were touched in conscience with a reverent regard of Religion, wherein that nation is very zealous and devout. At Veii in the mean while they gathered not only heart every day more than other, but strength and forces also: for that not only Romans thither repaired out of the country, such as either in discomfiture of the battell, or for the calamity of the City now taken, had been attracted: but also out of Latium divers of their own accord had flocked thither to have their share in the pillage. Now they thought it high time to return to their country again, and to deliver it out of the enemies hands. The body was strong enough, but without an head it was. The very place put them in mind of Camillus, and a great part of the soldiers were such as had achieved prosperous exploits under his leading and conduct. And Cedius gave out plainly, that no god or man should make him give over his government, but would himself as mindfull of his own place, call for a General. So by general consent it was agreed, that Camillus should be sent forth from Ardea, but with the advice before of the Senat which was at Rome. So modest were they in all their carriage, and so precisely observed they (even in their desperate case) the due respect and regard of every action. Now to pass through the wards of their enemies, was an hard and dangerous adventure. To this exploit therefore, Pontius Cominius, a valorous young man, promised his service. Who bearing himself upon a bark or corke under him, hulled along the Tiber down the water to the City: and so then next way from the strand, over a steep cliff (which was negligently or not at all guarded by the enemy) he passed through the Capitoll, and being brought to the Magistrates, declared there his message from the Army. When he had received the Senates decree to this effect: Imprimis, That Camillus should be called back again out of exile by a Ward-leer, or the suffrages of the Curia: Item, that by the voices of the people he should be created Dictator out of hand: and that the soldiers might have for their General whom they desired: the messenger returned the same way back again to Veii. And Embassadors were sent to Camillus at Ardea, who conducted him to Veii. But I would rather believe that he departed not from Ardea, before he had certain intelligence of the Act of the Senat. N And for that neither without the will of the people, he might change the place whereto he was confined, nor unless he were named Dictator, have the conduct of the Army: they passed an Act of all the Wards, and Dictator was he declared in his absence. Whilst these things were a doing at Veii, the Castle of Rome and the Capitoll was in very great danger. For the Gauls, either having found out a mans footing that way as the messenger went from Veii, or espied at the cliff of Carmentis, an easie place to climb up: in a clear night sent a man before unarmed to assay the passage, & then gave him up his armour, and where it was steep, one helped, lifted up, and drew up another, as the difficulty of the place required. So as they got up to the top with such silence, that not only the Sentinels were not aware of them, but also the dogs (a watchfull creature at every noise in the night) were not once awakened therewith. But they could not so escape the gods, which were consecrated unto Juno, and for all the scarcity of visuals, were spared and not killed up. And this it was that saved them all. For with their gagling and fluttering of their wings, M. Manlius, who three years before had been Consul a right hardy and noble warrior, was awaked. Who taking weapon in hand, speedily went forth and raised the rest withall to take arms. And whilst all else made haste in a greatfright, he broke the Gaul who now stood upon the top, with the bolts and pike of his buckler, and turned him down. The fall of whom overturned them were

A were next. Then slew he others, (whiles they were in fear) who had laid their weapons out of hand, and took hold of the stones whereto they clinged close. By which time, the rest being come together, some flinging darts, others casting down stones, tumbled their enemies back, and the whole power of them lost their sure footing and fell down headlong. This tumult being appeased theret of the night (so far forth as men might with troubled minds, seeing that even the danger, past disquieted them) they gave themselves to sleep. When day was come, the soldiers by sound of Trumpet were summoned to assemble before their Tribunes, and considering there was reward due both to well-doing and mis-doing: Manlius first for his valour was commended and rewarded, not only by the Tribunes military, but also by consent of all the soldiers. Upon whom, they amongst them all, bestowed and brought home to his house (which stood upon the Cattle hill) whear-meal by the half-pints, and wine by the quarts. A matter of small reckoning to be spoken of: but in that scarcity this might be an argument of their love and affection, when every man beguiled his own belly, plucked from himself and the necessities of his life, and conferred the same to the honour and recompence of that one man. Then were summoned to appear the sentinels of that place where the enemy climbed up undetected. And when as P. Sulpicius a Tribune Military, had pronounced that he would exercise martial law upon them all, the soldiers cried out with open mouth, and laid all the fault on one watchman: and so for fear of a cruelty he spared all the rest: and with their general consent and approbation, he caused that undoubted guilty person to be thrown down from the rock. Whereupon they were more careful and circumspect in their watch, both amongst the Gauls (because it was commonly noised that there passed messengers to and fro between Veii and Rome: and also amongst the Romans, for the remembrance of the late danger by night. But above all other miseries that follow war and siege, the famine was fore in both the Armies. The Gauls were plagued with pestilence besides: for that they had pitched their tents in a place lying between two hills; exceeding hot by reason of the fires, and full of smook, carrying both dust and ashes, when any wind was stirring: which beethings that of all others, that nation cannot abide, as being used to wet and cold. Thus being smothered with heat, and therewith stifled and choked again, they died with contagious diseases like rotten sheep. And now for idleness that they would not bury them severally one by one, they laid the dead bodies on heaps one with another, and so burnt them: and made that place famous and notable by the name of Busta Gallica, i.e. Gaubury. Hereupon they grew to make some truce with the Romans, and emparled together by suffrance of the Generals. In which parties, when as the Gauls very often alleged the famine, and upon that extremity perswaded them to yield: it is said, that the Romans for to put them by that opinion of them, in many places from the Capitoll flung out loaves of bread into the very stations and camps de guard of the enemies. But at length neither could their hunger be dissembled, nor sustained any longer. Therefore, whilst the Dictator misseeth a power at Ardea by himself, he commandeth the General of horsemen, L. Valerius, to have away the Army from Veii: and maketh so good preparation, and furnisheth himself so, as he might be able to match his enemies, and to charge upon them. In the mean season, the army of the Capitoll wearied out with watchjog and warding, having fountained all humane miseries besides Hunger, which only of all others, nature would not suffer to be overcome: looking day by day for succour from the Dictator, now at last when not only their food, but their hope also failed them, and were grown to that weakness, that when they went to keep their guard, they could hardly bear the weight of their armour, they agreed and gave consent either to yield or to ransom themselves upon any condition they cared not what. Whiles the Gauls also gave forth plainly, and said, they might be entreated for a small consideration to give over siege. Then the Senat went together, and gave Commission to the Tribunes Military, to bargain and go through with them. So by a parley or treaty had between P. Sulpicius Tribune Military, and Brinnius the Duke of the Gauls, a conclusion was made, and that people, who within a short time should be Lords of the world, were valued and esteemed at a thousand pound weight of Gold. This in itself was a most odious and shameful thing, but there was adjoynd thereunto a foul indignity. For the Gauls brought forth false weights and uneven balances. And when the Tribunes refused them, behold, the insolent and proud Gaul would needs have his sword weighed too for advantage, adding this speech moreover, (which was intolerable for the Romans to hear) Woe worth men conquered, and down with them still. But neither God nor man would abide the Romans to live ransomed. For by good hap, before that shameful sum of money by composition was paid, before (I say) that upon some wrangling that fell between, all the Gold was weighed out, cometh the Dictator in the manner, and commandeth the gold to be had away, and the Gauls to void. And when as they made resistance and pleaded the capitulation and bargain, he again replieth, and saith, That the composition was not good, nor ought to stand, which after he was made Dictator, had been by an inferior Magistrate concluded, without his commandment & warrant: and withall warneth the Gauls to prepare themselves to fight: commanding his own soldiers to cast all their bag and baggage down on a heap, to put on their harness, to make ready their weapons, and by dint of steel, and not by weight of sword to redeem their Country, having in sight before their eyes the Churches of their gods, their wives and children, and the soil whereto the City stood (deformed now with miseries of war) and all things else which they ought by good reason to defend, recover, and be revenged for. Hereupon he marshalled his battell as the ground ground would give him leave, being the plot only of a City half ruinate and lying along, and with all of it self naturally uneven. Forecating and providing for all things with special choice and preparation to serve his souldiers turn, as far as martial skill could possibly reach. The Gauls affrighted at this so strange an occurrence, betook them to their weapons, and in a furious fit of anger rather than with any confidant discretion, they ran upon the Romans. Now had Fortune turned her wheel: now Gods help and mans policy assisted the Romans. Therefore at the first encounter the Gauls were discomfited with as little difficulty, as they themselves had achieved the victory at Allia. Afterwards also, in another more set battell in the way of Cabris, about eight miles from Rome (to which place they were fled) they were vanquished by the conduct and leading of the same Camillus. For there were they slain in every place, their Camp taken, and not so much as one left to bring news of their overthrow. The Dictator having thus delivered his Country out of the enemies hand, returned again with triumph into the City. And in all the sports and pleasant ditties which the souldiers rudely after their manner devised, he was filled Romulus the father of the Country, the second founder of the City, which were no vain titles of commendation.

When he had saved his Country thus in war, he preserved it afterwards again indoubtably in time of peace, namely in gaining their transmigration to Vei: while both the Tribunes enforced that matter more earnestly, now after the burning of the City, and the Commons also of themselves were more inclined thereunto, than before. Which was one cause, that after his triumph he resigned not up his Dictatorship: being requested also by the Senat not to leave the City in so doubtful terms of perplexity. And first and foremost (as he was evermore a most precise devout man and religious) he proposed those things which concerned the immortal gods: and cautieth an act of the Senat to be made. Primum, that all the Temples (for that the enemies had held and possessed them) should be repaired, bounded out new, and purged. Item, that the manner of cleansing them, should be searched out of the books of Syllabus by the Duumvirs. Moreover, that with the inhabitants of Cere, there should be made a league of publike and mutual hospitality, for receiving the sacred Images and Priests of the people of Rome: by the means and favour of which people, the honour and service of the immortal gods was not forelost and discontinued. Item, that there should be set on the Plains called Capitolina, for the Jupiter Optimus Maximus had still defended and preferred his own seat, and the Refuge of the people of Rome in that fearful time of trouble. And that M. Furius should ordain a guild, of fraternity out of those that dwelt in the hill of the Capitol, for the celebration of those plays. Finally, to the end these should be all some satisfaction and expiation made of that night voice which being the fore-messenger and warning-giver of their destruction before the coming of the Gauls, was heard and yet neglected, a motion was made, that a Temple should be erected in the new casely to Ani Locutius. The Gold which was recovered by force from the Gauls, as also that which out of other Temples in that fearful hurly-burly, was brought into the channel of chappell of Jupiter, because they could not call to mind precisely into which Churches they were to carry it again accordingly, was all judged holy, and sacred to Jupiter: and order taken, that it should be bestowed and laid up under his shrine. And how devout the City was, appeared before in this. That when there was not gold enough in the common chest, to make up the full sum of the ransom that was agreed upon between them and the Gauls, they took that which the matrons and wives of Rome contributed, and all to spare and save the gold appointed to holy uses. The Matrons were therefore thanked, and this honour besides done unto them. That after their death they as well as their husbands, should be openly praised in a solemn funeral Oration. When those things were once accomplished which appertained to the Gods; and all that belonged to the Senat for to do: then and not alone, upon the suits that the Tribunes kept with the Commons continually, with their speeches in all their assemblies, soliciting them to leave the ruins of the City, and to remove with all they had to Vei, a town readily furnished to their hand: then (I say) and not before, Camillus accompanied with the whole Senat, came up into the common place of audience, and there before the people spake in this wise. "So grievous to me, O Quirites, is all contention and variance with the Tribunes of the Commons, that while I lived at Ardea I found no other comfort and solace in that most heavy and woful banishment of mine but this, That I was far enough off from all debates and jars. In regard whereof, I would never have come again, I assure you, but that you called me back, both by act of Senat, and also by approbation of the people. And it is not in me any change of mind, but your calamity and distressed estate, that hath forced me to return again unto you. For this was the very point that you stood upon, namely, that our country might continue still and keep her ancient place: and not I wist, that I should remain and dwell therein again. And even now verily, would I be still and keep silence willingly, but that this quarrel also is in the behalf of my forefaded country: the which to fail (so long as life doth last) for others might be a shameful reproach, but for Camillus it were most impious & abominable. For to what end have we returned to it again? To what purpose when it was besieged have we delivered it out of the enemies hands, if when we have recovered it, we our selves abandon and leave it the same? And when as the gods and men of Rome kept still, and inhabited the Capitol and the castle, notwithstanding the Gauls were Lords, and possessed of the whole City, is it possible that both Castle and Capitol, after the City is regained, should be forsaken and abandoned of the

"Roman

of M. Furius Camillus to the people of Rome.

A "Roman victors? And that our prosperous hand over our enemies bring greater desolation to our City, than adversity hath? Verily, if it were so, that we made no reckoning of that religion and divine solemn service, instituted even with the foundation of our City: & that we counted all vanities that have been delivered unto us by tradition from our ancestors: yet to evident a power of God hath afflicted the Romans, that I must needs think, that men can now no longer neglect the worship of God. For consider with me I pray you, either the prosperity of the adversity of these years late past, one after another they shall find, that as long as we served God and followed his will so long we prospered & went forward: and all the while that we despised the same, we ever went backward and fell to decay. And first and foremost the Veient war (recount I beseech you) how many years lasted it? how troublesome and painful was it? And ended it was not because that by the direction and advertisement of the gods, the water was let out of the Alban Pool? What shall I speak of this late & strange calamity of our own City? Began it (and say truth) before that voice which came from heaven was made so light of, concerning the coming of the Gauls; before the law of nations was by our Umbra's broken and before that through the same neglect of the gods, that fact was by us winked at and put up, which indeed should have been punished and revenged? This was the cause that we were vanquished made captive, put to our ransom, and suffered such condign punishment both at Gods hand and at mans, as that we are made an example and amazement to the whole world; Then our adversity and affliction put us in mind of our religion, and the fear of the gods. We fled into the Capitol to the gods even to the very feat of Jupiter Optimus Maximus: and when our own private estate went to havock, the sacred monuments yet and holy Images some we hid in the earth, some we conveyed away into the neighbour Towns, and removed them out of our enemies fight. And albeit we were forsaken and given over both of God and men, yet gave not we over, nor did we diminish the service of the gods. And therefore gave they us our Country again, they gave us victory, and the ancient honour of war which we had lost; and upon our enemies heads, who (blinded with covetousness) in the weighing of gold brake both covenant and fidelity; they have turned all fearfulness, all flight & laughter. Considering then, O Quirites, by these great and apparent signs, & testimonies in the course of this world, what it is to serve God, & what it is to dishonour him, perceive ye not what wickedness we go about to plunge ourselves into, being scarcely got forth and escaped out of the shipwreck and perill of our former sin and calamity? A City we have founded and built, by the will of God and the observation of Angury and Auspices, nor corner therein, but full of religion, full of divine Majesty: and for solemn sacrifices, there are set days when they shall be celebrated, there are places also appointed wherein they ought to be performed. And are ye about then, O Quirites, to leave all the gods both publike & private; how forgeth this deed of yours with that, which lately during the time of the siege, was leech with no less admiration of our enemies, than our own selves in that Noble young Gentleman in C. Fabius, when through the pikes of the Gauls, he departed out of the Castle and performed a solemn duty of the house of Dubius, even upon the mount Quirinal? What, can ye allow and like that the sacred ceremonies of privat families, should not so much as in time of war be intermitted? E and suffer now the publike sacrifices and the Roman gods, in time of peace to be neglected, and the City abandoned? That our High Priests and Flamines should be less curious and precise in the publike service of God, than a private Citizen was in the Anniversary feast of his family and kindred? But peradventure some one may say, We will do the same at Vei, or we will send from thence our Priests hither, for to execute that ministry. Neither of which can be done saving the due observance of holy ceremonies. For, to say nothing in general of all other holy daies, and of all the gods besides; In that one high feast and solemn dinner of Jupiter, can a Pulvinar be celebrated, or a sacred Table be spread and furnished in any place; but in the Capitol? What should I speak of the eternal fires of Vesta, and of that Image, which as a pawn and security of our imperial State, is kept within the sacred walls of that Temple? What should I speak of those your Aeneas and Scythians? O Mary Gracchus, and then father Quintus: are ye well contented, that all these festival and sacred solemnities, which were all of equal time with the City, yet, and of more antiquity (some of them) than the foundation of the City, should be forsaken, in a private place? But see what gods there is between us and our ancestors? They left unto us certain solemn feasts and sacrifices to be celebrated in the Alban mountain and in Tavinium. Was it then a matter of conscience and religion, that some festival solemnities were brought unto us from our enemies Cities to Rome? And shall we translate the same from hence to our enemies City Vei, without a great and heinous offence, that would require expiation? Do but call to mind I pray you, how often our feasts and sacrifices have been renewed and reformed, and for that some one old accustomed ceremony, either by chance or for want of taking heed, hath been over-slip and left out. And even of late, what was it else that (after the strange miracle of the Alban Pool) relieved our Common-wealth distressed with the Veient war, was the restoration of our divine service, and renewing of our Auspices? And more than this, we as it were in remembrance of ancient religion and devotion, have both brought unto Rome forrain gods, and also have instituted and devised new. What a notable and festival day was that in regard of the exceeding zeal and forward affection of the Matrons upon which Queen Tullia late translated from Vei, was dedicated in Aventum? And to Ani Locutius, for a voice from heaven heard

"heard in the new cauley, we caused a Temple to be erected. The Capitoline plaies have we ad"ded to other solemn feasts & thereto we have ordained and founded a new guild or fraternity, "even by the advice of the Senat. And what need was there, that we should have done any of these "things, if we meant, together with the Gauls, to leave the City of Rome? If we abode not in "the Capitol (so many months while we were besieged) willingly and without constraint? And "if we were for fear of our enemies, held back from going elsewhere? Thus much of our festival
 "daies and temples. But what shall become now, I pray you of our Priests? Never think ye once
 "of it, what a sinful deed you are about? As for the Vestall Virgins and Nuns, it is certain, this "is their only place, forth of which nothing ever could drive them but the winning of the City.
 "The Flamin of Jupiter may not lie forth of the City one night: and will ye make these Priests I "of Romans to become Veientians? And shall thy virgins indeed, O Vesta, leave thee now? and "shall the Flamin dwelling in a strange place, for every night he is absent, taint with so great im-
 "piety, both himself and the Common wealth? As for other matters, which we do with great so"lemnity by the direction of the Augurs (and all well near within the Pomeroy or compalls of "the City) how can we forget or neglect them? Namely, the Ward-leer or assembly of the Curiae for "matters of war: also the other of Centuries, wherein ye chuse your Consuls and Military Tri"bunes, where can they be held (if we respect the will of the gods and regard the Auspices) but in "the places accustomed? Shall we remove all these to Vestii? or shall the people repair thither from "thence with so great trouble and inconvenience, to a desolate City, forsaken of God and man,
 "whensoever they would hold those assemblies? But the present necessity (they will say) forceth us
 "to leave a town that is wasted with fire, and wholly ruinat, and to go to Vestii, where all stands
 "safe and sound, and not to put the poor Commons to the toyle and charge of new building. That "this is a pretence and cause rather devised than meant in earnest, if I should say nothing, I think
 "appeareth manifestly unto you already, O Quirites, who remember that before the coming of "the French men, whilst your public buildings and privat houses were whole, and whilst the "City stood upright on foot, this self-same motion was made and debated, as touching the re"moving to Vestii. Consider now ye Tribunes, what difference there is between mine opinion and
 "yours: ye are of mind, that if it had not then been meet to be done, yet now verily it were "good and requisite: I contrariwise (but marvel not I pray you before you hear what I will say) am
 "of opinion, that albeit we might have then gone, whilst our whole City flourished, yet now we "were not to leave it thus ruinat & decayed. For at that time we had some cause to remove into "a conquered City, namely, Victory, a glorious thing to our selves and our posterity: but this re"moving now, were reproachfull and shameful to our selves, but glorious and honourable to the "Gauls. For we shall not bethought to have left our country as conquerours, but to have lost it as "conquered. And shall it be said, that our running away at Allia, the winning of our City, the be"sieging of the Capitoll, hath imposed this necessity upon us to leave our house and home and
 "to make shifts, to seek our own exile and departure out of that place which we are not able to "defend? And were, indeed, the Gauls able to pull down and rase that City of Rome, which the "Romans shal not be thought able to redifie and set up again? What remaineth now, in case they "should come upon us afresh, with a new power of men, for certain it is that their multitude is "incredible? & were willing to dwell here in this City by them conquered & by you abandoned,
 "but that ye gently permit and suffer them? Nay, What and if not the Gauls, but your old enemies
 "the Aequians and the Volscians would remove and come to Rome, would you be willing to have "them become Romans and your selves Veientians? Would ye not rather, that this desert and "wast ground as it lieth, were yours, than to be a City peopled by your enemies? For I cannot see,
 "I assure you, whether of the twain, were more to be desired. And because (forsooth) ye are loath "to fall to building, are ye resolved to abide these mischiefs & these shameful reproaches, yit through"out the whole City there might not be built a more commodious or stately house, than is that "cottage there of our founder, were it not better to dwell in cottages like shepherds & peasants, so
 "it be among your sacred monuments and household gods, than all at once generally to go into "exile? Our ancestors and forefathers being a mixture of divers countries, and no other than herd-
 "men, finding in these parts nothing but woods and bogs in a short time built a new City out of "the ground: and are we loath, having yet our Capitoll, our castle, the Temples of our gods "standing still, to redifie it now, that it is burnt. That which every one of us would have done, if "our houses had been fired, refuse we altogether to do in the common sacrifice of the City? Give "me leave a little, What & if by some villany, or by mischance there should be a sacrifice at Vestii,
 "by reason of the wind (as it is often seen) the flame spread & catch, and so consume a great part "of the City, shall we go from thence by and by, and seek to Fidenam or Gabii, or some other City "near as hard to remove unto? Is the very native soil of our country, and this ground which we "call our mother, of so power at all to keep us here, but both the whole love and affection of "our country, reit in the superficial outside, and in the timber and rafters of our houses? Verily, "confess I will unto you (although I take less pleasure to remember the wrongs you did me, than "the calamity which I endured) when I was absent and in exile, so often as I thought of my coun"try, all these things ran in my mind: the hills, the plain, the Tiber, the coasts all about, which was "my daily prospect, and this air, under which I was born and brought up. All which, O Quirites,
 "let them move you rather now with an affection to them for to carry thil in this your habitation,
 "than

A "than disquiet you hereafter, and torment you for the want and mis of them, when you have "once left and forgone them. Not without good cause both God and man chose this place for "the building of this City: most healthy and wholesome hills: a very convenient and commodi"ous river: to bring in corn and other fruits out of the inland parts, to receive provision and o"ther victuals from the sea-coasts: the sea it self near enough for commodities, and not exposed
 "and open by too much nearness to the dangers of forrain navies: the very heart and centre of "all Italy, a place as a man would say, naturally made, and only for that City to grow and encrease
 "in. And that doth the very largeness and greatness of a City so newly founded, plainly prove.
 "It is now three hundred threescore and four years, and not above, since the foundation there"of, O Quirites. Amongst so many Nations of greatest antiquity, thus long ye have made war:
 "and all this while (to lay nothing of particular Cities) neither the Volcians together with the "Aequians peopling so many towns, and those so strong, nor all Hetruria so mighty by sea and "land, and containing the whole breadth between the two seas, are in war to you comparable.
 "Which being so, what reason have you (in the devils name) when ye have had sufficient proof
 "already oft, to try again new experiments? considering now, that albeit your valour and virtue
 "may go with you elsewhere, yet surely, the good luck and fortune of this place can never de"part and remove from hence? Here is the Capitoll, where sometimes upon the finding of a
 "mans head, answer was made by diviners and wizards, That in that very place it should be the "head of all puissance, and the imperial seat of the whole world. Here, at what time as the Ca-
 "pitoll, by the direction of the Augurs should be voided and cleared of all other Chapells, Lady
 "C Juventas, and god Terminus, to the great joy of our forefathers, would not suffer themselves to "be stirred out of their place. Here are the fires of Vesta here be the Sutrochons come down from "heaven, here are all the gods, favourable & gracious til unto you, so long as here ye make abode
 "and remain. Cominius in all his Orations throughout moved them much: but that part thereof
 "touching religion (by report) was most effectual. But that which struck it dead, and put all out "of doubt, was a certain word that fell out to be spoken fyt to the purpose. For at what time as "the Senat a while after was gathered together in the Court Hylitia, to debate about these things
 "and certain companies of souldiers that returned from their guards, chanced in the mean time
 "to march through the market place, one Captain hapned to speak in the Comitium, and said,
 "D Pitch down thy ensigns and standard beaver, here will be our best abode. Which voice was not so soon
 "heard, but the Senat being come out of the Council Houe, cried with one accord, That "they took that omen for good luck, and happy preface: and also the Commons all gathered "thereabout, approved the same. After this, when the forelaid Act of transmigration was once "clean dashed and abolished, the City began to be built confusedly, and without order. Tite was "allowed at the common charges: to dig either stone, or hew timber, every man had liberty
 "where he could, putting in surceries, that within the compais of that year they would finish their "buildings. The haste they made, caused them to have no regard of drawing out the streets di"rectly, whilst every man built in the void places without respect of his own or other mens "ground. Which is the cause that the out-links and vaults which first were conveyed through
 "E the common streets, now run every where under mens houses, and the form of the City seemeth
 "as if it were built at random (as every man could catch a place for himself) rather than distinct"ly ranged, and set out in good order unto them.

The Sixth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Sixth Book.

It containeth the fortunate wars against the Aequians, the Volscians, and Tuscan. Four Tribes were added to the former, Stellatina, Sabbatina, Promentina, Armenis, M. Manlius, who had defended the Capitoll from the Gauls, whilst he discharged the debts of those that were in danger of their creditors, and released such as were then imprisoned, was convicted of aspiring to be King, and thrown down from the cliff Tarpeia. In whose reproach a decree was made by the Senat, that none of the house of Man- lius should be so named. Marcus C. Licinius, and L. Sextius, Tribunes of the Commons, proposed a law, that Consuls also might be chosen out of the Commons, who were created before from among the Nobles only. And albeit the Senators withstood them with earnest endeavour, yet by reason that for five years (since the same Tribune continued the only Magistracies of the City, they went through with that law and got it enacted. And L. Sextius was created the first Consul that ever was of Commons.
 A second Law there passed likewise, That no man might possess above five hundred acres of land.

The Sixth Book of T. Livius.

The Recapitulation of the former five Books.

Vhat acts from the building of the City of Rome unto the taking of the same, the Romans have achieved, first, under the government of Kings; afterwards of Consuls and dictators, Decemvirs, and Tribunes Consular, as well in the wars abroad as seditions at home; I have in five books declared. Matters obscure, both in regard of exceeding antiquity (as things that a far off hardly be discerned) and also for that in those dates there were very few writings and monuments, the only faithful safeguard, and true remembrancers of deeds past: and besides, whatsoever was registered in the Commentaries of the Priests, and in other public or private records, the same for the most part, when the City was burned, perished withall. But now from henceforward, their civil affairs of policy, and martial exploits in war, ensuing after a second beginning of the City (as springing again with more fresh shoots and fruitful sprouts from the root of the old stock) shall be delivered in more plain and certain manner.

Camillus bore the Dictatorship a whole year, which otherwise was limited within six months.

Q. Fabius executed.

Difmal dates, † 18 of July.

† 16 of July.

And to begin withall, look by whom the state first was underpropped and set upright, upon him (as chief and principal) it still bare and rested, and that was M. Furius: whom the Romans would not suffer to give up his Dictatorship before one year was fully expired. As for those Tribunes (Consular) in time of whose government the City was lost, they liked not that they should call and hold an assembly for Election of Magistrates the year following. So the matter came to an Interregnum. Now while the City was buſie in continual work and labour, about rebuilding and repairing their buildings, Q. Fabius so soon as he was out of his office, was by C. Martius, a Tribune of the Commons, arrested to make his answer at a day appointed, who laid to his charge, That he contrary to the Law of Nations, had fought against the Gauls, unto whom he was sent in embassy, and as an Orator only. But he avoided his judicial trial, by his death: and died to just against the time, that many men thought it was voluntary and wrought by his own hands. Then P. Cornelius Scipio first entered upon the Interregnum: and after him M. Furius Camillus the second time. He created Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, A. Valerius Publicola the second time, L. Virginii, P. Cornelius, A. Manlius, L. Emilius, and L. Posthumus. These men presently after the Interregnum, were not so soon entered into office, but before all other things, they consulted with the Senat in matters concerning Religion and conscience. And first of all they commanded, that all the instruments of leagues and confederacies, the ordinances and laws also (& those were the twelve tables & certain Statutes made by the Kings) should be sought up as many as could be found extant. Whereof some were published abroad, even amongst the Common people: but such as pertained properly to holy Rites, and divine service, were by the Priests and Prelates suppressed: especially, of purpose to hold the minds of the people in a reverent awe of religion and devotion. Then began they to reason and debate about the difmal dates. And the fifteenth day before the Calends of August, so notorious for a twofold loss and overthrow, upon which day at Cremora the Fabii were all slain, and after at Alia an unfortunate field was fought, even to the utter ruin and desolation of the City, they named of the latter misfortune, Albensis: and set this unlucky mark upon it, That it should be reputed unmeet and inconvenient for any business as well public as private. Some think, because upon the next day following the Ides of July, Subrinus the Tribune Military could not by sacrifice find any tokens of happy speed, nor obtain the grace and favour of the gods; whereupon three daies after, the Roman host fell shamefully into the hands of the enemies: therefore, the morrow also after the Ides was interdicted and men were commanded to forbear and abstain from doing sacrifice: and thereupon likewise, the day next following the Calends and the Nones, were by tradition held as ominous and difmal as the other.

But long they might not quietly sit about the devising of means to reform the Common-weal, N and set it upright again after so grievous and dangerous a fall. For of the one side, the Volscians, their old enemies, took arms, intending the final destruction of the Roman name. On the other side, the Merchants brought news, That the Princes and chief of all the Nations of Hetruria were banded and confederate together in a Diet held at the Temple of Voltumna, to make war upon them. Besides a fresh and new fear came upon them by reason of the rebellion of the Latines and Hernicks, who after the battell at the pool Regillus, for the space almost of an hundred years, had continued fast in loyal league and amity with the people of Rome. Therefore being thus greatly affrighted on every side, that all the world might see apparently that the State of Rome was not only hated of her enemies, but despised also of her allies: it was thought good and resolved upon, that by his direction and rule, the Common-wealth should now be maintained and defended, O by whose conduct and guidance it was relieved and recovered: and that M. Furius Camillus should be created Dictator. He being declared Dictator, named Q. Servilius H. L. for General of the Horsemen. And having proclaimed a law (stated (or vacation from Courts of Law) he took muster of all the younger sort and servicable men: but so, as the elder people were not left out, as many as were of strength sufficient for service. Unto whom he likewise ministered the military oath of Allegiance, and enrolled them by hundreds in the muster-book. When he had

A had thus levied a power of men, and furnished them with armour, he divided them into three parts. The one he opposed against Hetruria in the Country of Vej: another he commanded to lie encamped before the City. Over these A. Manlius a Tribune military was made Captain: those which were sent against the Tuscans had L. Emilius for their Commander. A third part he himself led against the Volscians: and not far from Lanuvium (the place called Ad-Metrium) he began to assault their Camp. The enemies had put themselves on this their journey, with a kind of scornful contempt, as thinking the whole manhood in a manner of Rome, was by the French clean spent and wasted. But when they heard once, that Camillus was the Lord General, it stroke such a fear and terror among them, that they were glad to defend themselves by the strength of their trench and rampier, yea, and to fence it round about with huge-piled heaps of wood and trees, that their enemies might have no passage to enter in upon their munitions. Which when Camillus perceived, he gave order to let on fire that Barricado which stood in his way. And as good hap was, the wind was big and high, and blew full upon the enemy. So that not only he made way by fire, but also with the flames thereof that went toward the Camp, with the vapour likewise and smoke, and the crackling noise of the green wood, he so amazed & astonished the enemies, that the Romans had less ado to pass the trench and palliade, into the Camp of the Volscians, than ingetting over the mound and enclosure consumed with fire. Having thus defeated and slain his enemies and won withall the Camp in the flame burnt, the Dictator gave the whole spoile unto the soldiers: which to them was so much the more welcome, as they less hoped for it at their General's hand: who was never known to be lavish of gift, and over-liberal in dealing rewards. After this he followed them that fled, in chase, waited and foraged their whole country, and at length (in the seventieth year of the war) he wholly subdued the Volscians, and forced them to yield submission. After this conquest, he departed from thence against the Æquians, who likewise made preparations for war. Their forces he surprised and defeated at Bule, and assailed not only their Camp, but also forced the City, and at the first assault won both.

But while fortune smiled thus, what way soever Camillus went, as being the only stay of the Roman state: so on another side the fear of peril greatly increased. For the Tuscans well near all up in arms, lay before Saturnium, and besieged it being in league with the people of Rome. Whose Embassadors came unto the Senat to entreat for succour in their distress, and had a decree granted unto them, that the Dictator with all speed should relieve the Sutrinus. But being so straightly beleaguered, that they might not abide the delay of this their hope, for that the townsfolk, who were but few in number, were over-wearied with working, watching, and bloody fighting, (all which lay still upon the same men without intermission) they were driven by composition to surrender up the City to the enemies: and being disarmed and sent away with a single tute of apparel (after a piteous sort all a-row) departed the town, & left their dwelling places. But see, it fortune that Camillus at the same time came in the very manner with the Roman Army and met them. At whose feet the multitude all sorrowful lay prostrate: their Nobles and chief men in this extremity fell to beseech him to be good unto them: the women and children which went along with them, as partakers and companions of their exile, seconded them with woful tears and lamentations. But he willed the Sutrinus to forbear their mourning plaints, and give over their doleful moan: saying that he brought the Tuscans heavy and weeping cheer. Then caused he his soldiers to lay down their packs and load, the Sutrinus likewise there to abide with a mean guard, and his men to follow him with armour and weapons only. Thus marched he forward with his Army lightly appointed for ready expedition, and advanced before Sutrium. Where, according to his expectation, he found the enemies all careless and secure (as commonly it falleth out upon a prosperous success.) No warders, no corps de guard quartered before the walls, the gates wide open, the Conquerours here and there sacking, rifling and flinging the goods out of their enemies houses. So was Sutrium in one day twice won. The Tuscans (for all their former victory) were hewn in peeces on every side, by a new-come enemy. They had no time to cast themselves round, nor gather together into one place, nor to take weapon in hand: whilst every man for life, made in all haste to the gates, if haply any way they might escape into the fields. But when they came thither, the gates they found all shut, for so the Dictator had given order afore-hand, Heteupon some betook themselves to their weapons: others (namely, such as hapned to be armed when this sudden tumult surprised them) fell to call their fellows together for to begin a skirmish: which no doubt in that desperate case of the enemies had been hotly fought, had not the Critics and Trumpets which were sent into all parts of the City, made proclamation to lay down their weapons, to spare them which were unarmed, and that none should have any harm but those that were found in arms. Upon this, even they who in that extremity and despair were fully bent to fight it out, for hope of life on all hands flung away their weapons: and thus disarmed as they were (for as the case stood, it was the safer course) presented themselves to the enemy. A great number of them were bestowed in several places, and were attended upon with good guards. And before night the town was delivered again unto the Sutrinus, safe and found without any hurt at all done unto it, as being not won by force, but (surrendered upon composition. Camillus then returned with triumph into the City of Rome, victor at one voyage in three sundry wars, the greatest number by far, of prisoners, whom he led before his chariot in triumph, were Tuscans: whom he sold in port-sale at the spear, and raised such a sum of money, that when he had had out of it repaid the dames [of Rome] to the worth of their gold; there were of the surplage thereof three bouls made of massie gold: which with the title and inscription of Camillus his name, were for certainty, before the Capitol was burnt to be seen in the chappell of Jupiter set up and bestowed at the feet of Juno.

The same year, there were enfranchised and made Citizens of Rome, such Veientians, Capenates and Faliscians, as in the time of those wars were fled to the Romans: and for these new Citizens were certain lands set out. Those also, who for idleness loath to build at Rome, were gone to Vesii, there to inhabit the vacant houses, were by an Act of the Senat recalled home from thence. And they at the first grumbled & refused to obey; but after that a day was set them, & they threatened upon pain of death to return again to Rome; as it out as they were, and obdurate all of them together now for fear every one became obedient. As Rome now increased in number of inhabitants, and became well peopled: so on all hands in every place they fell to building new edifices: whilst the Common-wealth somewhat eased them of charges, and the Ediles by virtue of their office called hard upon them, hasting them forward as to a publick works; yea, and every man privately made all speed possible, according as each ones need required, to make an end and finish his own house. So as within the year the City was new built and stood on foot again.

At the years end was the great Election held for Tribunes Military in Consuls authority. Wherein were created T. Quintius Cincinnatus, Q. Servilius Fidenas the fifth time, Julius Tallus, L. Agilius Corvus, L. Lucratius Tricipitinus, Ser. Sulpicius Ruffus. One army they let out and led against the Aequians, not to war with them (for they granted themselves conquered) but upon meer spight and deadly hatred, to waste all their borders utterly, and to leave them no power and strength to enterprise any new rebellion. The other, into the territory of Tarquini. Where, two resistance made. For the Romans surprised them on a sudden, and at the first shout and impression they were masters of it: The town was sacked and burned. As for Contebrus, it endured the assault for some few daies: but the continual labour, slackening neither day nor night overcharged them; whereas the Roman Army divided into six parts, fought six hours in their severall turns round one after the other. And the townsmen being but few, and those overtired, were fain without any supply, still to maintain fresh skirmishes. Whereupon at last they retreated back & yielded, giving the Romans leave to enter the City. The Tribunes were of mind and thought good, that the spoil should be confiscated and go to the common treasury: but the commandment and proclamation was more slack than their purpose on that behalf. For whilst they lingered and protracted time, the souldiers already had seized in their prizes: and taken from them again without much offence and hatred, the booty could not be. In the same year, because the City should not flourish in private buildings only, the Capitol was also built of squared ashler stone: A piece of work even in this so glorious estate, and magnificence of the City, to be had in price and esteemed excellent. And now before this time, the Tribunes of the Commons, whilst the City was busied about their buildings, began often to move for the Laws Agria (about the division of the lands) in all their assemblies and speeches before the people. For to draw them on and to let forward their hope, they presented unto them very often the Pomptine Territory, which then above all others, so presently upon the subduing and subversion of the Volscians by Camillus, was no doubt, the rightful possession of the people of Rome. Complaints were made, that those grounds sustained much more detriment and damage by the Nobility, than they had received before from the Volscians. For they, so long only as they were able to bear arms and maintain war, made inroads thither: but the Noblemen forcibly entered and made havoc in the possessions of the common lands: and unless (before they had let sure footing there, and got all into their hands) a division were made, the Commons should never enjoy one foot of ground there. These Remonstrances of the Tribunes little moved the Commons, both because few of them resorted to the common place of assemblies, whilst they plied their building: and also for that money was away, and their purses so emptied in the charges of workmen, that they had little mind of holding those lands, which to store and stock they were not able.

The City was now given much to their devotions and religions, and the rulers also somewhat superstitious upon their late calamity: Insomuch as they minded to renew the Auspicia (or solemnity of prelates taken by bird-flight) for some error supposed therein: and therefore they agreed that the government should return to an Interregnum. So there were Interregents one after another, M. Manlius Capitolinus, Ser. Sulpicius Camerinus, L. Valerius Potitus, Valerius at length held the assembly for to elect Tribunes Military in Consuls authority, and created L. Papirius, Cn. Sergius, L. Emilius the second time, L. Licinius, T. Valerius Publicola the third time. These presently after the Interregnum, began their government. That year, the Temple of Mars vowed in the Gauls war was dedicated by T. Quintius, a Duumvir deputed for the executing of holy duties. Four Tribes of new Citizens were now adjoined, Stellatina, Pomerina, Sabatina, Arminensis, and these made up the number of the 25 Tribes. And now L. Licinius a Tribune of the Commons, was in hand with the people in greater number assembled together, about the Pomptine lands: and more inclined they were and forward to hearken after grounds, than they had been afore. And whereas it was moved in the Senat house, to make war upon the Latines and the Hernicks, that matter was not followed, but put off to a further time: by reason of preparation for a greater war, Herutia was already up in arms. And all was laid again upon Camillus his shoulders, who was made Tribune Military with Consuls authority, and had five other brethren in office joyntly unto him Ser. Cornelius Maluginensis, Q. Servilius Fidenas the sixth time, L. Quintius Cincinnatus, L. Horatius Pulvillus, P. Valerius. In the beginning of the year, the minds of men were turned clean away from the careful regard they had of the Italian war, by reason that a number of people that fled out of the Pomptine country, came all of a sudden in great halt to the City, and brought word, that the Antians were up in arms, that the nations of the Latins had sent their able youth to that war (lovely underhand: thereby disavowing it to be any action of the State and standing upon this point, that by the covenant there was no provilo, but that voluntary souldiers might arise in what wars: soever they would. Now had the Romans been well taught, and learned to let fight no more by any wars. The Senat therefore thanked the Gods, that Camillus was in place of government, who if he had been a privat person, was no doubt to have been nominated and created Dictator: yea, and his companions in office, consulted frankly that he was the only man to have the overrigan and absolute Regiment of all, in case there were any fearful and dangerous war toward: and were fully resolved, to yeild up all their interest in government unto him, thinking it no disparagement at all unto them, nor any loss of their own honour and reputation, in conferring the same upon the Majesty of so worthy a person. The Senat highly commended the Tribunes, and Camillus was much abashed in his mind, howbeit he gave them hearty thanks, and spake in this wise. "A weighty burthen (quoth he) I fee is imposed upon me by the people of Rome, in that they have elected and nominated me Dictator now the fourth time: a greater charge is enjoyned me by the Senat: the whole state and body of which order, hath delivered to me singular good opinion and judgement of me: but the heaviest load of all is laid upon me by the exceeding kindness and obsequious benignity of these my honourable brethren and colleagues. If any painful travel of mine theretore, and watchful care may be redoubled, I will earnestly endeavour, I will strain and strive to answer thereunto: that the opinion which the City wish so great content hath conceived of me, right as it is exceeding great, so it may continue still and be perpetual. As to that war of the Antians, there are more brags and threats than any danger and peril from thence. But as I would counsel and advise you to be afraid of no war, so I would not have you to be careless and secure of any. The City of Rome is beset on every side: partly envied, and partly hated of her neighbour borderers. Need there is both of more Captains, and also of more armies, to manage the affairs of the Common-wealth. I think it good theretore (quoth he) O Valerius, that you assist me in government and counsel, and have the leading together with me of certain legions against the Antian enemies. That you Q. Servilius, with another army well appointed, and in readines, lye encamped hard by the City side, having an eye and good regard left either Herutia in the mean while, (as of late daies) or the Latins and Hernicks (who trouble us now afresh) break out and make some rising. Assured I am, that you will behave your self, and quit you in this service so worthily, as may answer the famous memory of such a father and grandire as you have had, may becom your own honourable person, and those six Tribunships which you have already performed. As for L. Quintius, let him leave a third power of men, consisting of those that are by reason of sickness or otherwise excused for warfare, and are above the ordinary age for military service, to be in stead of a garrison for defence of the City and the Walls. Let L. Horatius provide harness, weapons, corn, and other necessities for war, at all occasions whatsoever. Finally, O Sergius Cornelius, we your fellow Tribunes, ordain you President of this publick Council, the Cybas and keeper of Religion and Church-matters, of general assemblies, of the Laws and all other civil affairs of policy whatsoever. Now when they had all made promise, and that most willingly to do their endeavour in performing their severall charges, Valerius whom he had joyntly with himself in commission, added moreover and said, That as he would take M. Furius to be Dictator, so would he be unto him again in stead of his Coronel of Horsemen. And turning to the Lords of the Senat, exhorted them, that what opinion they had of one only Sovereign General, the same hope they would conceive of the whole war. The Senators herat took great joy and contentment, giving out willingly with one accord, that they hoped exceeding wel of war, of peace, and generally of the State. Neither shall the Common-wealth (say they) ever stand in need of Dictator, so long as such Magistrates be in place, so jointly agreeing in one mind together, so indifferent and ready as well to obey as to rule, and rather yeilding their proper praise to the honour of the Common-wealth, than dismembering and plucking from it to their private glory and reputation.

After a Vacation or Law-need proclaimed, and the Musters taken and past: Furius and Valerius set forward to Saracum: whether the Antians had not only lent the flour of all the Volcians, and hence youth out of a fresh fry and new generation: but also had raised a mighty power of Latins and Hernicks, out of those Nations that by long peace were most fresh and lusty. These new enemies and old thus combined together, troubled the minde of the Roman souldier, and made him to flatter. their enemies (if they were unarmed) might hardly be encountered, much less, being so well armed and appointed: he mounted presently upon Horieback, and rode before the enigma, and then turning himself affront his army, traversing between the ranks and armies: "What heaviness is this my souldiers (quoth he) what means this strange and unwonted lagging behind? Why? Know ye not your enemy? Know ye not me? Or, know ye not your own selves? The enemy, 'tis he who is the perpetual matter and subject of your valour and glory? And ye again are 'tis what is he who is the perpetual matter of the winning of Falerii and Veii, and of the men, who under my conduct (to say nothing of the winning of Falerii and Veii, and of the slaughter of the Gauls Legions, put to the sword by us, even when our native City was by them taken and they matters thereof) of late, and but the other day, made a three-fold triumph, upon a triple victory, over the same Volscians, Æquians and people of Hetruria. What, do ye not I agnize and accept me for your General, because not as Dictator, but as Tribune, I gave you the watchword, and put out the banner of battle? For mine own part, I stand not much upon absolute and sovereign command over you: no more likewise should ye regard ought else in me, but mine own self. For never yet did my Dictatorship make me haughty and set me up aloft, no more than my banishment abated my courage and cast me down. We are the same men till all of us: and since we are come to this war, furnished with the same means that we carried with us unto the former, let us look for the same event of our service, and no worse. So soon as ye shall encounter and join battle with them, perform each one that which he hath been taught and wonted to: the journey surely will be ours, and they (no doubt) shall run away. Then after he had founded the battle, he alighted from his Horie, and caught the ensign-bearer that stood next him, with his hand, hale him forward against the face of the enemy, crying very often aloud, On afore with thy banner, Port-ensign, and advance forward, souldier. When they saw that Camillus in person, a man well steeped in years, and thereby weak to perform the parts of bodily strength, put himself forth against the enemy: all at once they pressed forward, set up an outcry and shouted, every man calling upon his next fellow, to follow their General for flame. Over and besides, some say that by the commandment of Camillus, there was an ensign flung into the very battle among the enemies. Whereupon they of the forefront, beset themselves lustily to recover it again. And thereby were the Antates first discomfited, and the fear not only came upon them in the vanguard, but entered also and reached as far as the rearward, that stood ready for supply. And as the violent force of the souldiers, provoked by the presence of their Captain, much troubled the enemy: so nothing more daunted the hearts of the Volscians, than the very sight of Camillus himself, when they chanced to elope him. So surely carried he the victory with him, which way soever he went! And that appeared most evidently in this, That when he saw the left wing at the point to give back and run away, he took himself in all haste to his Horie, rode thither with his light footman buckler and with his only presence renewed the fight, shewing unto them how the rest of the battle had the better. Now were the enemies put to the worst, and the victory inclined to a side. But their multitude both hindered themselves in their flight: and also a long piece of work the wearied souldiers of the Romans: had to put to great a number, all to the sword. But behold, there fell a great tempest or rain of a sudden, which poured down with so mighty winds and storms, that it rather put them by the execution of assured victory, than parted any battle or stayed the fight. Whereupon the retreat was founded: and the night ensuing, whilst the Romans were at rest, made an end of the war. For the Latins and Hernicks forsook the Volscians and departed home, with as ill speed, as their enterprise was bad. The Volscians seeing themselves abandoned and left in the lurch by them, (upon whose trust and confidence they had rebelled) quit the camp and field, and put themselves within the walls of Saturnia: whom Camillus at first began to besiege, casting a trench and rampier about them, raising bastions and plat-forms against the Town. And seeing his munitions and fabricks by no talking forth of the enemies impeached, he supposed there was no such courage in them, that he should need to stand so long about the hope of victory: and thereupon, encouraged his men not to wear themselves out in a tedious and toilsome piece of service as if they lay at the siege of Veii: assuring them that the victory was in their hands already: and so with exceeding cheerfulness of his souldiers, he set ladders upon every side, scaled the walls, and entered the Town. Then the Volscians flung away their weapons and yielded themselves.

But the General his mind was bent upon a greater exploit, and that was the winning of Antium, being the seat Town of the Volscians, and from whence the beginning of the last war arose. Howbeit because so strong a City might not be won without great preparation of artillery, ordnance & engines of battery leaving his colleague behind him with the army, he went himself to Rome, to persuade with the Senat. for to destroy and raze Antium utterly. And whilst he was embarking with them (such was the will of God I believe, that Antium should stand still & continue longer) there came Embassadors from Nepe and Saturnia, craving aid against the Tuscans, saying: That it was more than high time, that they were succoured and relieved. Upon which occasion it fell out, that Camillus was withdrawn thither from Antium. For seeing that those two Towns stood even against Hetruria, as it were the very keys and bar-gates from thence: both the enemies laboured to gain them afore-hand, against the time that they went about to make new wars: & the Romans also held it a matter of great consequence, to rescue and defend those frontier Towns. The Senat therefore thought good to be in hand with Camillus, for to leave Antium, and to undertake the war with the Tuscans. The City-legions under General Quintius, were appointed unto him, And

A And albeir, he rather would have had the leading of that army, which lay now in the Volscians Country, and which he had good tryal of, and were acquainted better with his government, yet refused he nothing: only he required to have Valerius his associat till, and joined with him in commission. So Quintius and Horatius were sent to succeed Valerius in the Volscian war. Furius and Valerius took their voyage from the City to Saturnia, and found the one side of the Town possessed already by the Tuscans. On the other side, the Townsmen, for that the enemy had toppled all passages between, hardly able to repel the force of the assailants. But the coming of the Roman aids, and the name besides of Camillus, (so highly renowned as well amongst the enemies as Allies) both for the present gave them heart to abide the brunt, and thik to it till that B were before at the point to give over: and also gained time and respite, to come in with fresh supplies and succours. Camillus therefore divided his forces, and gave direction to his colleague, for to bring about his power, to that side which the enemies held, and there to make an assault: not so much for any hope he had by scaling the walls to win the City: as by withdrawing the enemies thither, not only to ease the Townsmen of their toil, and give them a breathing time (who were now wearied with assaults) but also to get himself some opportunity and vantage, to enter the City without skirmish and resistance. Which being put in execution on both hands accordingly, and performed at once: the Tuscans beset with a two-fold fear round about, seeing the walls assailed, most fiercely one way: and the enemy got within the Town another way: hung out at one gate (which as it hapned was not beset) and in great haste altogether fought to elape C away. But as they fled, they were slain by heaps both within the Town and abroad all over the fields. The greater number were killed within the walls by Furius his souldiers. Valerius his men were more ready and nimble in the chase, and gave not over the execution until the night came, that they could not see and discern them.

Saturnia recovered.

When Saturnia was thus recovered and restored again to their allies they led forward the army to Nepe: which Town the Tuscans held wholly, as surrendered already into their hands. Every man thought it would be a busie piece of work to win that City again: not in this regard only, that it was fully in the enemies possession, but also because some of the Nepefines, by treason had yielded it up. Howbeit, they resolved to send unto the heads and principal citizens, that they should sever themselves from the Tuscans, and perform on their behalf truth and faithful loyalty, like as they had craved and besought at the Romans hands their friendly help and protection. D From whom they received this answer again, That it lay not now in them to do anything at all, for that the Tuscans kept the walls, and warded the gates: Whereupon they first terrified and scared the Townsmen with foraging and spoiling their territory: after that, seeing they made more reckoning of keeping their faithful loyalty to their enemies unto whom they had lately surrendered, than observing the league with their friends, which they had long before concluded: they provided themselves out of the fields of a number of faggots, of brush wood, and such like trouts, and so approached the City with the army filled up the ditches close to the walls, set ladders to, and at the first shout and assault given, the Town was taken. Then proclamation was made, that all the Nepefines should part with their armour and weapons, and so many as were found unarmed, should be spared. But the Tuscans, as well armed as unarmed, were put to the sword every one. As for the chief authors that persuaded the Nepefines to deliver the Town to the enemies, they were beheaded. The harmless multitude had their goods restored, and so the Town was left with a garison. Thus the two Tribuns (Consular) having regained out of the enemies hands two confederat Cities, returned in great glory to Rome with their victorious army.

Nepe taken.

The same year the Latins and Hernicks were required to make amends for harms done, and restitution of goods wrongfully detained: and the cause demanded why of late years, according to a covenant in that behalf provided they had let forth no souldiers to the Romans wars. Answer from both Nations in their solemn Councils was returned: "That neither the fault was general, nor proceeding from council of the State, in case some of their youth served under the Volscians: F and yet themselves had well paid already for their lewd and rash projects, in that not one of them was come home alive. And as to the not sending forth of souldiers, the cause was, for that they were in continual fear and danger of the Volscians: which noisome plague (as it were) sticking so close unto their sides, unless they could be rid of, notwithstanding so many wars one in the neck of another. When relation hereof was made unto the Lords of the Senat, they thought to well of their answer and excuses, that they deemed they had quarrel and occasion good enough to war upon them, if they might have had while and time as well to follow it.

The excuse of the Latins and Hernicks.

In the year following, when A. Manlius, P. Cornelius, Titus and Luscius Quintius, both Capitans, and L. Papirius C. for the second time, were Tribuns Consular, there arose a grievous war abroad, and a more dangerous sedition brake forth at home. The war, from the Volscians, banded with the Latins and Hernicks, that were fallen away and revolted. The sedition (where it was least feared) from a perionage of noble lineage defended, of great name and reputation, M. Manlius Capitolinus. Who being a man of too lofty and haughty a minde, despised all other of the Nobility, and envied one above the rest, M. Furius, so singular, as well in regard of his honourable dignities, as his worthy parts and commendable virtues. He could not brook and endure, that he only should ever be Lord General in the field: who now was exalted to high above others, that even those who were created with him in equal authority, he accounted not as his peers and fellows, but employed as his Ministers and Servitors. "Whereas (quoth he) if men would weigh aright, and duly consider every thing, M. Furius could never have delivered his Country from the siege of the enemies, had not the Capitol and Cattle cliff been saved by me alone. Camillus let upon the Gauls, when they were amused in receiving their gold, when they were upon terms of peace, and their hearts quiet and secure: whereas my self chafed them away whilst they were in arms, and at the point to win the Cattle Hill. In that exploit of Camillus the souldiers, had each one his share proportionably of the glory, who together with him did their parts: but in the service performed by me, no earthly creature was fellow and partner with me. With these conceits he fed his own humour, and puffed up his proud spirit, being withal by corrupt disposition of nature, hot and hasty, arrogant and insolent. Discontented besides, that of the Nobility, his gifts and qualities were not esteemed of that worth, as in his own judgement they deserved: first, of a Senator he became popular, and began to break his mind, and impart his designs unto the Magistrates of the Commons: finding fault with the Nobility, and complaining of them: soliciting and inveigling the Commons, to cast ailing and favour toward himself: carried away with the vain gale of the peoples opinion: not guided by sage counsel and discretion: and in one word, chusing rather to be of great name, than of good and honest report. And not contenting himself to deal in the Laws Agraria, about the division of Lands, which had always ministered to the Tribunes of the Commons matter enough of mutinies and seditions: he began to intermeddle between the debtors and their creditors, and to overthrow all keeping of credit. And indeed, deep debts are sharp goads, and prick shrewdly: threatening not only poverty and shame, but also terrifying the bodies of free men with hard imprisonment, little ease, and Irons. Now there were exceeding many far in debt (a thing most dangerous and hurtful to mens state) even of the richer sort, by reason of their great expenses defrayed in building. The war therefore of the Volscians, which was it self of great importance, but much more, in regard of the Latins and Hernicks Rebellion withal, was in shew pretended, as a cause to seek for to have a more sovereign and absolute power to govern the State: but in truth, these new designments and plots of Manlius, rather than the war, forced the Senate to create a Dictator, And A. Cornelius Cossus being created, nominated for his General of Horse, T. Quintius Capiplinius. The Dictator, albeit he saw a greater contention toward, at home than abroad, yet (because it that the war required some speedy expedition, or because by victory and triumph, he thought to make his Dictatorship more mighty and powerful) he took musters, and set forward into the Pomptine Land, into which parts he had intelligence, that the Volscians had proclaimed their forces, to repair.

A digression of the author.

I doubt not, but they that read in so many books already, of these continual wars fought with the Volscians, besides their tedious satiety of reading, will muse also at this (which to my self was likewise a wonder, when I perused the writers that lived near about the times of these acts) how these Volscians and Equians, so often vanquished and defeated, were furnished with supply of souldiers to maintain their wars. But seeing by the ancient Chroniclers it hath been overspiced with silence, what should I alledge, but only mine own opinion and bare conjecture, which every man hath liberty to put in for himself? Likely it is, that either between the times of wars as now we see in the Roman musters) they used to breed up one supply under another, of the younger sort, to the maintenance and renewing so oftentimes of their war: or that their armies were not always levied out of the same States, albeit the wars go under the name of one and the self-same nation: or that those countries yielded in those days an infinite number of freemen, which now are well near waft and delart but for some Roman slaves, which keep those parts yet from being void and dispeopled, as having but a very small seminary, or none at all, left, of serviceable souldiers.

The Oration of A. Cornelius Cossus Dictator to his souldiers.

Certainly, the Volscians army, as all authors agree, was very great at this time: albeit of late dayes by the leading and conduct of Camillus they were (ore weakened, and their strength much abated. Besides, there were with them in field, the Latins and Hernicks, some of the Circians, and other Coloners from Velitra. The Roman Dictator having that day pitched his camp, and the next morrow came abroad with happy tokens of good speed from the Birds: having also slain a sacrifice, and procured thereby the favour and grace of the Gods, in joyous manner shewed himself unto his souldiers: who according as they were commanded, were ready early in the morning, by break of day in arms, attending the found of Trumper for battel. The day is ours (quoth he) my valorous souldiers, if either the Gods or their Prophets can foretell future events. "Therefore as valour men of assured hope, and such as shall encounter with far meaner than our selves, pitch we our javelins down at our feet, and draw our swords only. Neither would I have you to run out of the main battel, and to give the charge, but to keep your ground, and stand stedfast, and abide the first flock of the enemy. And when they have spent their volley of shot in vain, and shall with full force come upon you as you stand, then brandish your swords, and let them glitter in their eyes, and think every man of the Gods, that they will help the Romans. The Gods I say, which in happy hour, by the lucky approbation of their Birds, have sent us into the field to fight. And as for you, O Quintinius, keep your Horsemen close together, marking advisedly the first beginning of the skirmish: and when you see the battels buckle together pell-mell, and come to hand-strokes, whilst they are buffed and occupied one way, fright them another way with your Horsemen, ride among their ranks as they fight, and break their arrayes. Thus fought both Horse and Foot according to his direction, And

As the legions wanted not a worthy Captain, no more missed the Captain of happy speed. The multitude of the enemies trusting upon nothing but their own number, which they measured and compared together only by their eye, interviewing both the one army and the other, rashly gave battel, and as rashly gave over again. In shout only and shot shewing themselves hot and eager at the first encounter: but were not able to abide the sword-fight, the closing together foot to foot, and the fiery countenance of their enemies, which for the very heat of their courage, shined and glittered fully in their eyes. So the forefront being put back, a fear came upon them likewise, that stood behind for supply, and withal, the Horsemen for their parts set foot and fought most terribly, Whereupon the ranks of the enemies in sundry places were broken, and all set out of order, so as their battalions seemed to floure and wave up and down to and fro, in suspense whether to fight or flye. Afterwards, when they law the foremost smitten down and slain, and every one thought no other but his own turn was next to be killed, they turned their backs and fled. The Romans came forward still and chafed them. And so long as they went their way armed and thick huddled together, it was the footmens work to pursue them: but when it was perceived once, that they flung away their weapons on all hands, and that the enemies army fled dispersed all abroad in the fields: then were the troupes of Horsemen set out after them, with this caveat and charge, to make no stay and forlet the time, by killing them one by one, and so to give the main multitude of them in the mean while sufficient respite to escape: but that they should content themselves, only to let flye some shot amongst them, and by scaring them to hinder their running: and when they were ridden beyond, to cross upon them and stay them, until the footmen might overtake them, slay them down right and make an hand of them clean. Thus fled they, and thus were they followed in chafe until night. The very same day was the Volscians camp taken and ransacked, and the whole pillage, besides the bodies of free men, was given unto the souldiers. The greatest part of the prisoners were Hernicks and Latins: and those not of the common sort, and such as might be thought to have served for pay: but there were found among them certain young Gentlemen of good mark, a plain proof and evidence, that the Volscian enemies had aid from thence by the publick and general warrant of the State. There were known also to be among them some of the Circians: yea, and certain of the Velitern colony likewise. All of them were sent to Rome, Where being examined before the chief of the Senators, they confessed every one in plain terms, the reviving of their own Nation like as they had before bewrayed it unto the Dictator. The Dictator kept his forces together within the standing camp, making no doubt, but that the rulers and Senators of Rome would determine to war upon those countries.

The Volscians defeated.

But even at that time a greater heap of troubles which arose at home, caused him to be sent for to Rome, by occasion of a sedition which grew daily more and more: and by reason of the Author thereof (a man of quality and note) was more feared than any usually had been afore time. For now by this, had M. Manlius not by speeches only, but by plain deeds also, (which in outward shew seemed popular and plausible) shewed evidently upon what trouble some and tumultuous spirit all proceeded. For seeing upon a time a Centurion, of good worth for his service in war, condemned in an action of debt, and upon an execution of judgement carried to prison: He in the midst of the Forum, came running unto him with a rout and crew of his followers and retinue, laid hand on him, and took him perforce from the officers: and after he had given out some words aloud touching the pride of the Senators, the cruelty of the iudgers, the calamities of the Commons, the valour and present distress of the party; Marry then (quoth he) I have I done a great deed, to no purpose, in saving the Capitol and the Cattle with this right hand of mine, if I could abide to see my fellow souldier (as it he were taken prisoner of the Gauls by way of conquest) had away into bondage and captivity, and laid up fast in gyves and fetters. And therewith openly in sight of all the people paid the whole debt downright on the nail, unto the creditor: and so after the usual and solemn ceremony by a brazen peece of coin and the ballance, he set him at liberty out of the creditor's hands, and let him go at large: "Who prayed heartily to God and man, for to requite accordingly M. Manlius his only deliverer, and the very patron and protector of the Commons of Rome. And when he was once got into that unruly and seditious throng, he presently himself set all a madding, shewing the Gats of his wounds received in the Veientians and Gauls wars, and in other services one after another: saying, "That whilst he thus followed souldiery, and rebuilt his house that was destroyed, he became indebted, and that so deeply (by reason that the interest alwayes overgrew the principal, which he by that means had paid and paid again) that he was not able to creep out of the iudgers book, but was plunged therein over head and ears. And now behold (quoth he) by the only goodness of M. Manlius, I have the liberty again to see the light of the Sun, to behold the Common place, to look my neighbours and fellow citizens in the face: at his hands I acknowledge to have received all the benefits that mine own parents could give me: unto him I vow whatsoever in me is left, and in his quarrel to spend that little life and blood which remaineth in my body: and in one word look what privilege I may enjoy in right of my country, and in the communion of the Gods, publick or private, the same do I impart and communicate with that one man. By these speeches the Commons were set on and pricked forward mightily, as wholly devoted unto one person: and who but Manlius now in every mans mouth? And presently in the nick he entred into another action that tended more effectually to mar all quiet, and to set every thing out of order. His Land in the territory of Veii, which was the chief and capital Manor

The malicious speeches of a Centurion.

Manor of his inheritance, even the fairest flower of his garland, he set upon sale, causing it openly to be cried; and said withal, I will not O Quirites, so long as I have one foot of ground, or any thing else left, see one of you condemned and upon execution carried to prison. This let them to a floor, that they were ready, as it seemed, to follow him as the only protector of their liberties, in any action, were it right or wrong, they cared not which way, all was one with them. Besides, at home in his own house, he spared not to cast out scandalous speeches against the Senators, as if he had been at the open Crois, making Orations, Amongst which, without all regard whether he spake true or false, he let fall these words, "That the Senators kept in secret certain hidden treasures of the Gauls gold, and were not now contented to hold in possession the common grounds, but they would also embezzle the treasure publick, which if it came abroad, the Commons might soon be acquit and discharged of their debts. This gap being once laid open, and this light given the people, they thought (ye may be sure) an unworthy indignity, that when there was gold to be levied for redemption of the City out of the Gauls hands, it then should be gathered by a general contribution of all: and the same gold, now recovered from the enemies, should be as a prey in the clutches of a few. Therefore they followed instantly upon him and were very earnest to know, where so great a mass of money and stolen good was hidden. But when he posted them off, and said he would in due time disclose all: they were not content, but setting all other matters apart, their whole care was employed about this business, and nothing else. So as it plainly appeared that neither he should reap a mean thank if he reported a truth, nor incur a small offence and displeasure, in case he told a false tale.

Things hanging thus in these doubtful terms, the Dictator who was sent for, returned from the army into the City. The next day he assembled the Senat: and after he had thoroughly founded and felt the minds of them, that were there met, he commanded the Senators not to depart from him: and assisted as he was with that company, he caused the Ivory chair of estate to be set in the Comitium or common Hall, and sent a servant for M. Manlius. Who being thus peremptorily summoned by the Dictators express commandment, gave warning by a token to his complices and favourites, that there was a broil and fray toward: and with a mighty retinue of his followers, he presented himself before the Tribunal. On the one side, stood the Senators, on the other the Commons: either part beholding their Captain, as it were in a pigst field ready to joyn battle. Then after silence made, "Would to God (quoth the Dictator unto Manlius) I and the Senators of Rome, might in all other things fort as well with the Commons, as I am assured, we shall agree all together about thee, and the matter which I shall ask and demand of thee. I see thou hast put the City in some good hope, that by the Gauls treasure which the principal and chief of the Senators detain with them secretly hidden, all men may keep their credit, and fully pay and discharge their debts. Which I for my part, to God me help, am lo far from hindring, that contrary-wise I would exhort thee, O M. Manlius, to ease the Commons of Rome of the usurers' book: to discover these fellows and make them known, that gave so greedily after the common treasure, and to disappoint them, and turn them out of this their privy booty. Which if thou do not effect, either for that thy self wouldst have a fleece with them, or else because it is but a forged tale that thou hast made of thine own fingers ends. I will not fail, but commit thee to ward, and suffer no longer the multitude upon a vain and deceitful hope, thus by thee to be abused and disquieted. To this, Manlius made answer and said, "I was nothing deceived but will tell enough, that a Dictator was created not against the Volcians, who are enemies (forsooth) to oft as our great Masters think it for their purpose: nor against the Latins and Hernicks, whom they drive and provoke to rebellion by false and forged rumours: but against my self and the Commons of Rome. For now I see well, that the Dictator professeth to maintain and bear out the Usurers against the Commons: and that against my self, for the favour that the multitude beareth unto me, there is matter devised to charge me withal, and to procure my utter ruin and overthrow. Doth it offend and grieve you indeed, O A. Cornelius, and you my Lords of the Senat, that the people thus stand about me on every side? Why do not ye every man for N his part, by your good deserts divide afunder this company, and draw them away with you from me? Namely, by your mediation and intercession, by giving your word for them, by ridding out of gyves and prison your fellow citizens, by saving them that are condemned, from being awarded to the thralldom of their creditors, and out of the overplus and superfluity of your own living and goods by relieving their present need, and supplying their necessities? But what mean I to perwade you to forgo any thing of your own, and bestow it upon them? Take another course with them, and make them another offer. Do but deduct out of the principal debt, that which hath been paid, for consideration of the loan; you shall soon see that my retinue will make no greater shew, than any other mans else. But why am I the only man so careful of the citizens and people? Certainly, I can make no better answer herunto, than if one should ask me, O wherefore I alone saved the Capitol and the Cliff? As I then yielded my helping hand to all in general, so will I now to my power relieve each one in particular. For as touching the treasure of the Gauls: the thing in it self being easy, this demand of yours maketh hard and difficult. For what need you ask me that which you know already your selves? Why lay you not that open which is in your secret bosom, rather than to have it fitted and bolted out? but that there is some privy juggling, some cunning practise and packing therein? The more ye would seem to have your leiger domain to be fought into and detected: so much the more, I fear me, ye will

A. Cornelius Cassius Dictator
to M. Manlius.

The answer of Manlius to the Dictator.

A "hide it even from the eyes of those that are watchful and quicksighted. And therefore am not I to be forced to reveal and shew where your stolen goods are: but you would be made, if you were well served, to bring them abroad into the view of the World. At these words, the Dictator commanded him to leave off these foolish vapourings and trifling shifts: urging him either to go through with his challenge and prove it true: or if he could not justify it, to confess that he had falsely handled and wrongfully charged the Senat, and sought to bring upon them the ill will and hatred of men; for a vain surmise and insinuation of Theevery. But as he stoutly inferred and replied again, that he would not speak at the pleasure of his enemies, nor owed them any such service: he commanded him to be had away to prison and kept in bonds. And as he was apprehended by the Officer, "O Jupiter (quoth he) Optimus Maximus, O Luna Queen of heaven, St. Manlius apprehended.
"O Minerva, with other gods and goddesses, that inhabit the Capitol and the Cattle; Suffer ye your Knight and Defender, to be thus tugged, misused, and evil entreated by his adversaries? And shall this right hand wherewith I defeated the Gauls, and drove them from your Chapels and shrines, be now pinnioned and manacled? There was no one man there, that lay and heard him, who could indure this indignity. But this City, as most patient of all other Cities to abide any just, righteous and lawful commandment of the Magistrate, contained her self and was content in some cases to be overruled: so far forth, that against the authority and absolute power of the Dictator, neither the Tribuns of the Commons, nor the Commons themselves, durst either cast up their eyes to look awry, or once open their mouths. But after Manlius was committed, it was for certain known, that a great sort of the Commoners, changed their weed and put on their worst apparel and mourning array: many a man let his head and beard grow long; yea, and a number of them with sad and heavy cheer, kept commonly about the Goal-dore.

Now when the Dictator triumphed over the Volcians, his triumph bred him more hatred and displeasure than honor and glory: for it is commonly spoken, that he got it at home and not abroad, and triumphed over a citizen not over an enemy: and this only wanted, (say they) to make up his pride to the full, that Manlius was not led before his chariot. Whereupon there was like to grow much scandal and very sedition. For the appeasing and mitigation whereof, the Senat upon a sudden, without any motion made, of themselves became bountiful, and assigned 2000,

D Citizens of Rome to be sent to Savennum to inhabit as a Colony. And to every man was set out two acres and an half of Land apiece. Which the Commoners construed to be a matter of nothing, a small boon bestowed upon a few, the very hire and reward for betraying Manlius. So that this proved a mischief for a remedy: and by this salve, the sore rather festered and rancled, than healed up, and the sedition thereby fretted more and more. For now the crew of Manlius his followers made shew of greater mourning and heaviness, in their vile clothes and sad countenance, after the guise of persons accued during the time of their troubles. And when the fear and terror was once overblown, by reason that the Dictator after his triumph resigned up his authority, then folks hearts were set at liberty, and their tongues walked at will. Some were heard in open audacity to upbraid the multitude and cast in their teeth, "That it was their fa-

E lions always to lift up and advance their Protectors and Defenders into high places, and afterwards, in the very pitch of danger and point of downfall, to forsake and leave them destitute. Thus was Sp. Cassius served, that solicited the Commons to the division of Lands: thus was Sp. Melius overthrown, that put his hand to his purse, and at his own proper charges kept extrem famine from the hungry jaws of the poor citizens. Semblably, M. Manlius endeavouring to deliver a great part of the City (drowned as it were and overwhelmed in debt) and to enlarge them and let them abroad at liberty, now for his pains is betrayed unto his deadly enemies: so that the Commons do feed and frink up, even for the shambles and butchers knife the fautors and maintainers of their weak and liberty. And ought indeed (say they) a Noble man, that sometimes had been Consul, thus to be misused, if he answered not to the good liking

P and pleasure of the Dictator? Suppose, he had over-reached and made a lie afore, and so had not a present and ready answer at the time: was there ever any servant and slave, for leaving cast in prison and laid up in Irons? And how could they forget that night, which was like to have been the last night that ever the Romans should have seen: that fatal night of their final destruction for ever? Or how could they chafe, but have still in their eye the army of the Gauls, climbing up the Cliff Tarpeia? and how M. Manlius in person, so bravely seen in his armour, all wearing all bleeding, rescued and saved Jupiter himself in a manner out of the enemies hands? What? Did they think that with half-pound measures of wheat meal, they had insufficiently recompensed the Saviour of their Country? And whom they had well near canonized amongst the holy hallows of Heaven, or at least-wise by his new addition of surname made equal to

C Jupiter Capitolinus, was it well done to suffer him, imprisoned in chains, lying in a dark dungeon, to draw his lively breath at the pleasure of the Hangman? Was he alone able to succour you all, and are ye all not able to help him alone? Thus ceased not the multitude to exclaim and make their plaints, and would not depart from that place, no, not all the night long, but threatened to break the prison by force: until such time as they got that remitted, which otherwise they would have wrested, and Manlius by an act of the Senat was released out of prison and enlarged. Whereby the mutiny was never the more ended, but rather a Captain given them to maintain the Sedition.

Savennum made a Colony, and peopled with Romans.

The feditious speeches of the multitude in the behalf of M. Manlius.

* Capitolinus, because he saved the Capitol.

About the same time the Latins and Hernicks, the inhabitants also of the Colony Circen, and they of Volturne, who came to excite themselves for the Volscian war, wherein they were charged to have had their hands, and required to have the captives delivered, for to proceed against them, according to their own Laws, had a heavy answer. But the Coloners received the sharper check and rebuke, because they being Roman citizens, were entered into that wicked plot and abominable action, to combine against their native Country. And they were not only denied their prisoners, but also (wherein the Romans dealt more favourably with the rest that were their Allies) they were warned and commanded in the name of the Senat, to avoid and that with speed out of the City, from the sight and presence of the people of Rome; for fear lest the privilege of Embassy, provided for the security and safe conduct of forrainers and not of citizens, should not serve to protect them. Now when the Sedition of Manlius was set on foot again, somewhat before the end of the year, the great assembly was holden for the Election of Magistrates; wherein there were created Tribuns in Consuls authority Serg. Cornelius Maluginensis the second time, P. Valerius Patruus the second time, M. Furius Camillus the fifth time, Ser. Sulpicius Ruffus the second time, C. Papirius Crassus, T. Quintius Cincinnatus the second time, all of Senators calling.

In the beginning of this year, peace they had with forrain nations; a matter very commodious both for the Senat and the Commons. For the Com, in this regard, that being not called away by any matters, they had some good hope (especially having so mighty a champion) to be rid at once for ever of fury. For the Senators again, because their minds being not distracted by any fear from abroad, might attend about curing and healing the intestine maladies at home. When both parts therefore were now more sharp set, and eagerly bent, they thought out of hand to trie what would be done, and to make either a shaft or a bolt of it. Manlius calling the Com, to his house, devised with the principal heads of them both day and night, to bring in a change and alteration of the State: and fuller of stomach, anger and gall he was now a good deal than aforesaid. Nettle he was, the rather by his late disgrace and shame, who never before had been touched in credit, nor tasted of any reproach and contumely. Heart he took unto him, for that the Dict, durst not execute that rigor against him, which Cincinnatus Quintinus had extended upon Sp. Melius: and it seemed unto him, that not only the Dict, sought to wind himself out, and in resigning up his room, to avoid the offence given by his imprisonment; but also that the very Senat was not able to endure the manner of proceeding. With these imaginations being puffed up and galled too, he failed not wital to prick forward and exasperate the minds of the Commons, who of themselves already, were kindled and set on fire. And with these and such like speeches he entertained them. "How long (quoth he) I pray you, will ye be ignorant, and not know what ye may do, and what power ye have? A thing that nature it self would not have so much as the very dumb beasts, but to understand. Do but count how many you are in number you yourselves, and how few adversaries ye have against you. If ye were but one to one, yet (I would think) you should more eagerly strive for to maintain your liberty, than they, to set up their Lordship. For, look how many favourites ye have been, following and courting one patron, or many shall ye now be opposed to one enemy. Make but shew only of war, ye shall have peace. Let them see you once ready to make head and offer violence, soon will they yield and part with their right: Either ye must adventure, all jointly together to do somewhat, or else make account each one, to abide and suffer all. How long will ye stand looking from every side upon me? I for my part, surely, will not fail any one of you. Look ye then to it, that fortune fall not me. I, even I, that was your redeemer and deliverer, was all at once (when it pleased mine enemies) taken down and made no body. And ye, all of you saw him led to prison, who saved every one of you from prison. If happily those mine enemies should attempt to do me more spight, Where am I then? and what were I bet to trust unto? Should I look for that end that Cassius and Melius came unto? Ye do well to signify how you dread the pefage, and with the contrary. And the Gods forbid that it should so come to pass. But look not that ever they should come down from Heaven to protect me. That mind they must give you, to preserve me from so hard a hap, like as they gave me a resolute heart, both in mine armour to save you from barbarous enemies, and in my gown to defend you from proud citizens. Is there so little courage in you (to mighty a people otherwise) as to think it sufficient, and to stand contented, if you may be backed only, and meet with some help against your enemies; and to know no other scuffling with your adversaries (the Senators) but wherein you suffer your selves to be commanded in the end? This baseness cometh not to you by kind. By use and custome only, you are become their vassals and subjects. For what is the cause ye are so courageous against your enemies abroad, that ye think it meet and reason to rule and govern them? No other in truth but this, because with them you have been ever wont to strive for sovereignty; whereas against these, ye have been used rather, to make some flight proof and tryal what you may do by your liberty, than to do your best, and to put your selves forth for to maintain it and extend it to the mozt. And yet what manner of captains soever ye have met withal to lead you, and howsoever affected ye have been your selves, obtained ye have hitherto all things that ye shot at, and they never so great: Such was your might, or such was your felicity. Wherefore now it is high time to give the adventure of greater matters also. Make but tryal only of your own good fortune, and of my self, whom I hope ye have had happy experience

Oration of
M. Manlius to
of Rome.

A "experience of already: with less ado shall ye be provided of one to over-rule and command the Senators, than ye have been hitherto of those, that were to resist only their imperious government. Down we must with these Dictatorships and Consulships both, and lay them level with the ground: that the commonalty of Rome may once be aloft, and bear up the head. Bettir your selves therefore, and play the men. Hinder process and course of law for actions of debt. I profess my self a Patron of the Commons, which name my care over you, my faithfulness to you, hath indured me with. And if you please to entitle your leader and Captain, with a more glorious title of honour and Majesty, ye shall find it more potent and available to effect that which you long for and desire. And so from that time forward, began some practise to set up the Government of a King: But neither who were the agents in this action, nor to what terms these plots proceeded, is it plainly enough recorded. But on the other side, the Senators far in Council, and debated about the Section and secret meeting of the Commons in the privat house of Manlius, and that house, which stood (as it fell out) upon the Cattle Hill: likewise of that imminent engine and fabric, devised for the overthrow of the present liberty. Many were of opinion, and spake it aloud, That there was need of a Servilius Hala, who not by commanding a publick enemy of the State to prison, would provoke him and make him more eager; but by dispatching of one wicked member out of the way, and cutting him off; might end this intestine and civil war. But they came down at length, and grew to a resolution, in words mildere; yet indeed and effect all ones. That the Magistrates should have a careful eye, whither these mischievous plots and practises of M. Manlius, the Commons, had incurred no damage and hurt. Then the Tribuns in Consuls authority; and the other Tribuns of the Commons (or even they also seeing, that in the loss of the publick liberty of all, their power likewise should come to an end, had yielded to be advised and ruled by the Senat) laid all their heads together, and consulted what course was best to be taken. When as no man could be think of any way, but plain violence and bloodshed (a piece of work in all appearance, of great adventure and doubtful hazard) then M. Menenius, and Q. Publilius, two Tribuns of the Commons stepped forth and said, "What mean we to make that, a quarrel between the Senators and Commons, which the whole body united of the City, indeed should undertake against so dangerous and pettillous a member? Why trouble we our selves to set upon him and the Commons with him, whom by the means of the very Commons themselves, we were the safer course, and less offensive to assail? that being surcharged and overweighed with his own power whereupon he presumeth, he may fall down and take his overthrow. We are fully minded to arrest him, to convent him judicially, and call him to his answer. Nothing is less popular, and more odious to the people, than to hear of Kings government again. The multitude shall not so soon see and perceive, that our quarrel is not with them, but that they shall become his competent Judges, and pass upon him, who now are his Advocates: also, that his accusers from out of the Commons, shall behold one of the Nobility to hold up his hand at the bar, and the indictment framed, upon the crime of usurping the Kingdom: but (be ye sure of it) they will tender and favour the fair looks and person of no man, before the cause of their own free estate. When all the house liked well, and allowed of this advice and overture, they made no more ado, but served Manlius with process to answer at a day appointed. Which was not so soon done, but the Commons at the very first, began to storm and be enraged, especially when they saw the accused man, during his trouble so fully arraigned, accompanied with none of the Senators, nor so much as one of his kindred and affinity, nor, nor his very brethren An, and T. Manlius. A thing before that day never seen nor known, but that in so great a danger as this was, the nearest kinsfolk in blood, did change their weed. For even when Ap. Claudius his adversary, yea, and the whole lineage and name of the Claudii, were mournfully clad, and poorly apparelled. Now surely (say they) it is a very compact amongst them all, that this popular man, so gracious and welbeloved, should be confounded and overthrown, because he was the first that ever fell away from the Senators to the Commons. When the day was come of his arraignment, I can find in no author, what was objected against the prisoner by his accusers, directly tending to prove the crime of aspiring to a Kingdom, but only the convictees of the multitude, certain seditious words, his overmuch largels, and his forged fummie and false information of the gold. I doubt not but there was matter of great importance, urged and enforced against him, seeing that the Commons delay in proceeding to his condemnation, was not long of his cause, but occasioned by the place only. This one thing seemeth worthy to be noted, and for all mens learning, that how notable and how great soever his honor, worship, and commendable parts were: it the soul and cursed desire of tyrannical rule, made nor only unpleasant and without grace, but also odious and detestable in the eyes of the people. He brought forth, as it is reported, welnear four hundred men, whom he had laid out money for gratis, and without any interest or consideration: those whole goods he saved from port-sale, and kept from the bondage of their creditors, after they were condemned. Over and besides, he not only reckoned up, but shewed also in open fight, the honorable testimonies of his service in the wars: as the spoils of his enemies by him slain and disarmed, to the number of 30. gifts bestowed upon him by Generals in way of reward, 40. amongst which were two goodly mural garlands for scaling and entering upon the walls first: eight civic coronets for saving the lives of citizens in danger. Moreover, he presented there in place, the parties themselves in person, whom he had rescued out of the enemies hands: and amongst them he nominated C. Servilius at that instant General of the Horsemen, and now absent.

absent. And when he had rehearsed his noble fears of arms, and amplified them according to the height of their worth in a most glorious and eloquent Oration, as one whose words were futable and answerable to his deeds: at the last he tript his breast bare, and shewed the scars there remaining of wounds received in the wars: and ever and anon looking to the Capitol, very often he called aloud upon Jupiter and the other Gods, to help him now in this extremity and peril of his state: and prayed that the same mind which they had given him to defend the Capitol cliff, and even to the safeguard of the people of Rome, they would vouchsafe the same people, in this distress of his woful calamity: beseeching them both all and some, to look up to the cliff, and to the Capitol, to turn themselves toward the Gods there, and so to proceed to judgement of him. All the whiles the people were cired and called by their Centuries, and the prisoner stretched forth his hands, and converted his prayers from men to the Gods: the Tribunes evidently saw that unless they freed the eyes of the people from beholding the memorial of so great a deiert, it would never be that so long as their minds were thus foretalled and possessed with that benefit of his, they would find the enditement, were it never so true. So the matter being put off and deferred to another day, the people were summoned to assemble in the grove Parthena, without the gate Flumentana, from whence they might not have a sight of the Capitol. There the accusation prevailed more than compassion, and the matter went against him: and so with hard and obdurate hears, they pronounced a heavy and dolorous sentence, and which the very judges themselves had in horror. Some there be that say there were Duumvirs ordained for the purpose, to make inquisition and fit upon this treason against the State. Thus being condemned the Tribunes caused him to be thrown headlong down the rock Tarpeia. Which place was the self same that yielded to that one man a monument and memorial both of singular glory, and also of extreme punishment and ignominious death. After his death there remained two infamous marks behind him of shame: the one publick, occasioned by his dwelling house. For whereas it was situate, where now the chappel and work-house, or mint-house of Moneta standeth, an Ark was propoied unto the people, That none of the Senators shoud dwell on the cliff or Capitol Mount. The other proceeding more properly from his owne life and kined: For that by a general decree of the house of Manlius it was provided, That none of that family and race shoud ever after bear the name of Manlius. This was the end of him, who, but that he was born in a free City, had been a right worthy and renowned man.

But the people being now pait all danger from him, calling to mind and considering without all affection, his vertues as they were, found a misde of him shortly after. Yea, and for the pettillence also which ensued soon upon, for that there could be no causes known of so great mortality, was imagined of many a man, to have grown upon the execution of Manlius: arguing thus, That the Capitol was polluted with the blood of the Saviour thereof: and the Gods took no delight and pleasure to have (as it were) presented unto their eyes, the punishment of that man, by whose means their Temples had been delivered out of the hands of the enemies. Upon this plague and scarcity of corn withal, and the common brute that spread abroad both of the one and the other, there ensued the year following many wars, when as L. Valerius the fourth time, A. Manlius the third time, Ser. Sulpicius the third time, L. Lucratius, L. Aemilius the third time, and M. Trebonius were Tribunes Military in Consuls authority. For besides the Volscians, who by destime were appointed for ever in a manner to busy and keep occupied the Roman souldiers: besides the Colonies Circinea and Velutia, which a long time were about to rebel: besides Latium, that stood in doubtful terms and was suspected, the Latunives also, who had been a most fast and loyal City, all of a sudden rose and became new enemies. The LL. of the Senat supposing all this grew upon contempt, for that the revoluing of the Veliterns, who were their natural citizens, had so long time escaped punishment, decreed with all speed to move the people to denounce and proclaim open war against them. And to the end that the Commons might be more forward in this Military service, they created certain Quinquagiri for the division of the Pomptine Lands: and Triumviri for the planting of a colony at Neper. Then they propounded unto the people, that they would appoint and determine of the war to be made. And notwithstanding the Tribunes of the Com. laboured earnestly, but all in vain, to dissuade, yet the tribes throughout generally granted it, and gave their voyces for war. All that year passed in preparations only, but no army set forth by reason of the plague: which protracting of time and long delay, gave the inhabitants of the Colonies respite to sue unto the Senat for peace. Many of them were inclined and stood thus affected, to send a solemn embassage with humble supplication to Rome: but that (as commonly it falleth out) the publick perill was entangled and interested with the jeopardy of some private persons: and the authors of the backsliding and revolt from the Romans, fearing lest they alone should bear all the blame and be delivered up as a sacrifice to satisfy the wrath of the Romans, turned away clean and aliened the Colonies from all consultation of seeking for peace. And not only in their Councel-House was this Embassage then crossed, but many of the Commons also they excited to invade the territories of Rome, to drive booties, and make spoil. This new wrong by them offered, clean put them by all hope of peace. In that year was the first rumour raised, concerning the Rebellion also of the Preneftines. And when the Tusculans, Gabines, and Lavinians unto whose marches they had made inrodes, complained unto the Senat, and laid much matter against them they received at their hands so calm and cold an answer, that it seemed they gave less credit to their complaints, because these were not willing they should prove true.

The

A The year following, Sp. and L. Papirius, new Tribuns Military with Consuls authority, led the legions to Velutia, whole four Collegues, Ser. Cornelia Maluginensis the fourth time, Q. Servilius, C. Sulpicius, L. Aemilius the fourth time, were left Tribuns behind for defence of the City: and for fear lest they should hear some intelligence of new and fresh stirrs out of Hebrania, where they suspected all would be naught. At Velutia they had the better hand of their enemies: there they found more Preneftines well neer, that came to succour, than the very Colones themselves. For the City was so neer at hand, that it both gave the enemies occasion to flye the sooner and yielded them the only place of safe refuge, after they were fled. The Tribuns forbore to assault the Town, as well in regard of the dangerous enterprise, as also for that they thought it not good to hold fight to the utter destruction of that Colony. Letters were dispatched to Rome with tidings of victory, implying more sharp informations against the Preneftines than the Veliterns. So by an Act of the Senat and assent of the people there was proclaimed war against the Preneftines: who in the year following joyned with the Volscians, and by force won Saturnia a Colony of the people of Rome, notwithstanding it was manfully and valiantly defended by the Townsmen even to the last: where most heafty and cruelly they exercised their victory upon those that they took prisoners, and put them to the sword. The Romans took this in a very ill part: and elected M. Furius Camillus Tribun Military the seventh time: who had for his companions in office, A. and Lucius Pesshumus Regillensis, L. Furius and L. Lucratius, and M. Fabius Ambulstus.

C The Volscian war was appointed to Camillus extraordinarily: and to assist him therein, it fell to L. Furius his lot, one of the State-Tribuns, not so much for the good of the Common-weal, as to minister unto his fellow all matter of honour and renown: as well in publick, (for that he set all upright again, which by the rashness of Lucius was tain down) as also in private, for that out of his error and misdoing Marcus Furius, rather fought for thanks and love at his hands, than aimed at any vain glory to himself. Camillus was now far grown and steep in years and very aged, and when in the assembly for Election, he was about to take the usual form of oath, for to excuse his feeble and craty body, the people with one consent would not permit him. Howbeit for all his age, he carried a lively spirit and lusty courage with him still: his senses were all fresh and found: and the late civil affairs had stirred him up and gave him an edge, who now had no great mind to manage martial exploits. So he gathered a power of four legions, consisting of 4000. apiece, and made proclamation that all his forces should be ready the next day, at the gate Esgulonia, and then he put himself in his journey to Saturnia. The enemy who had won the Colony, nothing dismayd therat, and trusting in the number of his souldiers, wherein he had the better by odds, expected and stayd his coming there. And so soon as he understood that the Romans approached, forthwith came into the field, minding without delay to put it to an hazard and try it out: presuming, that the skill of the Romans General, were he never so singular (in whom their enemies only trusted) would little or naught avail in regard they were so few in number. The Roman army was as hot as they, and one of their Generals as forward every way. And presently without any stay, had they tried the fortune of a batell, but for the policy and rule of one man: who by holding off, and protracting time of fight, fought it to help himself through good order and skill. But so much the more the enemy urged still, and was more sharp set: to know he not only ranged his men before his own camp in battell array, but also let forward into the mids of the field: and advancing himself with ensignes displayed, neer unto the trench and rampier of his enemies, made a proud bravado and shew of his strength, whereupon he bare himself so confidently. This could the Roman souldiers hardly endure: and L. Furius one of the Tribuns Military, had more ado by far to digest and put up that at the enemies hand. And a venturesome Knight he was, both by reason of his youthful years and natural disposition: and also pushed up with hope of the multitude, which commonly taketh heart, and presumeth upon small fights and grounds, and buildeth upon greatest uncertainties. And the souldiers being of themselves already hot enough, he inflamed and set them more on fire, by elevating and making light of his fellows reputation, in regard of his old age, the only thing that he could alledge: giving out ever and anon, "That wars were for young-men, that mens hearts flourished and faded as their bodies did: which was seen in Camillus, who of a most valorous and forward warrior, was now become a draw-back and a temporiser, and one that would take his leisure: and he that was wont, so soon as he came to a place, with the first assault to win Forts and strong Towns, was now within his mures and rampier fast still and trilled out the time. And what hopes had he? Dreameth he, that either his own power should encrease, or his enemies strength decrease? What occasion, what opportunity of time, what place of vantage for ambush laid he for? Tush, these policies and inventions of the good old man, are cold and dull. God wot. In faith, Camillus, as he hath lived long enough, so hath he gained glory enough. To what purpose then (quoth he) should we suffer the whole puissance of a City, which ought indeed to be immortal for to age and wax old with the body of one man, whom all men see to be but mortal. With these and such like words he had drawn away the whole camp after him: and when from all parts thereof, they called hard, and cryed for batell: "We are not able (quoth he) M. Furius, to keep in and repress any longer the violence of our souldiers: and as for the pride of the enemy, whose courage by our delays we have encreased, and who infiniteth over us, it is intolerable. Give place then, you that are but one man, and yeeld unto us all. Suffer your self to be overcome."

"come with reason and counsel, that you may sooner overcome by force and arms. Hereunto
"Camillus made answer again: What wars soever (quoth he) unto this present day have by mine
"own entire conduct, and sole direction been managed, neither can you nor the people of Rome "deny, but that in them you never repented, either of my policy or happy success. Now I know
"full well, that I have a companion joyned with me in government & rule of equal commission;
"for the prime and luteness of youth, much above me, and my better. And as to the army, I have "indeed been used ever to command, and not to be commanded: but yet my fellows authori"ty, I cannot be against. Let him do in Gods Name, what he thinketh good for the Common"weal, and God speed his hand. Only in regard of mine old age I crave this favour, that I may "not be set in the forefront: but for other labours, look what an old man may or ought to do
"in war, therein surely I shall not fail. And this one thing would I crave at the hands of the im"mortal Gods, that some notable mishap befall not, to make my former counsel good and praise"worthy. But neither would men be ruled by his advice to profitable and wholesome, nor the "Gods vouchsafe to hear his prayers to holy and devout. Then Lucius Furius, the author and principal
"periwader of battel, set forth the vanguard in array. Camillus he fortifieth the Regiments and "Squadrons for supply in the rearward: but above all, he placeth a strong guard before the camp.
"Himself took up his standing on a higher place, to behold and mark the issue of another mans "counsel. So soon as at the first brunt and encounter, they rushed and made a noise with their ar"mour, the enemies on purpose (of policy, and not for fear) gave footing and lost ground. Now
"there was behind them on their back a pretty rising of an Hill, between their camp and the battel;
"and by reason that they were well stored of men, they had left behind them in the camp certain
"strong companies armed and well appointed: with this instruction, that whiles both armies were "hard in fight, and when their enemies should come near their trench and rampier, they might fall "out on a sudden upon them. The Romans following out of measure upon the enemies as they re-
"treated, were drawn upon the disadvantage of the ground, and gave occasion and fit opportunity "unto the enemy to issue out of the camp upon them. So the terror returned upon the supposed vic"tors, by reason both of the new supplies of the enemies, and also of the fall and descent of the "Hill: and forced the battel of the Romans to give back. The Volscians that charged them from "out of the camp, and were fresh and lusty pressed hard upon them: they also that made as though "they fled, began now to fight again. The Romans soldiers forgetting now both their late lusti-
"ness, and their ancient honour, retired not easily and softly in good order, but plain turned their "backs on all sides, fled again by heaps, and ran away toward their own camp. Whereat Camillus
"being by them that attended about his person, mounted upon a good Courser, and with all the "speed he could make, opposing the Squadrons of the rearward against the enemy: "Is this (quoth
"he) the fight, you soldiers, that ye fo called for? what God, what man can ye lay the weight
"on now? It was your rashness and fool-hardiness afore: and it is your dastardly cowardice
"now, and nothing else, that is the cause of all this. Followed ye have already one General,
"Follow Camillus now a while: and as ye have been always wont by my leading, once more
"win the victory. What look you toward the hold and the camp? there is no coming thither,
"there is no being there for any of you without victory. At the first they were abashed, and "stayed themselves from farther flight: but after that they law once the ensigns wheel about, and
"the Squadrons turn again, they made head, and charged the enemy again. And the General
"himself, a man renowned for so many triumphs, and besides, for his venerable age so revered, even "amongst the foremost ensigns, amidst the greatest perils, and most distresses, advanced forth in per"son. Hereupon every one for his part, for the better leg forward, provoked his fellow withal, and "encouraged one another, so as with a cheerful and lively shout, the whole field rang again. Nei"ther was the other Tribun behind hand for his part: but being sent by his Colleague unto the "Horsemen (whiles he in the mean time marshalled again the Footmen in order) not by way of "chiding (for what might he avail thereby, so long as he was himself in fault as well as the rest?)
"but laying aside all Lordly command, fell wholly to entreating, and besought them both all
"and some to quit themselves like men, and acquit him of the guilt and blame of that unlucky dayes
"work. "Indeed (quoth he) when my brother Camillus would not agree thereto, but expressly
"forbad, yet I chose rather to be partaker of the folly and rashness of all, than the widome and "sage advice of one. Camillus (come what will of it, speed you well, or speed you ill) seeth the "glory will be his: but I, unless the battel be reversed, shall take such part as you all, (a most mi"serable and pitious case) but the flame will redound and light upon my head and none else.
"Well, at length they agreed, and thought it best to abandon their Horses to bestow them among "the waving and disordered companies, and on foot to make head upon the enemies. Thus they go "both together, as bravely minded with resolution, as they were richly and gorgeously armed. And "in what part soever they saw the footmen most distressed, there wanted neither in the Generals
"nor in the soldiers, courage in the highest degree to fight it out lustily. Well was it seen by the "happy event, that valorous endeavours speed ever well. For the Volscians the same way that
"erewhile they made semblance oliving ground upon a counterfeite fear, now fled in good sadness
"as hard as they could. A great number both in the conflict, and after in the chase were slain. As "for the rest that remained in the camp, which presently at one brunt was won, more of them "were taken prisoners than killed. In the view & account taken of the captives, there were some of "them known to be Tufculans, who were severed apart from the rest, and brought before the State-defeated.

A State-Tribuns, And upon examination, confessed flatly, that they served by the publick warrant of the City. Camillus herewith disquieted, for fear of war from so near neighbors, said he would forthwith have those prisoners with him to Rome, that the Lords of the Senat might not be ignorant how the Tufculans were revolted from their society. In the mean while, his brother Tribun might, if he so pleased, have the regiment of the leaguer and the host. That days work had taught him now, not to prefer his own ways before the better counsel of another. And yet neither he himself, nor any man else in the army, thought that Camillus would quietly digest this fault of his, whereby the State of the Commonwealth was driven upon so dangerous a point of downfall. And as well in the host, as also at Rome, it was rife and current in every mans mouth:
that whereas the fight with the Volscians was variable, and the service doubtful: for the ill speed, the discomfort, and the running away, L. Furius was all in fault: but for the good success, Camillus only had all the honour.

When the captives were brought into the Council House, and the Lords of the Senat were of opinion and determined war against the Tufculans, and had laid the charge thereof upon Camillus, he requested to have an assistant joyned with him in Commission: and being left to his own choicest, take whom he would of all his Companions in office, contrary to all mens expectation, he chose L. Furius. By which moderation of his affections, and good carriage of himself, he both delayed the infamy of his Colleague, and won himself great glory and commendation. Yet for all this, proceeded not they to any war with the Tufculans. For they by their constant observation of peace, kept off the violence of the Romans, which by force of arms they had not been able,
When the Romans entered and invaded their territory, they went not so much as out of those places that lay near the high way, whereas the enemy marched: they forsook not the tilling of their grounds, but kept the gates of their City wide open, came forth solemnly in their long gowns to meet with the L.L. Generals in the way, and brought victuals right courteously to serve the army, as well out of the City as Country. Camillus having pitched down his tents before the gates, and desirous to know, whether there were the same appearance of peace within the wals, as bare they abroad in the Country, entered the City: and seeing the doors standing open, the shop-windows up, all kind of wares set out to sale upon the bulks: the Craftsmen and Artificers busily every one occupied at his work: the Grammar schools ringing again with a chime of scholars, learning and saying their lessons: the streets full of women and children amongst the other common people going to and fro about their business: he could perceive no where about him any thing that carried a resemblance of fearful men, no, nor so much as of those that made any wonder at their coming in that warlike order. Thus cast he his eyes into every corner, seeking where this war should be. For there was not so much as any token to be seen, either of ought removed out of the way, or brought in place, upon this present occasion: but all so settled quietness and peace, as if they had scarcely heard any inkling or rumor of hostility. Being therefore overcome with this patience and sufferance of the enemies, he caused their Senat to assemble, unto whom he spake in this wise: "Ye alone to this day of all that I know, O Tufculans, have found the only armor of "proof, and the forcible fence indeed, to save your selves and all ye have from the Romans ire,
"Go your ways to Rome unto the Senat there, The Lords of the Council will weigh and consider,
"whether ye deserved more punishment before, then pardon now. I will not forestall and pick my "self a private thank for a publick benefit. At my hands ye shall have this favour and liberty, to "speak for your selves and plead your own cause: as the Senat shall think good, so shall you speed "of your suit. After that the Tufculans were come to Rome, and their Senat (who but a while a"fore had been faithful Allies and kept their allegiance) seen to stand waiting with heavy cheer, and giving their attendance at the entry of the Court and Council Chamber: the Lords of the Roman Senat, were presently moved thereat, and caused them forthwith to be called in, and received by way of hospitality, more like then hostility. Then the Dictator of Tufculum made this speech and said: "Right honorable Senators, we against whom ye have proclaimed and made war,
"came forth to encounter your Generals and Legions, armed and appointed as ye see us at this "present standing in the porch of your Council House. This was our array, this was the habit of "our Commons, and always that be, unless at any time we shall put on arms for you and in your "quarrel. Thanks we yield to your Captains and to your Armies, that they have beleaved rather
"their eyes than their ears: and where they saw no hostility at all, there they offered none them"selves. That peace which we have shewed and observed, the same crave we humbly fill at the "hands of your clemency. Turn we beseech you from us your forces thither, where war is to be "found. And if we must needs make trial (by suffering ought) of your puissance and power bent a"gainst us, we will try it surely without armor. This is our full resolution, God grant it prove "as fortunate, as it is well meant and proceeding from a single heart. As for the trespasses, where"upon ye were moved to denounce war against us: although it be bootless and to no purpose to "disprove that by words, which by deed is already proved: yet surely, were they never so true,
"we think verily, that without prejudice to our selves, we may safely confess the same, since that "we have so evidently repented thereof. And for you, so long as you be worthy to have so full "satisfaction made it skilful not, what default or transgression be committed against you. Thus "much in effect spake the Tufculans. At the very instant they obtained peace: and not long after, the "right of free burgesies, to be made Citizens of Rome, so the Legions were withdrawn back again
"from Tufculum. Thus Camillus having won great honor by his policy and valour both, in the Vol-rebellion again'. In the same year the men of Stiria made moan of their elres for want of people, and thither new Coloners were assigned to inhabit there.

Albeit the Romans sped but badly in wars, yet the quietness at home was some comfort; which the Tribuns Military chosen from out of the Commons had procured, by reason that they were so gracious and revered among those of their own coat and faction. All the beginning of the year following, was at the first but a light fire with hot discord and mutiny, when Sp. Furius, Quintius Servilius the second time, Lucius Mucius the third time, P. Clælius, M. Horatius and L. Geganus were Tribuns Military with Consuls authority. The matter and cause of which sedition and broils, were the debts above specified. For the due inquisition whereof, and to know to what times they amounted, Sp. Servilius Priscus, and Clælius Stentus were made Censors, but stopped them they were for doing any thing, by occasion of wars. For first, fearful messengers in all haste brought word, and after, the flight of the Country people confirmed it, that the legions of the Volscians were entered into the confines, and fell to spoiling every where the territory about Rome. Note withstanding which fear and foreign terror, so little were the civil disorders appealed, that contrariwise the Tribuns of the Commons extended their power with more violence to hinder the levy of soldiers, until they had indentured and capitated with the Senators, that so long as the wars lasted, no man should either contribute and be charged with any impost, or be sued in any action of debt. When the Com. took hold once of this talent and liberty, the musters were delayed no longer. And after they had levied and enrolled two new legions, it was thought convenient that the legions should be divided, and two armies sent forth into the Volscians Country. So P. Valerius and M. Horatius went on the right hand along the sea coast to Antium. Q. Servilius and L. Geganus on the left hand, by the way of the mountains to Ecetra. But on neither side met they with the enemy. Whereupon they fell to foraging the Country, not here and there in scattering wife, as the Volscians had done, after the manner of robbers, at starts upon advantage taken of their enemies discord, and by stealth for fear of their valour: but being a full power and army of men, and justly provoked to anger, the longer they continued there, the sooner work they made. For the Volscians standing in fear, left in the mean while they should be encountered with a power from Rome, had made roads only into the utmost frontiers: But contrariwise, the Romans made stay in the enemies land, the rather to train them forth and draw them to a field-fight. Having therefore burned up, in a manner, all the uplandish houses and granges, and some villages also, and left behind them no fruitful tree standing, nor the sown corn for hope of grain, and driven away whole booties of men, women, and cattle, which they could light on without the walls, they reduced their armies of both sides home again to Rome. In this mean while the debtors had some little lespit to breathe themselves in. But so soon as all was quiet from enemies abroad, they began a fresh to be sued and troubled by their creditors at home. And so small hope they had to be released of their old usury, that they fell into a new, by reason of a contribution collected toward a wall, which the Censors had set out to be made of square Ashler stone. To yield unto this imposition and burden, the Commons were driven, because there was no muster for the Tribuns of the Commons to hinder. Forced they were likewise through the might and power of the great men, to admit for Tribuns Military, all of the Nobility, to wit, L. Emilius, P. Valerius the fourth time, C. Fictorius, Servilius Sulpitius, L. and C. Quintius Cincinatus.

By the same hand also they prevailed so much, that without impeachment of any man, all the younger sort took the military oath, so that they levied three armies against the Latins and Volscians: who joining their legions together, had encamped themselves at Satricum. One army was gathered for the defence of the City: another to be set out against all sudden wars, if haply elsewhere some tumult should arise: & a third, of all other the strongest, was under the conduct of P. Valerius, and L. Emilius, led to Satricum. Where, finding the enemies embattled in good array upon a plain & even ground, they charged upon them presently. But ere that they had got the victory evidently in sight, and were but only in some good hope of having a fair day of their enemies, the rain so poured down with huge storms and tempests, that it parted both hosts asunder. The morrow after began a fresh conflict. And for a good while, the legions of the Latins especially, which by long alliance with the Romans had learned their manner of warfare, stood to it as valiantly, and sped as fortunately as the Romans. At length, the Roman horsemen that rode in amongst them, brake their ranks: and when they were once disarrayed, the footmen displayed their ensigns, and advanced upon them: and look how much the Romans battel set forward, so much the enemies gave backward. But when they began once to faint in their fight, then the violence of the Romans was insupportable. Thus the enemies were discomfited and scattered: and flying nor toward their camp, but to Satricum, which was two miles off, they were by the horsemen especially beaten down, trod under foot and slain. Their tents were taken and rifled. From Satricum they dislodged, the next night after the battel was fought and marched in great haste (as if they fled) to Antium. And albeit the Roman army followed them by the tracks hard at heels, yet their footmanship served them better in their fear, than it did the Romans, for all their anger. So the enemies put themselves within the town walls, before the Romans could overtake them, and either cut off the tail of their rearward, or force them to stay. After this, some days were spent in waiting the Country. For neither were the Romans sufficiently provided with warlike engines of battery and artillery to assail their walls, nor they well appointed to abide battel in plain field. Then arose some discord within the town, between the Latins and the Antians. The

A Antians, of one side wearied with calamities that follow long wars, wherewith all their life time they had been exercised even to their old age, were of mind to yield. The Latins by reason of their late revolt and rebellion (whiles after long peace, their courages continued yet fresh) were more forward and earnest to maintain wars still. But when they saw on both sides that they might do as they purposed, and follow their own designments, without being hindered one of another, their strife was soon ended. So the Latins leaving their fellowship & society of peace, so unhoneft & dishonourable (as they thought it) departed from them, and stood out still to revenge their own quarrels. But the Antians being well rid of these Counsellors of theirs, so cross unto all wholesome courses, tending to their good and safety, yielded up their town and country to the Romans. But the anger and furious rage of the Latins, for that they could neither annoy the Romans by wars, nor keep the Volscians still in arms, brake out thus far, that they fired the City Satricum, which had been the first place of refuge, after their defeat and unhappy flight. Neither left they any house in that City standing, but set fire upon all indifferently, as well profane as holy edifices: only the Church of Dame Marya they spared. From which, it was neither any religion and conscience of their own, nor fear of the gods that kept them, but (as men report) a fearful voice heard out of the Temple with heavy threats, unless they held their hands, and kept them far enough from burning the sacred habitations so impiously. In this rage and mad fit of theirs, to Tusculum they go: for very spite that they forsaking the general council of the Latins, had not only yielded themselves to be in league with the Romans, but also became incorporate Citizens with them. And coming upon them on a sudden, while their gates were open, at the first shot the whole Town, all but the Castle, was surprized. The Townsmen with their Wives and Children were thither fled: and sent messengers to Rome with certificat to the Senat of this sudden and unlooked for accident. And with all speed (as appertained to the fidelity of the people of Rome) an army was led to Tusculum: whereof L. Quintius and Servilius Sulpitius, had the conduct. At Tusculum they found the gates fast shut against them, and the Latins, as men both besieging and besieged. And whiles of the one side they intended the defence of the walls, on the other side assaulted the Castle, at one time they were afraid themselves, and put others in fear likewise. But the coming of the Romans wrought a great change and alteration in the hearts of both parties. For it caused the Tusculans of fearful men to become exceeding cheerful: and the Latins who made full reckoning to win the fortrels out of hand, as being matters already of the town, had but small hope now to help and save themselves. The Tusculans they set up a great shout from the Castle: and answered it was again with a greater from the Roman army. The Latins were put to it hard on both sides: For neither were they able to abide the violence of the Tusculans running down the hill upon them, nor to put by and keep off the Romans, coming had under the walls, and assaying to break the bars of the gates. First, they scaled the walls and got upon them: after, they brake the port-cullis down. Thus the Latins environed with enemies both before and behind, that pressed sore upon them, having neither strength enough left to fight, nor room of ground to make an escape, were slain in the midst between the enemies, every mothers son. So when Tusculum was recovered out of the enemies hands, the army was brought back again to Rome.

But the more quietness there was that year without the City by reason of prosperous wars, the more encreased the violence and hard dealing of the Senators within: and the calamities of the Commons grew every day more than other. For they wanted means and were not able to pay for the interest that needs must be paid. When nothing therefore was to be had, to make payment out of their goods, they were adjudged and awarded to satisfy their creditors in their body and name: and so their punishment served in stead of keeping their credit and discharging the consideration. Whereupon, not only the meanness of the Commons, but also the very chief, began now to let fall their hearts and stoop so low, that there was not a witty and nimble headed man and of experience amongst them, that would put himself forth to stand to be a Tribun Military, in concurrence with the Nobles, (which they had so earnestly shot at and laboured for) nor so much as to bear and sie for any offices of the Commons, so as the Senators now, seemed to have recovered again for ever to themselves, the possession of that dignity, which the Commons of late, for some few years, had usurped and occupied over their heads. But that this order side might not joy too much hereat, a small occurrent hapned between which (as it falleth out most commonly) gave the occasion and first footing to an enterprize of much importance.

M. Fabius Ambustus a great and mighty man, as well amongst those of his own calling, as also with the Commons (whom he was reputed never to despise, as other did of his condition and estate) had two daughters married forth: the elder unto Servilius Sulpitius: the younger unto C. Licinius Stolo, a man verily of good worth and re-ckoning, but yet a Commoner. And Fabius disdaining not this alliance and affinity, was himself much love and favour among the Commons. Now it fell out so, that these sisters were upon a time together in the house of Servilius Sulpitius, then Trib. Military: and as they passed the time away (as the manner is) in much good talk, discussing one with another of many matters, it chanced that a Sergeant or Verger of Sulpitius, at what time as he was coming home from the Forum or Common hall, rapped as the order was, with his rod at the door. When the younger Fabius not acquainted with those fashions was therat somewhat amazed, hee after making a wonder at her ignorance, laught her to scorn. But that laughter (as womens minds got wor, are soon kindled with a little) set her a work & hammered in her head,

Besides, the train of many that came about her, waiting and giving attendance, ready to know her pleasure and what she would, mended the matter much. I suppose the thought her sister happily wedded, and repented her own marriage; upon an ill and fitter judgment, whereby every man repined that his neighbor and nearest of kin especially, should go beyond him and do better than he. Upon this discontentment and fresh heart-burning of hers, her father haply seeing her dimaid, asked her whether all was well at home? But when she would have turned the cause of her grief another way, (for that it stood neither with her love and kindness towards her sister, to envy her another way; nor with the reverent honor that she was to yield unto her husband, to find fault with estate; nor yet with mild questioning came about her so, that he drew from her the truth: so as she confessed her grief to arise upon this, that she was disparaged; and namely, married not according to her quality, but into an house incapable both of worship and favour. Then Ambulius, comforting his daughter, wished her to be of good cheer, and said, That ere it were long, the Commons, favoring his daughter, would see the same advancement and dignity at home, which she had seen already in her sister's house. Hereupon began he to plot with his son in law, joyning also unto them, L. Sextius, a stout young man, and one that was like enough to come to preferment, but that he was not of noble race. Good occasion and opportunity they seemed to have of compassing some alteration in the State, by reason of the excessive debts that men were grown into: for the redressing and easing of which malady, the Com. had no other hope, but in advancing some of themselves into the sovereign room of government. They thought it needful therefore, presently to address themselves to the execution of these designs, considering that by endeavor and industry, the Commons were climbed to that degree already, from whence if they would enforce and put themselves forward, they had but one step more unto the highest, and might be equal with the Nobles, as well in honour as in virtue and prowess. And for the present, it was thought good to make them, two Trib. of the Com. in which office they might open a way unto themselves, for other dignities. So C. Licinius and L. Sex. proposed laws, all tending to abate the power and might of the Nobles, and wholly for the good and benefit of the Com. One, as touching taking order for debts: That when so much was default and deducted out of the principal, as had been paid for the use and interest, the residue should be discharged by even portions in 3 years. A second, concerning a proportion and quantity of lands, That no man might hold in possession above 500. acres. The third, That from thenceforth there should be no election of Trib. Military, but of Coss. provided always, that one of them be chosen out of the Com. Matters all of right great weight and consequence, and such as without exceeding strife and contention, could not possibly be carried and obtained. When all these things at once lay a bleeding, and were in hazard to be lost, which the whole world unmeasurably coveteth and longeth after, to wit, land, money, and promotions: the Senators were put in a bodily fear, and began to startle. And laying their heads together both in public consultation and private conference, they could devise no other remedy, but that which in many commotions already they had tried, namely, the stepping between them and negative voice of some of the Tribuns. And so, to cross those bills aforesaid put up by themselves, they had wrought and made to their purpose certain of their own brotherhood. Who so soon as they saw the wards and tribes called forth by Licinius and Sextius, to give their suffrages, being well backed and guarded with the assistance of the Senators, would suffer neither those laws to be read, nor any other besides (as yearly they used) to pass by the voices of the Commons. Thus the two Tribuns aforesaid, having oftentimes (but ever in vain) assembled the people together, and seeing their laws still suppressed, as it were, in the head for ever going forward; "It is well," quoth Sextius, and since ye like so well that these inhibitions may prevail so much: "we will likewise defend the Commons with the same weapon and no other. Go to now my Masters of the Nobility, proclaim an election for the creation of Trib. Military: I will make it row, that this word [* Peto] shall do you selves no good at all: howsoever now ye take so great pleasure to hear our brethren keep that note still, and evermore ring that sweet conceit of "muck. And surely, those threats proved indeed to good earnest and took effect. For there was no election at all but of Adiles and Tribuns, and those both of the Commons. For Licinius and Sextius being chosen Tribuns again, suffered no Magistrates of the Chair, or of State, to be created. Which defect and delation of sovereign Magistracy continued in the City for the space of five years: whilst the Commons for their part chose the same two Tribuns still, and they again ever laid a bar and put in a caveat against the election of Tribuns Military.

All other wars, as good hap was, were asleep for the time. The Colonies only of Peltre, upon so long rest and quietness began to be lusty and wax wanton: and for that there was no army of the Romans stirring abroad, they not only made inroads sundry times into the territory of Roms, but also assailed the town Tusculum. And when the Tusculans, the ancient Allies and new enfranchised Citizens of Rome craved help, the Senators and Commons both, were moved especially for very fame to succour them. And the Tribuns of the Commons yielded at length, and permitted an assembly for election, to be holden by an Inter-regent: and Trib. Military there were created, L. Furius, A. Manlius, Ser. Sulpicius, Ser. Cornelius, A. and C. Valerius. Who found not the Commons so tractable in the mustering, as they were pliable in giving their voices at the Election. Yet after much ado & great contention they levied an army, and set forward on their journey: drove the enemies not from Tusculum only, but forced them within their own walls besieged Peltre more straightly a great deal, and in more forcible manner, than Tusculum had been by them.

Howbeit

A Howbeit, they that began the siege were not able to win the town. For, before that time, were new Tribuns Military chosen, Q. Servilius, C. Varrinus, A. and M. Cornelius, Q. Quintus, M. Fabius. Neither performed these Tribuns any notable exploit at Peltre. But the State at home fell in more dangerous terms than before. For besides that Sextius and Licinius, the publishers of those laws aforesaid, were now the eighth time made Trib. of the Commons again, F. Abius also a Trib. Military, Sto his wives father, was seen openly in the action, to set forward and persuade for the same laws, which in very deed himself had devised. And whereas at the first, eight of the College or Company of the Tribuns of the Commons, had crossed the proceeding of them: now there were but five left that shewed themselves, and those (as commonly they use to do that disband from their own faction) like men bereaved of their wits and amazed, being indeed the tongues and thinks that others spake by, pretended and made allegations in their prohibition, only as they were schooled and taught their lessons at home: (to wit) That a great sort of the Commons were in the army at Peltre and absent, and that the solemn Session or Assembly for enacting laws, ought to be adjourned until the return home of the soldiers: to the end that all the Commons generally, might give their voices concerning their own commodity and benefit. Sextius and Licinius with part of their brethren Tribuns, and M. Fabius one of the Tribuns Military, being their own craftsmasters, knew well enough by so many years experience, how to manage and handle the minds of the Commons: and plied the chief of the Senators (produced forth before the people) so hard with interrogatories of every particular that was proposed, that they wearied and tired them out: Demanding, how they could require to be allowed themselves to possess more than 500. acres a man; whereas the Commons had but two a piece divided amongst them? Whether that every one of them might in equity hold the lands, well neer, of 300. Citizens: and a Commoner to have hardly ground enough for to build him a necessary house upon, and to serve for a place to bury his dead? Also, whether their will and pleasure was, that the Commons oppressed with usury, should yield their bodies to bear irons and suffer torment, unless they paid the interest before the principal? And that daily by whom companies they should be had away from the bar, condemned to thralldom, and Noble mens houses to become goals, filled and pestered with prisoners? And wherefoever a Patrician dwelt, there should be a private prison? These indignities and piteous matters as he heard, when they had with a loud voice charged upon them even before those that were afraid of the like measure themselves; with more indignation and disdain of all that heard them, than they themselves shewed in the uttering and delivery: "But these Senators say they (and that they redoubled) will never make an end either of getting more land still into their hands, or spoiling and undoing the Commons with usury, until the Commons make once out of their body one Consul, for to be the maintainer and protector of their liberty. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, they were now just nothing let by: as who by their privilege of Inhibitions and negative voices, spoiled themselves and overthrew their own power. And never will there be any indifferent and equal course taken, so long as the Nobles keep the sovereign place of command, and the sword to strike whiles the poor Commons have only the buckler hand to ward all venues. For unless the government be parted between both alike, the Commons shall never have their due and equal portion in the Commonwealth. Neither is it reason that any man should stand contented with this only, that in the Election of Consuls, the Commons are eligible and capable of the dignity: for in case, it be not concluded absolutely, that one Consul at the least should be of necessity a Commoner, there will never be any at all. Have ye forgotten already (say they) that notwithstanding an Act made, That there should be Tribuns Military created rather than Consuls, for this intent that Commoners might aspire and reach unto the chief place of honor; yet for all that in 44. years space, there was not so much as one of the Commons chosen Trib. Military? And will any man believe that they will of their own accord conier upon the Commons (when otherwise they may chuse) that dignity in the disposing of two places, who were ever wont in the making of Tribuns Military, to take up eight rooms all wholly to themselves? And will they allow them a way unto the Consulship, who thus long have held the (Consular) Tribunship so guarded, as no man might have access thither but themselves? Nay, it must be got by a positive law, which in their Assemblies for Election, by favour and grace might not be obtained. One of the Consuls rooms must be set aside, past all peradventure and question, and that for a Commoner, to enter into: For as much as if it stand still upon a choice, the mightier man will ever go away with the game clear. And whereas heretofore they have been wont to alledge and say, That the Commons are not sufficient and able men to bear the offices of the chair and of state: that, now cannot be truly objected. For was the Commonwealth I pray you more slackly and negligently governed upon the (Consular) Tribunship of P. Licinius Calpurnius (who was the first Commoner that ever was made Trib. Military) than it was ruled for those years space, in which there was not a Trib. Military but of the Nobility? Nay, on the contrary side it will be justified that some of the Nobles were condemned after they were out of their Tribunship, and not one of the Commoners. And whereas not many years past, we began to make Quæstors or Treasurers out of the Commons, like as we did Tribuns Military, the people of Rome repented never of the choice of any one of them. It remaineth now, that the Commons bear the office of Consuls too; That were a forfeit of their liberty, that were a strength and sure hold to ruin unto. If they were once come and slept to that degree, then may the people of Rome think assuredly and be persuaded

"swaded, that the KK. are banished indeed out of the City, and their freedom fully establish'd for ever to endure. For, from that day forward shall the Commons be partakers of all those things, wherein the Nobles now surpass them: namely, sovereign rule and authority, martial renown, parentage and Nobility: great ornaments doubtless, unto themselves to enjoy here in this life - but far greater to leave behind them unto their Children and Posterity. These and such like Orations when they: law to be plausible, and willingly accepted, they preferred a new Statue, That in stead of the two Dumvirs for holy Ceremonies and matters of the Church, there might be chosen ten Decemvirs: Provided always, that one part of them should be created forth of the Commons, and another from among the Nobles. The Session for enacting of all those Laws, they deferred until the army was returned, which lay then at the siege before Velitæ.

But the year was come about and fully expired, before the legions were reduced home from thence: and by that means the whole business about these new Laws, hung still in suspense, and was put off unto the entrance of the new Tribuns Military. As for the Tribuns of the Commons, the Commonalty chose the same again, even those twain who had been the proposers of those Laws. And the Tribuns Military were these, T. Quintius, Ser. Cornelius, Ser. Sulpitius, Sp. Servilius, L. Papirius, L. Veturius. Presently in the beginning of the year, they put unto the jump and final trial what should become of those Laws. And when as the Tribes were called, and none of the Tribuns Colleges stepped between to stop the proceeding of the Law-givers: the Nobles were afraid, and ran unto their two last helps, to wit, the height and absolute office, and the greatest man among them. They thought it good therefore to create a Dictator. And M. Furius Camillus was nominated, who elected unto him L. Æmilius for General of the horse. The Law-makers likewise for their part, against to great preparation of their adversaries, armed at all parts the cause of the Commons, with stout stomach and courageous heart. And having assembled an Hall of the Commons, they called forth the wardsto give their voices. At what time the Dictator accompanied with a great train of Nobles, full of wrath and menacing frowns, took his place and set him down. And after the matter was canvassed first, by the ordinary conflict of the Tribuns among themselves, whiles some propounded, and others gain-said the Law with their negatives voices: and that by how much in right the prohibition was the stronger, so much it was overweighed in favour and affection both of the Laws and Law-givers: and when the first Tribes had given their voice (* Uirgatus) affirmatively: then Camillus. For as much as (quoth he) O Quirites, ye are ruled now by the will and pleasure, and not by the authority of the Tribuns, and as in times past ye obtained the privilege of a negative voice and * Intercession by your departure and Secession, so now ye make it void and nothing worth, even by the same force that ye got it by: I, chosen Dictator as well for your sake as for the whole Common-wealth, will assist your privilege of Intercession and by mine absolute authority maintain this your help and succour, now revered and overthrown. If therefore C. Licinius and L. Sextius, give place unto the negative voice and interceding of their fellows in Office: I will not in a meeting and assembly of the Commons, once intermeddle, nor bring in the authority, of a Magistrate of the Nobles: but if they shall go forward still (notwithstanding all prohibition) to impose and give Laws unto the City, as if it were won by conquest of the enemy, I will not refuse the Tribuns power by their own selves to be defaced and come to nothing. But (all these big words notwithstanding) when the Tribuns of the Commons made but a tufft thereto, and went never the less forward with their enterprise, then Camillus thoroughly angered indeed, sent his Lictors and Sergeants to command the Commons to avoid the place and depart: Threatening withal, that if they proceeded thus, he would take a Military oath of all the younger people, and lead an army presently forth of the City. This put the Commons in a very great fright, but let their Captains and Ring-leaders, rather in a greater heat of contention, than abated their courages one jot. And when he saw no relenting on either side, he gave up his office: Whether it were that there was some error in his creation (as some have written) or because the Tribuns of the Commons had put up a bill to the Commons, and they granted it: that if M. Furius (as Dictator) had proceeded to any action, he should have a round fine set on his head of 500000 * Aſſes. I know not certainly, but I believe that he was terrified upon some unlucky signs of the birds, rather then with any such strange Act never heard of before, and without precedent. And hereunto am I induced, both in regard of the disposition of the man so well given and of so good conscience, and also for that P. Manlius was Dictator the next year following, doubtless, he would never for shame have resumed that office, wherein the year before he had received the foil and disgrace, to be so overruled. Over and besides, at the same time when as this bill was supposed to have been preferred, concerning his fine, either he might have withstood it too, (whereby he saw himself to be bridled) or else he had not been able to have hindered so much as those, for which this also was propounded. Finally, it was never seen to this day wherein we live, so long as the Tribuns and Consuls with their factions and parts-taking have been at variance and debate with all their might and main, but evermore the authority of the Dictator controlled them all, and put them down.

Between the former Dictatorship of Camillus now resigned up, and the new by Manlius accepted

And begun, there was an assembly of the Commons summoned by the Tribuns, in time as it were of a vacancy or Interregnum: wherein the overture was made and evidently it was seen, which of the laws propoſed the Commons liked better, and which the Law-givers. For those that concerned duty and land, they granted to pass, but that other of a Commoner to be Consul, they denied and dashed quite. And surely both matters had been dispatched fully and established at once; but that the Tribuns bid directly, that they required the Commons, to give their voices and speak to all three directly together. After this, P. Manlius the Dictator favoured somewhat, and helped the cause of the Commons, by nominating out of the Commons for his General of horsemen, C. Licinius, who had been a Tribun Military before time. The Senators bitom hereat, as I find in records. And the Dictator was wont to exult the matter unto them, alleging for himself the near affinity and kindred that was between him and Licinius: saying also, that the dignity of the General of horsemen was no greater then of a Tribun Consul. Now when the election day was published for the Tribuns of the Commons, Licinius and Sextius so demeaned themselves, that by pretending that they would not any longer now continue in the office, they set the Commons on to be most earnest and hotly bent for that, which they under colour of refusal, desired and sought for. They seemed, forsooth, to alledge and say, "That for these nine years they had stood, as it were, in battel array, and affronted the States and Nobles of the City, to the right great peril of themselves in privat, and to no good effect at all in publick: and now together with them, both the laws propoſed, and the whole strength of the Tribuns authority, were waxed old and decayed. At the first their Laws were crossed by the interceding of their brethren Tribuns: afterwards by packing away the youth of the City to the Velitæ war: and last of all, the Dictators lightning flashed in their faces, and their thunderbolts forth against them. "Now (say they) neither their fellow Tribuns withstood them, nor forraign was hindered them, nor yet the Dictator himself, as who for his part hath given a good fore-tokening and preface of a Consul Commoner, in electing his General of horsemen out of the Commons. The very Commons and none else, are they that hurt themselves, and delay their own goods. Who might presently if they would, have their City, their common Hall, and place of assemblies freed from these Creditors: yea, and their grounds recovered again from the unjust Land-lord: Which benefits and liberties, when are they like to weigh and esteem with thankful minds accordingly, if in the very time that they are accepted the Laws devised for their own wealth and good, they cut off all hope of promotion and honour, from the publishers and proposers thereof? For it standeth not with the modesty of the people of Rome, to require to be eased themselves of liberty, and to be set in possession again of the land, wrongfully withheld from them by the mighty men: and then to leave the old Trib, by whose means they have come by those good commodities, to shift for themselves, not only without honor, but also without all hope of honor. Let them therefore first down with themselves, and resolve, what they are minded to do: and afterwards in the election of Trib, declare the same openly. If they would be willing to speak affirmatively to those Laws, all jointly as they were propounded, then there were some reason to chide the lame Trib again: and then would they enact & establish finally that which they had published. But in case their wil was to accept of that and no more than which served each privat man turn then there was small need, or none at all to have them fill in office, with the envy and grudging of so many. And to be short, neither would they accept of the Tribunship any longer, neither should the Commons have those Laws ratified, which were already granted. When as all the rest of the Senators were struck into their dumps and blank, for the very indignity to themselves thus go: As the last, one Appius Claudius Crassus (the nephew or son of that notorious Appius the Decemvir) upon a malicious mind and fell stomach, as it is reported, rather then for any hope he had to disavow the matter, stood up, and to this effect answered that so stout and peremptory speech of the Tribuns, in this manner, "It can be no strange matter to me, nor unlooked for, O Quirites, if that which hath been the only thing at all times objected by feditious Tribuns against our house, I also should hear at this present: to wit, that the whole name and lineage of Claudius have ever from the first beginning, regarded nothing more in the Common-wealth, than the Majesty and honor of the Senators and the Nobles, and always set and opposed themselves against the good and well-fare of the Commons. Of which two challenges, the one I neither can, nor will deny and disavow: namely, that we, since the first time that we were enfranchised Citizens, and therewith at once taken into the number of Senators, have endeavoured and strained our selves, that it might be said and that truly, that the honor and dignity of that state and degree into which it was your good pleasure we should be incorporate, and graced with, was by us augmented, rather then impaired. And as for the other challenge, this I dare be bold, in mine own behalf, and in the name of my ancestors and progenitors, to aver, O Quirites, that (unless a man would think whatsoever is done for the Weal-publick generally, is directly against the Commons, as if they were meer aliens of another City) we to our knowledge have practised nothing, writing and willing, either whiles we lived privat, or during the time we bare office, prejudicial to the commonalty: and that neither in deed nor word, we can be justly charged to have wrought and contrived any thing contrary to your good: although peradventure somewhat hath fallen out cross against your will and mind. But were I not a Claudius, and of that family, nor descended of noble blood, but some one of the Burgeſſes or Citizens: and knew my self to be but free born, staid not there. For, by reason that the Nobles denied to approve & give assent thereto, the matter was like to grow unto a Seccession and general departure of the Commons, yea, and to other fearful terms and perilous threats of civil wars and intestine troubles. Howbeit, by means of the Dictator, the flames were quenched and the discords appeased, upon these capitulations. Imprimis, that the Nobility should accord unto the Commons, to have one Consul from among themselves, Item, that the common people should be content that the Nobles might out of the l. artium create a Pretor or Lord chief Justice for ever and determiner in causes within the City. Thus when after long anger the two states of the City were grown to unity and concord, the Senat thinking it a worthy matter (& good cause they had verily as every time before) willingly determined, for the honour of the immortal gods, to set out those most lately [Roman] plays. And whereas before they had continued but three daies, to add one more, and to celebrate them full four. And when the Ediles of the Commons refused that charge & excused themselves, the younger Gentlemen of the Nobility cried all with one voice, That they would most gladly do that service and honor to the immortal gods, so as they might be made Ediles for that purpose. Thanked they were generally of all hands; and the Senat made a decree, That the Dictator should propound to the people, that two men of the Nobility might be Ediles, and that in all the Assemblies and Elections for that year, whatsoever passed, should be ratified by the sovereign assent of the Senators.

The Seventh Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Seventh Book.

TWO new officers of State, to wit, the Pretorship and Adileship of the Chair: were adjoined to the rest. The City was sore visited with the pestilence: which was more noted by reason of Furius Camillus who died therein. The remedy and end whereof, whilst they sought to procure by bringing in new and strange Religions, at length they devised stage-plays, which then first were set forth. M. Pomponius a Tribune of the Commons, arrested L. Manlius for his exceeding rigour in taking muster of souldiers: and for confining and hardly intreating his own son, T. Manlius, for no crime but his famous offence. And the young man himself, whose confining and misusage was laid unto his father's charge, entered the bed-chamber of the said Tribune, drew his Skee and forced him to swear unto him, that he would let fall his suit and proceed no further. Then all mischiefs intended, were laid apart and had an end. Curtius armed at all pieces, mounted upon a Courser, rode headlong into the wide gaping chink or gulf within the City of Rome, and so it presently filled up again. The same young Manlius who had freed his father from the troubles of the Tribune, entered into combat with a French-man, that challenged any one of the Roman Souldiers to single fight, slew him: took from him his collar of Gold, which he wore about his neck afterwards himself, and thereof was called Torquatus. Two Tribes more were added, Pontina and Publicia. Licinius Stolo was condemned by a Law of his own making, because he held in possession more then five hundred Acres of ground. M. Valerius a Colonel of one thousand foot, killed a Gaul, who challenged him to fight: and that, by the means and help of a Raven that settled upon his Merion, and with talons and bill annoyed his enemy, and thereupon was named Corvinus. For which vertue and valorous Act, he was the year next following created Consul, being not full three and twenty years old. Amity was concluded with the Carthaginians. The Campanians being warred upon by the Samnites, craved aid of the Senat against them: and when they could not speed, yielded their City and Territory to the people of Rome, whereupon it was thought good, seeing both they and theirs, were now become propriety to the people of Rome, that they should be defended. A force of arms against the Samnites. When A. Cornelius the Consul, had led his host into a place of disadvantage and was in great peril, he was by the industrious service of P. Decius a Colonel saved: who having gained the hill top, which commanded the ridge, whereon the Samnites lay encamped, gave the Consul opportunity to escape and pass into a plain ground: and himself, notwithstanding he was enveloped by the enemy, brake through them, and gat away. The Roman souldiers left in garrison at Capua, having been confpired to keep the City to their own behoof, were detected and their plot disclosed: and for fear of punishment, revolted from the people of Rome contrary to their allegiance: but by the policy and wisdom of M. Corvinus, they were reclaimed from their outrage, and restored again to their country. Moreover, this book containeth the fortunate wars against the Hermicks, Gauls, Tyburs, Privernats, Targuinians, Samnites, and Volscians.

The seventh Book of T. Livius.

Here enueth a year of especial note and mark, for the Consulship of a man newly risen: also for two new offices, the Pretorship and Adileship of the Chair. Both which dignities, they of the Nobility purchased to themselves in lieu of granting to the Commons one place of the two Consuls. The Commons bestowed the Consulship upon L. Sextius for his good service, in propounding the law, whereby that promotion was first obtained. The Nobles conferred the Pretorship upon Sp. Furius Camillus the son of Marcus: and the Adileship upon Cn. Quintus Capniculus; and P. Cornelius Scipio, personages of their own order and degree: So gratus were they with the people in Marshfield. L. Sextius had companion with him in government, L. Amilius Mamercus one of the Senators. In the beginning of the year, much debate there was and hard hold, both as well about the Gauls who at the first ranged abroad over all Apulia, and were now (as the report went) gathered together: as also concerning the Rebellion of the Hermicks. But all matters being put off for purpose, until a further time, because nothing should be done by this new Consul a Commoner, all things were still and quiet, as it had been vacation or Non-term: this only excepted, that the Tribuns muttered and could not endure with patience, that for one Consul of the Commons, the Nobility had got to themselves three Magistrates, all of the Patritii, sitting like Consuls, with their purpled and purpled long Robes in Ivory chairs of estate, And as for the Pretor besides, as L. chief Justice to hear and decide causes, he was fellow with the Consuls, and with the same Auspices and authority created. Hereupon the Senat was abashed to be infant and to enforce that Adiles of the chair should be chosen out of the Nobility. And first it was agreed amongst them, that every second year they should be elected forth of the Commons: Afterwards, indifferently one with another in common, without that regard. Now when L. Genucius and Q. Servilius were Coll, and all at good rest for any home-edition or forrain war: behold, left they should at any time be void of care and danger, there began a great plague: In which died, as men say, one Centor, one Adile Curule, three Tribuns of the Commons: besides, many a dead corps from among the multitude, was carried forth, proportionable to the rest. But above all, the bitter death of Camillus and much lamented (notwithstanding the long and goodly time he had in this life) caused this pestilence to be much spoken of and remembered. For he was (in truth) the only person in all fortune both of prosperity and adversity, as well in peace as war: a rare and singular man before his banishment, and during the same more famous and renowned: either in regard that the City had a mis of him, and being taken by the enemy in his absence sought unto him for his help; or in respect of his hap-pines, in that together with his own restitution home, he therewith restored his natural country. And after this, for 25 years space (for so long he lived afterwards) he bare him self answerable to the title of forgot glory: accounted worthy to be surname and reputed a second founder after Romulus, of the City of Rome. All this year long and the next which followed, when T. Sulpitius E. Peisicor, and C. Licinius Stolo were Consuls, the sickness continued. By reason whereof, nothing was done worth remembrance, but that for to obtain the mercy and grace of the Gods, there was a Lectistern solemnized, which was the third since the City was first founded. But when by no device of man, nor help of the Gods, the violence of the sickness abated; their minds and consciences were so possessed with superstition, that among other pacifications and appeasings of the heavenly ire, the stage-plays (a strange and new device for a warlike and martial people, who afore time used only to behold the solemne games and feats of strength and activity, in the great Lils or Race called Circus) were (as men say) first begun and ordained. But (as all beginnings lightly are) a small thing (God wot) it was at first: without long and metre, without gesture and action furbled unto long and verse, and the same also mere outlandish. For the players, who were first for out of Hetruria, as they danced the measures to the minstrel and sound of flute, gestured not undecently withal, after the Tuscan fashion. But in procees of time the youth began to imitate and counterfeit them, jelling pleasantly besides one with another, and singing in rude rimes and disordered metre: and their gesture was forcing with their jests and ditties. Thus was this thing first taken up, and thus with much use and often exercise, practised. And hereupon our own Country Actors and artificial professors of this feat, were called Hiistriones, of Histr a Tuscan word, which signifieth a player or dancer. But theie uttered not (as they used afore time) in their turns one after another, disordered, and rude verses, like to the loose and bawdy Peseccion rimes: but went through and rehearsed out, whole Sayes, full of musical measures, with a set concert of long allo, to the instrument of the minstrel, and with gesture agreeable thereto. Certain years after, Livius, who was the first that after the use of Sayes, ventured to there forth an Enterlude, of some one argument and uniform matter, is reported to have been himself (as they were all no doubt in those daies) the Author and Actor both, of his own verses and songs: But being so often called on by the people to play, that he became hoarse again, and lost his voyce, he gat leave to set a boy to sing before the minstrels. And so being silent him self, he acted the song with more agility and nimbleness of motion a good deal: for, not employing his voyce, he had no hindrance of liberty in gesture. Then began the players to have others to sing, and they themselves used their voyces only in acting their parts in Comedies dialogue.

Consul A2in,

But it returned for that Gentilis being with great preparation and power set forth against the enemies, was entraped by an Ambuscado, his legions upon a sudden tear unlooked for defeated, himself (the Consul) environed round about, and slain by them that wilt not whom they flew. The common tidings being brought to Rome, the Senators were not so penive and sorrowful for the common calamity, as they fumed and took on most insolently, for this unhappy expedition and conduct of the Commoner Consul; and muttered in all places these and such like speeches: "Now let them go and create Consuls again out of the commonalty, and translate the Aspicia whither they ought not. What? Because the Senators by an Act of the Commons, might be defeated and dispossessed of their dignities, could so insauicate and irreigious a law, prevail likewise against the Gods immortal? Who now themselves have taken the matter into their own hands, and maintained their power, their title and Auspices: which were not so soon meddled withal, and polluted by one that had no right thereto, nor lawful title; but both the whole army, and Captain also, were vanquished and overthrowen; to teach them for ever hereafter, how they make their solemn Elections of Magistrats confidently, without regard of the rights and royalties of noble houses. Their speeches both Council-House and common place rung again withal, So the Consul Servilius with consent of the Nobles, named for Dictator Appius Claudius, who had sometime in an Oration before the whole assembly of the Commons dissuaded the proceeding of that law; and now with greater authority blamed the mishap of that council, which was by him disliked and reprov'd. A muster was proclaimed, and a publick Vacation. But before that the Dictator and these new enrolled legions were gone as far as the Hernicks confines, the other army under the leading of C. Scipio the Lieutenant, by occasion of an occurrent that fell out there, got a good hand against their enemies. For when as upon the death of the Consul, the Hernicks advanced in scornful and contemptuous manner, cloe under the camp of the Romans, with a full hope to be masters of the fame; behold, what with the exhortation of the Lieutenant, and what for anger and indignity, wherewith the souldiers stomachs were full, they made a fallly out against them. Whereupon the Hernicks came so far forth of their compact, that they had no hope to assail, no, nor approach the rampier; and so in disarray they dismarched and departed. Afterwards by the coming in of the Dictator with a fresh power, the old army was reinforced double. The Dictator in a solemn audience, having praised the Lieutenant and his souldiers for defending their rents so manfully, both encouraged them that heard themselves so highly commended according to their deserts, and also whetted on the rest to perform the like valorous service. The enemies on the other side were nothing slack to prepare themselves to fight again: who in remembrance of the honour they had already won, albeit they were not ignorant that the Romans forces were redoubled, encreased their own power also. For the whole Nation of the Hernicks, even as many as were able to draw sword, were called forth to the wars. Eight cohorts by themselves consisting of four hundred in a band were enrolled, even the most able and choice men of all others. This elect and especial flour of their youth and manhood, they fed with hope and encouraged the more to this service, because they had taken order they should have double pay. Freed they were besides from all other labour and Military toil that being thus reserved to intend the fight and nothing else, they should make reckoning and know, that they were to indeavour and strain themselves above the ordinary carriage of souldiers. Placed also they were in the battel, apart from the other ranks: to the end their valour and manhood might be more seen and marked. Between both camps of the Romans and Hernicks, there was a plain of two miles in length: and there in the mid way in a manner, was the battel fought. First, the fight was doubtful on both sides, whiles the Roman Horsemen charged and recharged again, but ever in vain, to see if they could break their battalions. Thus when the service on Horseback proved less in effect than in attempt, they asked the advice and craved leave of the Dictator: which being granted, they abandoned their Horses, and with a mighty shout, ran forth before the ensignes, and renewed the battel a fresh. Neither could they have been any longer endured, but that those extraordinary bands opposed themselves, and received them with equal might of body and valour of heart. Then was the fight maintained between the brave youth and principal flour of both nations. And look what slaughter there was by common hazard of war, as well of the one side as of the other, the loss was greater for the equality of the persons, than the proportion of the number. For the rest of the souldiers, as if they had shitted from themselves the whole conflict, and beakened to the vanguard only, repoked their own event and hap in the manhood of others. Many a man on both parts was mitted down and dyed in the place, but more were hurt and wounded. "At last, those Horsemen that dismounted, fell to call and rebuke one another asking what hope remained else besides? If neither on horseback they were able to drive the enemies back, nor on foot force them to give ground and remove them, what third kind of service looked they for? Why leave they out so lustily and bravely into the forefront before the ensignes? and fought in the place of others? With these words provoking one another, they pluck up their hearts, and with a fresh shout set foot forward and gave a new charge. First, they compelled the enemies to retreat and lose their standing: then to give more ground: and at length plainly to turn their back and run away. Hard it is to say, being so equally and indifferently matched as they were, what it was that turned the balance and gave the victory: unless it were the perpetual fortune that ever followed both nations, able to advance the spirit and courage of all the way, so far as to their camp: but of the other, The Romans had the Hernicks in chase all the way long, so far as to their camp: but

* A becaufe it was far in the evening, they Raid from affailing it. For by reafon that it was long ere the Dictator could by facrifice gather any fured token of Gods favour; he founded none but the rattle before noon: whereby it continued untill night. The morrow after, were the Hetrurians fled and their camp abandoned: only fome hurt and wounded foldiers were found left behind. But one troop of them that forfook their enignes (when as neer unto their walls and fortis their banners were difcovered, flenderly accompanied, and with few about them) was fattered abroad over the fields, and in great fear (tragled all about, and fhamefully fled away. And yerthis victory of the Romps coft them well the getting on, and fpent fome blood: for they loft a fourth part of their men: and that which was no fmall damage unto them, fome of the Roman Horfemen alfo were B lain.

The next year following, when C. Sulpicius and C. Licinius C. Juv. the Consuls, were gone with a power against the Hernicks, and finding not the enemy abroad in the country, had by force won Forum a Town of theirs: in their return homeward, the Tyburns kept their gates shut against them. And after many complaints and unkindnesses ripped up between them: this last quarrel was it, that moved the Romans by their Heralds (after restitution and amends demanded) to defend lance, and proclaim war against the people of Tybur. That Titus Quintus Pennus was Dictator that year, and Serv. Cornelius Maluginensis General of his Horsemen, it is agreed upon by all authors. Maecius Licinius writeth that he was created for the holding of an assembly for election of Magistrates, and that, by the Consul Licinius: because when his fellow Consul made halt, C. to have the Election before the war, thereby to continue his own Consulship, it was thought good to withhold and meet with his naughty desire in that behalf. But Licinius [Maecius] in usurping to his name and family, that praise and commendation, maketh himself to be of less credit in writing of the rest: especially, seeing that in none of the old records, I find mention of any such matter. Mine own mind giveth me rather, that the Dictator was created because of the Gauls tumultuous war. For certainly that year they encamped themselves three miles from Rome, beyond the bridge of Anio, in the way Salutina. The Dictator having proclaimed a Vacation, to be of their troubles of the Gauls, received the Military oath of all the younger sort: and with a puissant army departed the City, and upon the very bank on this side of Anio pitched his tents. In the mid way between them and the enemies there was a bridge: which they would not break down on either part, lest they should be thought fearful cowards. But about the seizing and gaining of that bridge, first, there was many a skirmish: and judged it could not be, considering the equal forces of both sides, who should be matters of it. Then advanced forward unto the bridge (void of all guards) a mighty tall and big Frenchman, and as long as ever he could set out a throat, maketh this challenge: Now (quoth he) let the bravest gallant that Rome hath, come forth and spare not, to combat if he dare, that the event of us twain may shew whether nation is more valiant and warlike. The brave Knights and youths of Rome, held their peace a good while, both abashed to receive the challenge, and also unwilling to run upon the present hazard of a single fight. Then T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, even he who related his father from the Tribunes troubles, goeth forth of his quarter unto the Dictator. "Without your leave and express commandment (quoth he) O Noble Sovereign, I would never presume to fight out of my rank and standing, no, nor if I should fee assured victory before mine eyes: but if it will please your Excellency to give me licence, I will shew unto that beast yonder (that so proudly and lustily is come forth leaping before the enemies chiefs, and braving as you see) that I am defended of that houle and race, that gave the whole army of the Gauls the foil and tuned them down the Cliff Tarpeia. Then said the Dictator unto him, God blese thee T. Manlius: On forth a Gods Name, in this thy dutiful mind and zeal that thou carriest both to father and Country: Go on I say, and with the help of the Gods, perform the Roman name to be invincible. Then his fellows and companions blode to arme the young Gentleman. A light footman shole he takes unto him, and a Spanish blade by his side, more handsome to fight short and close. Being thus armed and fet out, they bring him forth against this vainglorious Gaul, let all upon joy full foolishly, and (as the ancient writers have thought it worth the noting and remembrance) scornfully lolling and blaring out his tongue. Then the rest departed every man to his own quarter and ward: and the two armed Champions were left in the midst, more like a festival spectacle and pageant to behold, than any fight in field, suiting to the manner, guise, and law of combat, considering they were not equally matched, if a man should judge by the eye and outward view. The one of them of personage mighty and exceeding tall, his coat armour of sundry colours and gay, his harness glittering and all damasked and engraven with gold. The other, a man of middle stature of Soldiers, no great shew of armor, and that rather fit and handsome, than gaudy to behold: without any whooping, singing, and joyous vaunting of himself, without vain-flourishes and shaking of his weapons in the air: but he had a heart full of resolute courage, stomack, and close anger within, relieving all his fierceness and eagerness unto the very combat and tryal of fight. As they stood thus between the two armies, and so many men all about looking on, in doubtful suspense between hope and fear, the Gaul like as he had been a huge mountain aloft over the other, ready to fall upon him, held forth his target with the left hand to bear off the sword of his enemy coming against him, and let drive a down-right blow edgelong, that it rebounded again upon his shield, and did no harm at all. The Roman bearing his own sword with the point upward, and with his shield having [missen the nether part of his enemies target,

A ll these. The same year, the Consuls likewise warred, but with diverse fortune and success. For by C. Plantius, the Hernicks were vanquished and subdued. But his companion Fabius fought valiantly and unadvisedly against the Tarquinians. The loss in the battel received, was not so much, but that the Tarquinians sacrificed three hundred and seven Roman souldiers, whom they took prisoners. This foul and shameful execution, caused the ignominy of the Romans defeat afore. to be much more notable, and talked of abroad. Besides this loss, was the Roman territory much walled (to help the matter withal) by the Privernates, and after them by the Veliterns, who made sudden inroades into the Countrey. The same year also were two more Tribes added, Pompina and Publia. The votive solemn plays or games likewise, which Marcus Furius the Dictator had vowed, were then set forth and performed.

Then and never before was the first law put up to the people by P. Petilius, a Tribune of the Commons, and that by the consent and approbation of the Senators, against the excessive suit and ambitious flandering for dignities. By which law men suppold, that the ambition principally of certain persons new risen and of the first head, who were wont to haunt fairs and places of great resort for that intent, was repressed and kept under. But the year ensuing, when C. Marius and Cn. Marius were Consuls, M. Duellius and M. Mæmilius two Tribuns of the Commons, went through with alaw and gotic ended, which was not so well liked of the Senators, to wit, concerning Utiury, of one in the hundred. But the Commons were so much the more forward an better contented, to grant and accept it. Over and besides those new wars the year before intend-

C, the Falisci were declared new enemies: and that, for two quarrels pretended against them; One, for that their youth had served against the Romans under the Tarquinius: the other, because they had not delivered against those Romans which fled unto Falerii, after their defeat and unlucky flight, notwithstanding the Heralds had made claim unto them and demanded them, This Province fell to Cn. Marius. But Marius had the leading of an army into the Land of the Privernats, which by reason of long peace was unfoiled yet, and in very good state, and thereby enriched his souldiers with good prizes. For, to the plenty and store that there was found, he added his own bounty and liberality: in that he set out nothing for the common Treasury, but favoured the souldiers, and gave them leave to better their own private state. The Privernats lay strongly encamped before their own City: and when he had assembled all his souldiers together:

D "Now (quoth he) I give unto you the enemies camp and their City for a booty, so you "will promise to quit your selves like men, and to be as ready to fight as to spoil. Hereupon, with a great cry they call for the Signal of battel: and so advancing forward and exalting themselves bravely and courageously, with assured hope of victory, to battel they go. There, even before the engins in the vanguard, Sextus Tullius, of whom we spake before, cryed out aloud, Behold, Noble General (quoth he) how thine army performeth their word given unto thee: and therewith laying down his Javelin, with drawn sword confronteth the enemy. Then follow after Tullius, all they that fought in the vanguard before the Standards, and at the first shock put the enemies to flight, followed the chafe and drave them into the Town, And as they were scaling the Walls, the Town was rendred up into their hands. So he triumphed over the Privernats. By the other Consul there was no worthy exploit done, but that as he lay encamped before Surrium, he proposed a law to pass by the Tribes, (a course never taken before, and without example) concerning a twentieth part or vicimeff, to be levied of their goods that were made free. The Lords of the Senat (because by that Act there accrewed no small revenue to the Exchequer, that was now wanted) allowed thereof and gave their assent. But the Tribuns of the Com, moved not so much at the quality of the law in it self, as at the dangerous precedent given, ordained under pain of death, That no man ever after should in making of laws withdraw the people apart: For, if that were once by law permitted, there would be nothing, were it never so pernicious to the people, but it might be enacted by souldiers, that have sworn to their Consuls allegiance, and were at his devotion. The same year was C. Licinius Stolo at the suit of M. Papius Lenas, condemned upon his own statute in * 100000 Asles, for that he together with his son, was possessed of a chouldand acres of Land, and under colour of freeing his son, he had deluded the statute in that case provided.

After this, the two Consuls, M. Fabius Ambulstus the second time, and M. Popilius Lenas the second time made two wars. That which Lenas fought with the Tyburtns was performed with ease and facility. For having driven the enemies into the Town, he foraged their fields. But in the other war, the Falisci and the Tarquiniars, discomfited in the first battle the other Consul. Their greatest fear arose upon this occasion. For, their Priests carrying afore them light burning torches, and snakes besides, went after a lunatick and frantick manner, and with so strange and uncouth a shew terrified and disordered the Roman souldiers. And therewithal, at that very instant the souldiers, as if they had been distracted, besides themselves, and astonished, dismayed fearfully and fumbled upon the munitions and fortifications of their camp: But after, when as the Consul, Lieutenants and Colonels mocked and rared them, for being scared like children with these vain bugbears: for shame suddenly they took heart again, and like bold men ran upon those very same things, that before they had fled from. And so after they had dispatched this vain device and preparation of their enemies, they fell upon the armed men indeed, discomfited their whole army and put them to flight: and being the same day masters of their camp, with a rich booty returned victors, both recounting in their military merry ditties and songs, the foolish preparation of the enemy, and also condemning their own fearfulness. After this, the whole nation of the Tuicans arose, having for their leaders the Tarquinius and the Falisci, and came as far as Salina. Against which fearful danger, was C. Marius Rutilius chosen, the first Dictator that ever was of the Commons: who named for his General of the Horsemen a Commander likewise C. Plantius. But the Senators thought this a shameful indignity, that the Dictatorship also should now be chosen in common: and did all they could possibly to hinder it, that there should be nothing decreed toward the war, nor any preparation made for the Dictator. But to much the sooner, and with more readiness, all that the Dictator proposed, the Commons granted. So he departed from the City, and marched on both sides of the Tiber (transporting his army in boats and planks fastened together) to what place soever he heard the enemies were gone: and surprised many foragers of them, as they wandered and straggled one from another, in the fields. He set upon their camp, and won it: and after that he had taken eight thousand prisoners, and either slain or chased all the rest out of the Roman pale: he triumphed, by the suffrages of the people only, without the approbation and assent of the Senators. And for almost as they would not in any case have an assembly for Election of Consuls, held either by the Dictator a Commander, or by the Consul: and because the other Consul Fabius was busied abroad in the wars, and not returned: therefore, Q. Servilius Hala, M. Fabius, Cn. Manlius, C. Fabius, C. Sulpicius, Interregents one after another, Q. Servilius Hala, of the Nobles. And when the Tribunes in some variance, for that both Consuls were Patritius, of the Nobles. And when the Tribunes interposed themselves, and crossed those proceedings, Fabius the Interregent, alleged a Law out of the twelve tables in these terms, That whatsoever the people ordained or granted last, the same should be good, and stand firm and raised: and in suffrages and voices of the people, were comprised their grant and ordinance. But when the Tribunes, for all their gain saying and stepping between, could prevail no more, but to prorogue the Comices for the Election, there were atween, two of the Nobles created Consuls, C. Sulpicius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola: who the same day they were chosen, entered into their office. Thus in the 400 year after the foundation of the City, and the 35 after it was recovered from the Gauls, the Commons lost the Consulship again, when they had enjoyed it nine years. And two Consuls of the Nobles, upon the Interregent, began to govern, to wit, C. Sulpicius Peticus the third time, and M. Valerius Publicola. The same year was Emphum won from the Tyburins, without any memorable warlike exploit: were it that, under the conduct of both Consuls there jointly together, the war was managed, as some have written: or that about the same time the Tarquinius gained the Tybur. But more also had the Consuls at home, with the Commons and Tribunes, the Consuls thought now, it concerned them in trust and credit, as well as in virtue and valour, that as they, being Patritius both of them, had received the Consulship, so they should make over the same again to twain of the Nobility: and either wholly to give up their interest and title for ever, if to be the Consulship should now become a Commons dignity: or else to keep it wholly in their possession, whereof they were first seized intirely, in right of their ancestors. On the other side, the Commons fumed and stormed in these and such like terms, "What should we live any longer? and why are we accounted citizens? In case, that which was first got by the virtue and power of two only persons, L. Sextius, and C. Licinius, we cannot now all of us together hold and keep? Certainly, better were we to endure the KK, and Decemvirs again, or any other heavier and more fearful name of absolute and Lordly Empire, than to see both Consuls of the Nobility: and that we, may not both rule and obey in turns, but that the one part settled in the place of rule for ever, should think us, the Commons, born for nothing else but to obey and serve. The Tribunes themselves were nothing behind to set forward these troublesome murmurs. But when the people are up once altogether and in commotion, the principal leaders are hardly seen above the rest in the action. And when as they were come down into Mars field (sundry times to assembly, by ever to no purpose and effect, and that many Comitial days of assembly were passed over, only in seditious troubles: at the last, the Commons being overmatched through the stiffness and obduracy of the Consuls, took the matter so grievously to the heart, that when the Tribunes brake forth into these speeches, "Now farewell freedom for ever: now are we driven, not only to forbear coming into Mars field, but also to abandon and forsake the City, taken captive and oppressed by the Lordly rule of the Nobles, and therewithal departed: the Commons with sorrowful cheer did the semblable, and followed after. The Consuls being thus left destitute of one part of the people, yet nevertheless went through with the Election, as few as they were there remaining. And Consuls there were elected of the Nobility both, M. Fabius Ambulustus the third time, and T. Quintius. In some annals or yearly records, I find Coss. M. Papius: in stead of T. Quintius.

In that year, were two wars performed with prosperous success. And the Tyburins were sought withal until they yielded. From them was the City Sassula won by force: and other Towns had tasted of the same fortune, but that the whole Nation laid arms aside, and submitted themselves to the Consul his mercy. He triumphed over the Tyburins: otherwise the conquest was mild and gentle enough, without extremity of execution. But the Tarquinius were cruelly dealt withal: and many a man of them slain in field. Of the prisoners that were taken, whereof

A whereof there was a mighty number, there were 358 of the Noblest and greatest Gentlemen chosen out, and sent to Rome. The rest of the common sort were put to the sword. Neither sped they better at the peoples hands that were sent to Rome. For in the mids of the Forum, were they all beaten with rods and beheaded. This execution made quittance with them, for sacrificing the Romans in the market place of the Tarquinius. This good success in war caused the Samnites also to seek for peace and amity. Their Embassadors were courteously answered by the Senat, and so upon covenants they were received into society. But the Commons sped not so well at home in the City, as abroad in warfare. For albeit the Usury was well eased by bringing it down from twelve to one, in the hundred: yet the poorer people were overcharged with the payment of the very principal, and became bond and thrall to their creditors. Whereby the Commons, in regard of their privat lights, that they were driven unto, never troubled their heads with the making of both Consuls of the Nobles nor with the Assemblies and Elections, nor other publick affairs. Still the two Consulships remained among the Patritius. And created there were Consuls, C. Sulpicius Peticus the fourth time, and M. Valerius Publicola: the second time.

Now when as the City was earnestly amused upon the Tuican war, by reason that the news went, how that the people of Cere, for very pity and compassion, and in regard also of consanguinity, took part with the Tarquinius: behold the Embassadors of the Latins turned them clean against the Volscians. Which Embassadors brought word, that there was an army levied already from thence and in arms, even now upon the point to invade their borders: and would from them enter the territory of Rome, and spoil as they go. The Senat therefore thought good to neglect neither business, and gave direction, that to both places certain legions should be appointed, and the Consuls to call lots for their several Provinces and charges. But afterwards, the greater care was taken for the Tuican war, upon intelligence given by Sulpicius the Consul his letters, whose commission was against Tarquinius, that the country was wasted and spoiled all about the Roman-Salinas, (or Salt-pits) and part of the booties carried away into the confines of the Caritis: and that the youth of that people were doublets employed in the driving of that booty. Whereupon Valerius the Consul, who was opposed against the Volscians, and encamped in the marches of Tuiculus, was called back from thence, and commanded by the Senat to nominate a Dictator, Who named T. Manlius, the son of Lucius, and he taking to him A. Cornelius Cossus for his General of the Horsemen, contenting himself with his Consul's army, by the authority of the Senat, and the peoples suffrages, proclaimed war against the Caritis, and sent them defiance. Then were the Caritis afraid of war indeed, and not afore, as though there had been more force in their enemies bare words, to denounce and signify war, than in their own deeds, who by spoiling and plundering, had provoked the Romans to war. Then saw they plainly that they were overmatched and not able to make their parts good: then repented they that they had made such wast and spoil, cursing the Tarquinius for soliciting them to revolt, not one of them making any preparation of armour or war: but every man labouring what he could, that Embassadors should be sent, to crave pardon for their trespass and offence. When their Embassadors were come to the Senat, they were from thence put over to the people. And then they beought the Gods, whose Sacred Images they had received in the French war and devoutly kept and cherished, That the Romans now in their flourishing estate, would take that pity and compassion of them, which they in times past had of the Romans, in their calamity and hard distress. And turning to the chapels of Vesta, they called upon the Flamins and Vestal Virgins, sometime their guests, whom they so chastly and religiously had received and given intertainment unto, saying in this wise, "Would any man believe we had deserved no better, but thus of a sudden, without cause given, to be reputed enemies? Or suppose we had done somewhat smelling of hostility, would any man impute it rather to deliberat counsel, than to some fit of heat and folly? And that we would blemish and mar our own good deeds, especially conferred and bestowed upon to thankful persons, with new misdeeds and shrewd turns? and chide to make the people of Rome their enemies now in their wealth and flourishing State, and in their most happy felicity of war: whose friendship in their adversity we had embraced? Beleeving them not to term that considerate advice, which rather were to be called force and necessity. For the Tarquinius, say they, passing with a cruel and pusilliant army through our country & requelling nothing but away, had drawn with them some of our rustical Peasants, to assist them only in fetching of that booty, which now so heavily is laid to our charge. Whom if you please to have them yielded, we are ready to deliver them: if to be punished they shall suffer accordingly: most humbly craving, that their City Cere, the very sanctuary of the people of Rome, the harbour and habitation of their Priests, the place of receipt for the Roman sacred images and reliques they would grant unto them safe from the calamity of war, and exempt from the slander thereof: and the rather for the professed Vestal Virgins sake, so kindly interceded, and for the love of the Gods, by them so devoutly honored. The people were moved, not so much with the justice and equity of the present cause, as for their old deserts and good turns to forget rather the harm sustained than the good received. Whereupon, the people of Cere were pardoned, and agreed it was that a truce for one hundred years should be registred among the Acts of the Senat. Then were the forces diverted against the Falisci, who were tainted likewise with the same offence. But the enemies would no where be found, they wasted therefore all over their confines: & forbore to assault their Towns. So they withdrew their legions to Rome. The rest of the year was employed in repairing their walls & Towers: and the Temple of Apollo was dedicated.

Cervinus.

Among other heavy occurrences of that year, Ap. Claudius one of the Consuls, in the very preparation of the wars, departed this life. Whereupon the whole government was devolved up on Camillus. To which sole Consul, either for his quality and worthiness otherwise (not meet to be controlled by the absolute command of a Dictator) or for the lucky preface of his name to fortunate in all the tumultuous wars of the Gauls, the Lords of the Senat thought it not decent and convenient that there should be a Dictator adjoined. The Consuls having ordered and appointed two legions for defence of the City, and parted the other eight with the Pretor L. Furius, being in mind his fathers valour and manhood, undertook the Gauls war himself, without calling lots therefore: commanding the Pretor to keep the sea-coasts, and to put the Greeks back from landing on the shore. He went himself down into the country of Pompitinnus, and because he was not willing to give battell in the champion, unforth thereunto; and thought the enemy might be wearied out well enough by keeping him there, for foraging and fetching in booties, who of necessity was driven to live of prey, chose a convenient place for a standing camp. Where, as they passed the time quietly in their wards, as a felled Garrison: there cometh forth a mighty Gaul in perill tall and beg, for armour brave and glorious: who clattering his shield and spear together, and thereby making flence, gave defiance and challenged by his interpreter the Romans to a combat, man to man. There was one M. Valerius a Collonell of footmen, and a very young man, who thinking himself nothing less worthy of that honour than M. Manlius, having first known the Consul his pleasure, advanced himself forth apart from the rest, armed at all points. But this conflict (as touching the prowells of themen) was less notable than the other, by reason the hand of God came between and took a part. For as the Roman was ready to joyne and cope, behold suddenly a raven teiled upon the crest his of morion, even full in the face of his enimie. Which at the very full, the Collonell took joyfully as a token of good lucke sent from heaven. Afterwards he praised devoutly, that the God or goddesse whosoever, would be favourable and gracious to that augural fowl, to preserve and forsignifie the future event, would be favourable and gracious unto him. And lo, a prelude to be spoken) the bird not only held the place fitt, which it fitt unto him. And lo, as often as the champions buckled and cloied together, mounting up with the light upon, but also, as often as the face of the enimie, with beak and claws both, so long, until Valerius winns made at the sides and the face of the enimie, with beak and claws both, so long, until Valerius killeth him. For the Gaul being affrighted at this so strange & wondrous fight, both his sides dazzled, and his mind was mightily troubled. Then the raven took his flic, flew on high quite out of sight, and his mind was mightily troubled. And so the camp on both sides was quiet hitherto. But after that the Colonele began to rise and disarme the body of the slain enemy, neither could the French keep themselves within their Stations, nor the Romans contin, but run with more speed unto their Conquerour champion. And so about the bodie of the Gaul that lay slayne dead, began some skirmish, and thereof grew a sharp and cruell battell: for now not only the companies of the next quarters, and corps de guard, but also the whole legions on both sides, came abroad and fought. Camillus commanded the soldiery, joyous for the victory of the Collonell, joyous also for the gods, to be favourable and ready to help, for to go to battell: and shewing very often unto them the Collonell, set out bravely and enriched with the spoiles of his enimie, "Follow this brave gentleman, good soldiers (quoth he) and about the dead champion of the Gauls killed their whole troops, and lay them slong. In this fight appeared the help of God and magnificently: and they fought it out with the Gauls, and had no doubtfull conflict & both ous abundance and magnificence (at whole hands but a while before, the nations bordering had craved and begged their aid) to carry with them now so base and broken hearts, as of their own accord, to submit themselves and all they had in the whole world, to the power and devotion of others : were perfwaded now it was a matter of trust and faithfulness, not to abandon and be betrayed, those that thus were reduced under their protection. Neither thought they, that the people of Sammnium could in any equity or colour of Justice, invade that land, or assault that City, which was surrendered and annexed to the imperial State of Rome. Whereupon presently they agreed to dispatch Embassadors unto the Sammnits, who had incharge and commission to make declaration unto them; First, of the Campains petitions: secondly, of the answer of the Senate returned unto them, implying the remembrance of the Sammnits amity: last of all, of the Campains surrender. Then to requell and desire them in regard of their mutual society and friendship, to spare and forbear those, that were their vassals, and not with any hostility to invade that territory, which was become subject to the people of Rome. If by this courteous dealing they could do no good, then, to command the Sammnits in the name of the people and Senate of Rome, to abstain from the City Capua and the country of the Campains. When these Embassadors debated these matters in the Council House of the Sammnits, they returned so stout and arrogant an answer again, not in these terms only, That they would go forward in the war begun, but (that which more was) the rulers coming forth of their Council House, even whilst the Embassadors there stood, called to the captains of the cohorts, and with a loud voice commanded them forthwith to make a rode into the Campain country, for to spoil and fetch booties. This Embassage being returned home again to Rome, the Senators setting aside the care of all other matters, sent their heralds to demand restitution: and for default thereof, after the solemn manner to proclaim open war. Whereupon they decreed with all speed possible to propound this matter to the people: and by the consent of the people, both Coss, with two armies departed the City, Valerius into Campania, Cornelius into Sammnium: and pitched their tents, Valerius at the foot of the hill Gaurus, and the other at Saricula. The Sammn legions presented themselves first to Valerius (for that way they supposed all the forces would be bent) for indignation also, against the Campanians, because they were so ready one while with their own succours, & another while in fending for the aid of others against them. And so soon as they discovered the Romans camp, in all haste (every one for his part) called lustily to their captains for to strike up and found the battell: assuring themselves, and laying plainly, that the Romans should speed as well in fuccouring the Campains, as the Campains had done before them in aiding the Sidicins. Valerius, after he had assuaged the enemies not many daies together, with some light skirmishes, only to make trial of them what they could do, put forth the signal of battell at the last, but first exhorted his soldiers in a short speech in this wise, "That neither this new war nor new enemy should terrifie them: for as much as the far-ther they warred from the City, the more cowardly Nations they were and lesse warlike still: whom they went. That they should not esteem the valour of the Sammnits by the late losses & defeats of the Sidicins or Campains: For whoever they be that contend & fight together, one side or other cannot chuse, but go to the walls. The Campains, doubtlesse, had the overthrow: rather through their own effeminate tenderness, as flowing too much in exccesse and superfluity of pleasures, than by their enemies hardiness and valour. And what were two only fortunate battles of the Sammnits, in so many ages, to be set against so many honourable victories of the people of Rome? Who, from the first foundation of their City, may number more Triumphs well near: than years: who have by war subdued all Nations about them, the Sabines, Hebrus, the Latins, Heinicks, Aequians, Volcians, and Auruncans. And as they ought to go into the field, every man presuming & trusting upon his own manhood and glorious warfare: should they have an eye, and confider, under whose leading and regiment they were to enter into battell. Whether he were a man that in the hearing of his soldiers, could only make goodly and magnificent Orations, fierce in brave words, void of military works: or he who himself knew how to handle his weapon, to advance before the Standards, yea, and to be employed even in the middle of the battell. I would have you (quoth he) my soldiers, to follow my deeds and not my words, and of me to learn, not only discipline, but also good example. I have not by bribing and seditions, nor yet by courting and Orations (usual matters among Noblemen) but by this right hand of mine, attained unto three Consulships, and to the highest honour. The time had been indeed, when a man might have said thus unto me: No marvel, For why? You were a gentleman of noble blood, descended from those that were the deliverers of their country: & in the same year that the City had first a Consul, this house of yours had the Consulship. But now the case is altered, the way unto a Consulship, is as open to you Commoners, as to us of the Nobility. Now is it not the guerdon of birth and gentry, as aforetime: but the reward and recompence of virtue and valour. And therefore my soldiers, shoot at the highest dignities, and aim at sovereignty and honour. And although they that are men, have by the grace and approbation of the gods, given unto me this new addition of surname [Cornelius] yet have not I forgot the antique name of the Publicians, appropriat unto our family. I love and ever will (as always I have done) the Commons of Rome, at all times alike, both abroad in wars, and also at home in peace, as well a private person, as in my offices, were they little, or were they much: whilst I was Tribune, whilst I was Consul: and no changing have I bee throughout all my Consulships, one after another. Now for this present enterprise (which we are about, with the help of God, & in his name, have a call with me for a new and fresh Triumph over the Sammnits. Never was there a General more familiar with his soldiers: as willing as the meanest of them, to lay his hand upon any base offices that that were to be done: yea, and in the very training and exercises of the soldiers, at what time as equally their matters of activity and strength, one with another, gently would he otherwise take the toil, as well as the victory, and ever keep one countenance still: not rejecting or refusing any one whatsoever would offer to match him, or be his mate. For deed, benigne and bounteous to his power, and as occasion required: in his words, no lesse mindfull of the freedom of others, than respective of his own place and dignity: and (than which, there is nothing more popular) look by what virtuous demeanour & carriage of himself, he sought to attain unto honours and promotions, with the time he bare them, and went through with them. Therefore the whole army with incredible cheerfulness accepting this exhortation of their captain, issued forth of the camp into the field. Never was there battell fought more indifferently on both sides. Their hope was like, their forces equal, with full trust and confidence in themselves, and yet without contempt of their enemies. The Sammnits, for to what their courage, presumed upon their fresh and late achieved acts, and their double victory but few daies before. The Romans on the contrary side, stood upon their honour and reputation for the space of four hundred yeas, and their conquests every since the foundation of their City. Yet they were troubled, both the one and the other, to deal with a new and unknown enemy. The manner of their fight shewed what stomachs they carried. For the conflict was such, as for a good while they seemed on neither part to yield one foot. Then the Consul, seeing they could not by mere force be caused to retreat, thought to set a sudden fear among them: and therefore assailed, by sending in the horsemen upon the foremost ensignes, to break their ranks, and put them in disarray. But when he saw, that in so small room of ground they toiled themselves in vain, and could not well manage their troops and corners, nor break in upon the enemies, he rode back again to the van and forefront of the Legions, and dismounted from his back. "Whether are footmen (quoth he) when all is done, must do the deed themselves. Come on then, and as ye behold me (which waysoever I go) by dint of sword to make way and entrance into the enemies battell: so every man for himself, down with him that stands next in his way. Straightwaies shall ye see, that where as now their spears and pikes stand glittering and bent upon us, there will be a wide lane made over their slain carcases. He had not so soon spoken these words, but the horsemen at the Consul's commandment, ran upon both the wings and points, and made way for the footmen to enter the main battell. First and foremost the Consul in person charged the enemy, and whomsoever he hapned to encounter, him he killed in the place. This goodly fight set the rest on fire: and then every man did his best, laid about him manfully, and carried it afore him right worthily. The Sammnits stood to it till and moved not, albeit they got more knocks and wounds than they gave. Thus when the fight had continued a good while, notwithstanding much bloody slaughter about the Sammnits ensignes, yet no flying was there on any side: so resolute were they, by death only to be vanquished. Whereupon the Romans feeling their own strength for weariness decayed and spent, and but little day left, inflamed with anger, gave a fresh charge all at once upon the enemies. Then (and not before) began they to shrink and give ground, and incline to flight: Then were the Sammnits taken prisoners and slain thick. Few or none had escaped alive, but that the night came so fast upon them, that interrupted the victory, rather then ended the battell. Both the Romans themselves confessed, they never fought with a more stubborn and obstinate enemy: and the Sammnits also being demanded the primitive cause, which forced them (so fully bent as they were) to run away at the last, said, that the Romans seemed to have burning fire in their eyes, and to carry in their faces and visages the furious rage of mad and frantic persons: and thereat first began they to be affrighted, more then at any thing else. Which fearfulnesse of theirs, they bewailed not only by the present event of the battell but also by their dislodging and departure away in the night. The morrow after the Romans were walkers of their empty and naked camp: unto which all the whole multitude of the Campains came running in number to rejoice and congratulate their victory.

But this joy had like to have been foully blemished with an overthrow and defeat in Sammnium. For Cornelius the Consul being departed from Saricula, had engaged his army unadvisedly within a forest, through which went an hollow valley or lawn, forlaid on both sides with an embank: neither discovered he his enemies over his head, before such time as he could not retire with his ensignes into a place of late receipt. But whilst the Sammnits staid only until he had brought his army fully down into the bottom of the vale, P. Decius, a Colonel of footmen, espied in the forest one little high hill, which commanded the place where the enemies lay encamped: and as it was for an army heavily armed, and charged with carriage, hard to be got up unto: so for them that were lightly appointed and burdened, nothing difficult. He perceiving the Consul troubled in mind and affrighted: See you not (quoth he) O Annius Cornelius yonder hilltop above the encampment? That is the very fortress of our hope and safety, if so be that we can gaine the same lustily, as the Sammnits have left it blindly. I require no more of you, but to let me have the Principes and spear men of one only Legion. And when with them I have once seized the top thereof, let forward you from hence and fear not, neither make doubt to lay your self and the army. For the enemy being under us, and lying open to all our shot, cannot stir without great losse and present mischief. As for us, either the fortune of the people of Rome, or our own manhood shall work virtuals, and was both by their lying before Suessula, and also by their long stay there, without fight brought to (scarcely well-need of all things: it was thought good, that whilst the enemies lay within their hold as affrighted, the foeldiers should be sent about the country a foraging. In which mean time they supposed that the Romans likewise, would have spent all, who were either comely appointed, and had brought no more corn with them than they could carry on their backs, besides their armour. The Consul having eluded the enemies stragling over the country, and their guards handsly manned, after a brief exhortation to his foeldiers, led them forth to give an assault upon their camp. Which when they had won at the first shout and onfet, and killed most of the enemies within their tents, then either upon the gates or upon the rampier: he caused the ensignes that he had taken, to be brought together into one place: and leaving there two hundred for a guard and defence, with a slight charge, that untill he came again; they should fight with rifle and mike (spoil), he went forward in order of battell. And when the horfmen which he took out alone, had like hunters driven the scattered Samnites, as it were, within net and toll, he lay upon them and committed an exceeding great slaughter. Forfrighted as they were, they looked neither at what signall they should rally themselves together, nor whether they should make speed to the camp, or the further away. But to great was their fright and flight both, that there were brought to the Consul, 40000 shields, more indeed then there were men slain: besides 17000 signs, together with those that were won in the camp. Then returned he unto the enemies, and belloved the whole pillage there, upon the foeldiers. And such was the happy successe of this war, that it both caused the Falisci being in truce, to sue unto the Senat, for a league: and also turned the Latins, who had prepared their forces already from warring with the Romans, to war upon the Peligni. Neither relted the fame of this so fortunate a victory within the marches of Italy: for even the Carthaginians also, sent their Embassadors to Rome, with gratulation, and present of a golden-crown weighing twenty five pounds, to be set up in Jupiter's Temple within the Capitoll. Both Consuls triumphed over the Samnites: and Decimus followed after, it goodly to be seen, with his gifts and worthy praises: whilst the foeldiers, as their manner was, with merry jells and rude ditties, magnified and renowned the name of the Colonell no less than the Consuls.

A Mutiny and conspiracy of the garrison foeldiers at Capua.

After this the Embassadors of the Campains and the Suessians had a day of audience: and upon their humble request it was granted, that thither should be sent a standing garrison to watch there, for to stop the excursions and invasions of the Samnites. But Capua, even then no good place for military discipline, wrought an alteration in the foeldiers there: who having once got a taste and taken a delight in a world of pleasures of all sorts, quite forgot their own natural country. For they of the garrison, began to lay plots and devise how to get Capua from the Campains: even by the same wicked practice, by which themselves had won it first from the ancient possessor and inhabitants, saying, "It made no matter, and they were but rightly served, in case their own precedent lewd example, should return upon their own heads. Again, why should the Campains, not able to defend themselves, nor maintain their liberties and goods, be LL. of the most plentiful country of Italy, and of a City answerable and correspondent therunto, rather then the victorious army, which with their sweat and blood had repelled and expelled the Samnites from them? And "was it any reason, that they who had yielded to be vassals unto them, should enjoy that fruitful and pleasant tract, while they themselves wearied with fighting, struggled still and wrestled in pestilent air, and dry barren toll, about the City of Rome, and within that City, endured the tedious inveterate and intestine mischief & plague of war, that surcharged them daily more and more! Whilst the projected conspiracies were contrived in secret conventicles, and as yet not broached and divulged to all mens knowledge, the new Consul, C. Marius Rusticus came in place: whose lot it was to be LL. Deputy of the province Campania, leaving his fellow Q. Servilius in the City, who having intelligence by the Captains and Colonels, of all the particularities of those designs: being a wise man, both for his old age and long experience (as who was now Consul the fourth time, and whilst had been Censor and Dictator) thought it best to dissemble the matter, and to make void and frustrate the present heat and outrage of the foeldiers, by deferring and prolonging their hope, as if they might put in execution their plots at their best leisure, whenever they pleased. He raised therefore a rumour, that the garrisons should in the same towns winter again the year following. [For divided they were into sundry Cities of Campania: & the web began at Capua, was spread from thence through all the forces.] By means of this good respite to bethink themselves and advise of these matters, the mutiny for the present was well quieted. The Consuls then led forth the foeldiers into the summer places of abode and repose, and purpose while he had the Samnites in quietness to cleanse the army by the cashiering & discharging those busie bodies and trouble-some spirits: pretending colourably, and saying, That some of them had served already so long as the law required, others were well now ripe in years, or waxen feeble and their strength decayed. Some had their passports limited, and were sent home: at the first only one singled out, afterwards, certain whole cohorts or bands, as having wintered far from their dwelling places, from their goods and subsistence. Under a pretence and colour also of military services and employments, whilst to me were dispatched one way, some another, a great part of them were rid clean away. All this multitude, the other Consul and the Pretor kept still at Rome, devising this craft, and that, of delays and abiding behind. And verily at first, they being not aware of this delusion, were not unwilling to visit home. But after that they perceived, that neither they who were dismissed first, returned again unto their colours, nor any in a manner discharged else, but such as had lien in winter garrison at Capua: and thence especially, who of them were the authors of the conspiracy: first they marvelled, and afterwards feared in very deed, that their complots were revealed and come to light, and that now presently, they should be put to examinations and tortures, abide arraignment and judgement, be executed secretly apart one by one, and suffer the insolent lordliness, and cruel tyranny of Consuls and Senators over them. These and such like speeches sow they and whisper secretly, that were in the camp, when they saw the principal authors of the mutiny, who were the sinews and strength thereof, by the wily policy of the Consul to be dimembered from them. One cohort of them, being not far from Avus lay them down at Lautula, in a narrow pass or wood between the sea and the mountains, to intercept and stay, whomsoever the Consul sent about this or that pretended business as is above said. Soon were there gathered together a right strong power: and nothing wanted to make a shew of a full army, but only a head and Captain. And disordered as they were, they went robbing and spoiling, as far as the Alban country, and under the hill of long Alba they encamp themselves within a trench and rampier. Which work being finished, they spend the rest of the day in consultation about choosing a Commander, little trusting any one there present in place. And who possibly (say they) could be sent for as far as from Rome? What Senator or Commander was there, that either wittingly would venture upon so great and dangerous an enterprise: or to whom the cause of an army, enraged upon an injury received, might safely be committed? The next morning, whilst they reasoned still about this point, and sadly debated the matter, some of the wandering and vagrant foragers of the Country thereabout, bring certain intelligence, that Titus Quinctius employed himself in husbandry, and held a farm in Tusculum, minding neither the City, nor dignities of state and Common weal. This man was come of noble lineage, and having served with great credit and honour in the wars by a wound received, was lame of a leg, and gave over soldiery, determining to lead the rest of his life in the country, sequestered far from all court and ambitious suing for civil offices. They had not to soon heard his name, but presently they took knowledge of the man, and (that which might turn to their good) agreed with one accord, he should be sent for. Small hope there was that he would willingly do any thing: they thought therefore to use force and to bring him to it by fear. So, in the dead time of the night, they that were sent thereto, entered the farm house, and finding Quinctius sound and fast asleep, they awakened him: propounded unto him either rule and honour, or else present death: and no mean between, in case he made stay and refused to go with them: and so they baled and brought him to their camp. Incontinently he was saluted L. General at his first coming. And when the man was affrighted at this sudden and wonderful occurrence, they endue him with the ornaments and ensigns to that honor belonging, and will him to lead them as their commander to the City of Rome. Thus having plucked up the standards, in this heady fit of their own, rather then upon any advice or counsel of their captain, they march in warlike manner with an army toward Rome, within eight miles of the City, upon the causey or street way, now called Appia Via: and had approached immediately in that train to the very City, but that they heard there was a power coming against them, and a Dictator created to withstand them, to wit M. Valerius Corvinus, together with Laetilius Mamurcus General of horfmen. So soon as they were come in interview one of another, and took knowledge of the armor and ensigns: the remembrance of their native country wrought with them straightway a mitigation of their mood. They were not yet so far gone, nor so hardy, as to shed civil blood: neither had they knowledge of any other wars but foreign: and the uttermost rage and maddest fit that ever they proceeded unto, was counted their Section and departure away from their own countyme. And therefore both captains and foeldiers on either side sought means to meet together, and draw to imparle. Quinctius for his part, who having had already his hands full of wars in defence of his country, could worse brook taking arms against the same: Corvinus likewise for himself, as one that with loving affection embraced all his fellow-citizens, but the foeldiers especially, and above all others those of his own army that fought under his banner, came forth to a parle. And forthwith as soon as he was once known, he had no less reverence done unto him of the adverse part, than silence and audience given of his own men. The immortal gods (quoth he) O foeldiers as well those which are common to you all, as mine own particular patrons, when I took my leave of the City, I adored and worshipped in this wise, craving humbly upon my knees at their hands, to vouchsafe me the honour, not of a victory over you, but of procuring concord and unity among you. Occasions there have been, and will be enow else where, to win glory and warlike renown: From hence, peace only is to be sought. And even that which among my vows that I made I becom to devoutly of the immortal gods, it lieth in you to make me enjoy. Doe but call to minde that neither in Saunium, nor among the Volcians ye are encamped, but upon Roman ground: that those hills which ye behold, are the hills of your native soile: this army which ye see, are of your own Countrymen and fellow Citizens: and my selfe your Consul, under whose conduct and Auspice, ye have the year past twice defeated the Samnite legions, twice by mere force won their campe, and driven them out of the field. I am, first, that M. Valerius Corvinus, whose

The singular policy of M. Rusticus the Consul.

The Oration of Valerius Corvinus to the Rebels.

"nobleſſe yee have had triall of, not by any wrongs done, but by good turnes on your part received. Authour have I been of no proud law, nor cruell Act of Senat againſt you: a man in all my government and rule that I bare, more rigorous to my ſelfe than ſevere to you. And if ever there were one, who might be proud either of Noble race and gentry, or of his own vertue and valour, of majelty and high calling or honourable dignities, of ſuch progenitors am I defended, ſuch proove of powerfull hand given: at that age attained I to Conſular honour, and being three and twenty years old, I was able to have been feared and dread, not of Commons only, but alſo of the Senators. But what deed or word hath paſſed from me in your knowledge, more grievous and odious when I was once Conſul, then all the time I was but a Colonel? the ſame could he ſay I ſtill during my two Conſulſhips enſuing: and ſuch ſhall my carriage be, and none other, whiles I am Dictator: that I will be no more mild and gracious to theſe here above me that are mine and my countries ſouldiers, then to your ſelves affronting; who are, me that are mine and my countries enemies. Ye ſhall therefore draw ſword upon me, before I tremble to ſpeake it forth, mine enemies. Ye ſhall therefore draw ſword upon me, before I draw upon you. The trumpets from thence ſhall begin ſound, the ſhoutings from thence ſhall ariſe, the charge from thence ſhall be given fiſt, if we mult needs go to it and fight. Now, ſind in your hearts (if you can) to do that which neither your ſathers nor grandfathers before you ever could: no, nor they who went away and departed you the mount Aſcer, nor thoſe who afterwards held and kept the Acetina. Expect, until your mothers and wives, with their hair hanging about their ears, come forth of the City to meet with you one by one, as ſometimes they did to Coriolanus. Then, the Volſcan legions were quieted and pacified, becauſe they had one Roman for their leader: will not yet then, being a whole army, all of the Romans, ſurceaſe this unkind and impious warre? And thou T. Quintius, howſoever thou art come there to ſtand, whether with or againſt thy will: in caſe there be no remedy, but fight we mult, retire thy ſelfe ſomongt the hindermolt: ſay, with more honeſty ſie thou ſhalt, and ſew thy natural comen a fair paire of heeles, then fight againſt thy country. But ſtand ſtill hardly with honour and credit among the formolt to make atonement: thou ſhalt be a truce-maker in this ſharpley and conference, to all our goods. Ask and have, any reaſonable and indifferent conditions: although in truth we were better to yeeld unto hard and unequal capitulations, than wickedly and ungodly, one to fight with another. T. Quintius with teares galling out at his eies, turning to his owne companies: *"And even me alſo (quoth he) O ſouldiers (if need there be at all mee) yee have a much better captaine for peace than I wate. As for him who ever now uttered thoſe words in your hearings, was neither Volſcan nor Samnit, but a Roman, even your owne Conſul ſometime, ſouldiers, and your own Generall heretofore: whole Auſpicate conduſt, you having tried for you, and in your defence: doe not prove now againſt your ſelves to your perdition. Other had the Senate to lend as captaine, who would have fought more maliciously with you: but they have made choiſe of him who above all others, could beare with you, yea, and ſear you that have been his ſouldiers: whom you of all others eſpecially might truſt, as being been your Generall. Peace, yee fee, even they deſire that are to get the victory. And what is it then we ought and ſhould deſire? Why then ſet we not anger and hope aſide, two falſe motives, two deceitfull guides and counſellers; and beſeeke our ſelves and all wee have to a man of approved truſt and fidelity? Theſe words being liked well of all (as appeared by a Generall ſhout) T. Quintius went forth before the enſignes in the forefront, and pronounced that the ſouldiers ſhould be at the Dictator his devotion and pleaſure: beſeeching him to conſider and undertake the cauſe of poor and wretched citizens: and having taken it into his hands, to maintain and protect the ſame, according to that faithfullneſſe wherewith hee uſed to governe the Commonweale. As for himſelfe privately, he would not intend ought for his owne ſecurity: neither repoled he hope in any things elſe but in innocency. The ſouldiers indeed were to be capitulate, as once heretofore the Commons, and a ſecond time the legions had done with the Senators: namely, that their revolt and petty rebellion, might not be laid unto their charge, and their hurts and utter undoing. Then the Dictator, after hee had firſt commended Quintius, and willed theſe to be content and of good cheer, poſt to the City, and by the adviſe of the Senators, preferred a bill unto the people in the grove Pelutina: That the mutiny and inſurrection ſhould turne no man to ſea and danger. He beſought the Quintius alſo of this much favour beſides, That neither in fiſt nor earneſt, this ſhould be laid in no mans diſt. The ſame time there was propoſed beſides, a ſacred military law under pain of death. That no ſouldiers name once entered into the muſter after his booke, ſhould be raſed out againſt his will: With this branch annexed ever and beſides, That no man who had been ſervicing a ſenatoll or Tribune, ſhould after have the leading of bands, and be a Centurion. This was followed hard and urged by thoſe of the complicity, in regard of one P. Sabinus, who in moſt each other year had been either a Colonel, or a chief Centurion, whom now they call Præſepili. Him the ſouldiers ſpighted much, and were maliciously ſet againſt, becauſe he had alwaies oppoſed* poſed himſelfe againſt their conſpiracies and innovations, and took not part with them who fled from Lautula. But when this one point could not be obtained of the Senat, for the ſavour they bare to Sabinus: then Sabinus himſelfe beſought the Senators that they would not regard his honour, more than the concord of the whole City: and to as length it alſo was granted and enacted. As unreaſonable a demand was this alſo, That of horſemen pay, (and that was triple at that time) ſome Aſſes ſhould be deducted, for that they alſo had wiſſed the conſpiracy. Over and beſides, I find in ſome writers, that L. Genucius, a Tribune of the Commons, publiſhed this Law unto the people, That Horſes might be made altogether unlawfull. Likewiſe in other Acts of the Commons it was provided, That no man within ten years ſpace ſhould be capable of the ſame Office twice: nor in one year bear two Offices: and that both Conſuls might be of the Commons. Which if they all were granted to the Commons, it appeareth that this ſubſtitution carried ſome ſway and force with it. In other Chronicles it is recorded, that neither Falerius was choſen Dictator, but that all this buſineſſe was by the Conſuls managed: nor to great a multitude of Conſpirators role, before they came to Rome, but even in Rome took arms: nor yet that they came by night, in ſorrible manner unto T. Quintius ſlarm-houſe, but in the dwelling houſe of C. Manlius: and that he was taken up by the rebels to be their General, and from thence went as far as four miles ead, and there encamped in a fortified place: that the motion of Concord aroſe not from the Caprains, but that of a ſudden, when both Armies ſtood arranged in order of battell, they ſelfe to greeting one another: and that the liquidiers began to take one another by the hands and embrace with tears: and that the Conſuls ſeeing the ſouldiers ſo backwark from fight, were forced to move the Senat for an atonement. So as among ancient writers, there is no certainty let down, but that a ſedition there was, and the ſame appeared. But the rumor thereof and the cruel war which the Samnites begun, withdrew certain nations from the Romans ſociety and alliance. For beſides the faithleſſe and untruſty League (a long time) of the Latines: the Privernates alſo with ſudden rodes, invaded and waited Norba and Sessa, two Colonies of the Romans near bordering and adjoyning.

The Eighth Book

Of the Hiſtories of T. Livius of Padua, from the Foundation of the City of Rome.

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Eighth Book.

The Latines, together with the Capuans revolted: and the Latines having ſent their Embaſſadors to the Senat (of Rome) offered and preſented peace, upon this condition only, that they ſhould create one of their Conſuls out of them. This Embaſſie thus declared, Annus the Pretor, who had audience in the Capitoll, going down from thence, took ſuch a fall, that he died in the place. T. Manlius caſt his ſword to ſeſe his head, becauſe, contrary to his expreſſe commandment, he had fought againſt the Latines, without ſtanding his good ſucceſſe in that combat. At what time as the Romans were greatly diſtreſſed, and like to loſe the field, P. Decius then Conſul, with Manlius devoted and offered himſelfe to preſent death, for to ſave the Army: and ſetting fire to his houſe, rode into the miſt of the enemies battell: where he was ſlain, and by his death recovered victory to the Romans. The Latines yielded and rendered themſelves. When T. Manlius returned into the City, there was not one of all the youth came forth to meet him, and do him honour. Minutia, a profreſſed Veſtall Virgin, was condemned for her inceſt, for incontinent life. The Aſſonians being ſubdued, a Colony was planted in Cales, and another likewiſe in Fregelle. Many Roman dames were deteiled of praſtituting perſon: and moſt of them were forced to drink of their own empoſoned cups firſt, whereof they died preſently. Whereupon was the firſt Law then ordained againſt perſonning. The Privernates, when they rebelled were vanquiſhed, and afterwards ended, which the Burgeſſie of the City of Rome. The Palatians were defeated in battell firſt, and ſier ſiege ſurrendered upon compoſition. Quintius Publilius, who blocked them within their wail, was the firſt man that had his Commiſſion renewed, and continued ſtill in government, when the ordinary time was expired: and by means of the Conſuls had a triumph granted unto him. The common people were delivered from the danger of their creditors, by occaſion of the ſickly luſt of one of them, Lu. Papirius, who would have forced and againſt nature aſſeſſed C. Publilius, a debtor of his. When L. Papirius the Dictator was returned from the Army into the City, for to take the Auſpices anew, by reaſon of ſome errors ſuppoſed in the ſervice, C. Publilius the General of the horſemen ſhewing in his abſence offered the opportunity and advantage of performing a worthy exploit gave battell contrary to his Ediſt, and put the Samnites to the worſe. For which cauſe when the Dictator would ſeem to puniſh him accordingly, Fabius made an eſcape and fled to Rome. And when his cauſe would not beare him out, he had it pardon: at the worſt ſute and prayers of the people. This booke containeth alſo the fortunate exploits againſt the Samnites.

The Oration
of Annus in the Senat of Rome.

"Swer again of the Senat of Rome, that it plainly appeared that they themselves pretended not to require that Latium should be under the Roman Empire. Do ye but take upon you, and lay claim unto that which they secretly yield unto you themselves, and repofess it at your pleasure, Now if any man be afraid to be the speaker, Lo here am I, who profess to be the man, and to say thus much, not only in the audience of the people and Senat of Rome, but also of Jupiter himself, who is present in the Capitol, namely, That if they will have us to be of the League and confederacy, they shall admit from among us one of the Consuls, yea, and a part of the Senat. As he with great spirit and boldness, not only advised this, but promised also thus to do; all that were present with a general applause, and assent permitted him to do and say whatsoever he thought expedient for the common good of the Latine nation, according to that trust which they reposed in him. So soon as he was come to Rome (with other Embassadors) he was admitted into the Senat, and audience given him in the Capitol. Where when T. Manlius the Consul by the authority and direction of the Senators, had dealt with him and the rest, not to make war upon the Samnites their confederats: Annus raging like a conqueror, as if he had won by force and arms the Capitol; and not as an Embassador, who was to deliver his mind and message safely, by the protection of the Law of Nations, began in this sort: "The time required (quoth he) now at length, O T. Manlius and ye Senators of Rome, not to treat and deal with us in any affairs by way of authority and commandment, namely, when you saw Latium by the favour of the gods to flourish exceedingly both in men and munition, as having lubdued the Samnites, confederate with the Sidicins and Campsins, and now also combined with the Volscians; and besides, even your own Colonies and townships too, have made choice to submit themselves to the Latines rather than the Romans. But forasmuch as you cannot find in your hearts of your selves, nor see how to make an end of your proud and outrageous Lordship and tyranny; I We, albeit we are able to restore Latium unto her ancient freedom by force of arms, yet for kindred sake will be content to offer indifferent articles and equal conditions of peace, forasmuch as it hath pleased theheimortal gods, that we are equal unto you in power and puissance. Impiis, there is no remedy now, but your two Consuls must be one a Roman, and the other a Latine: Item, that the number of Senators be elected as well out of the one nation as the other, Item, that we become one people incorporate, and one Common-wealth. And to the end that there may be one imperial feat, and one name of all, and therefore we or you must needs yield, we are content a God's name (and to the good of both nations may it prove) that this City and State of yours be counted the better and more noble: and let us be called all by the name of Romans. By good hap it so fell out, that the Romans also had for their Consul T. Manlius to match him; one as stout and hot as the other: who could not contain his anger no longer, but openly laid, "That if the Senators were so far overseen and besides themselves, as to take conditions of a Setine, he would come with his sword by his side into the Senate house, and what Latine soever he saw there in council, he would not fail but slay him with his own hand in the place. And therewith turning to the Image of Jupiter: Hearken (quoth he) O good god Jupiter. Hear this wickedness and indignity: hear O Justice and piety to Godward, Wilt thou abide to see, O Jupiter, in this thy holy and sacred temple, wilt thou endure, as taken captive and troden under foot, to see Consuls of aliens & a Senat of forreiners: Are these the covenants, O ye Latines, which Tullus King of Rome made with the Albans your forefathers? or which L. Tarquinus after him, concluded with you? Remember ye not the battel at the lake Regillus? Have ye so forgotten indeed, both your own calamities and overthrowes of old, and also the good turns and benefits received at our hands? When this speech of the Consul was seconded with the indignation also of the Senators, it is recorded, that when they called upon the gods, witnesses of those covenants, and reiterated their names oftentimes. Annus in mockery of those protestations, was overheard to despise and scorn the power and godhead of the Roman Jupiter. But this is certain, that as he in heat of anger, stepped hastily to the entry or porch of the temple, and went up, he fell down the stairs, and so hurt his head that dashed against the bottom stair, that he swooned withall, and lay for dead. But he became all wretches agree not, that he yielded up his last breath thereupon, I also will leave it doubtful, as I find it: as also this, that in the very charging of him with breach of covenants, there poured down a tempestuous storm, with many mighty thunderclaps. For as these and such like things may be very true, so they may be prettily devised and invented on set purpose to represent & shew the wrath and vengeance of God, Tarquinius being sent by the Senat to give the Embassadors their dispatch, seeing Annus there to lie alone, cried out aloud, in the hearing both of the Senat and the people, and said, "No force, it is well, and as it should be: thus begin and bless, O ye immortal gods, our just and rightful war. Surely there is a God above, there is a power divine and deity in heaven, thou art not a feigned and imaginary god. O mighty Jupiter, & not in vain have we hailed thee in this place, as the father both of gods and men. Why say ye then, O Roman Quirites, ye likewise my I.L. of the Senat, to take arms in the name of the gods, having them already as you see to be your Leaders? I for my part shall soon overthrow and lay the Legions of the Latines along on the earth: as ye now see their Embassadors, lying here at the stairs foot. The words of the Consul, received with so great applause of the people, animated and emboldened him in such sort, that had not the careful diligence of the Magistrats been more (who by commandment of the Consul accompanied the Embassadors as they went) than the ordinary safe conduct of the Law of Nations, they had not escaped the rage and fury of the multitude.

A The Senat also gave their assent to this war, and the Consuls having levied two armies, and passed through the country of the Marnans and Pelignians, and joyned unto them the Samnites power, encamped themselves before Capua, whither the Latines with their allies, were already come together. There, as the report goeth, the Consuls both of them in their sleep had a vision: and there appeared unto them, one and the same shape of a mans personage, much greater and more stately than the ordinary port of men, who should deliver their words unto them, "That the two armies embattelled and affronting one another, the one was appointed as a due tribute to the internal spirits, and to Mother Earth: and of the other, the chief General only, and look of whether army the laid foreign General should devote and offer unto those internal spirits, and to mother Earth, the Legions of the enemies, and his own person withall, that part and that Nation shall have the victory. When the Consuls had imparted one to the other these night-visions, it was thought good and agreed (for to divert and appease Gods anger) that certain sacrifices should be slain, and also if the same shewed in their inwards, as appeared in their sleep, then one or other of the Consuls should fulfill the destinies, and accomplish fatal appointment. When as the answers of the Soothsayers agreed also to that secret religion which was now entered and settled already in their minds, then the Consuls calling together the Lieutenants and Colonels to a Council, and openly declaring before them all the pleasure of the gods (to the end, that the will and voluntary death of one of the Consuls, might not fright his army in the field) they agree between themselves, that of whether side the Roman battallions began first to give back and retreat the Consul of that Army, should devote and betake himself to die for the people of Rome and the Quirites. It was debated also in that assembly, that if ever at any time before there had been war managed by severe rule and government, the military discipline should now be revived and reduced to the old manner and ancient rigour: their care in that behalf was the greater and more redoubled, for that they were to fight against the Latines, sitting altogether to them in language, fashions, armour, and especially above all, in the orders and laws of warfare. For, many a time, in these two armies soldierly with soldierly; Centurion with Centurion, Colonel with Colonel, had sorted and converted together, as colleagues and compeers in the same garisons, yea, and under the same colours and ensigns, by reason whereof, to the end, that by no error the soldierly should be mistaken or deceived, the Consuls made proclamation through the Camp, That no man should fight with his enemy out of his own rank, and place appointed unto him. It followed now, that among other Captains and Cornets of horsemen, which were sent out every way as scouts and espials to discover the coasts, T. Manlius the Consul his son, together with the rest of his Cornet and Troup, was passed above the enemies Camp, so near, as he was within an arrow shot of their next Corps de guard. In which was quartered the cavalry of Tusculum, under the leading of Geminus Metius a Knight, both for birth, and also for his noble fears of arms highly esteemed in his country. He spying the Roman horse, and knowing the Cossion, advancing before them, and of especial mark above the rest (for all Noblemen and of quality were well enough known one to another,) What, will ye Romans (quoth he) with one Cornet of horse fight with the Latines and their confederats? What shall your Consuls, what shall two Consular armies do the mean while? Marry (quoth Manlius) they will be here time enough for you, and with them Jupiter himself, a witness of league and covenants by you broken. Jupiter I say, who only can do more than all mens forces in the world. And we who at the pool Regillus, have given you fighting your bellies full, will here also quit our selves so, that never after ye shall have any great joy and pleasure to encounter and joyn battel with us again. With that, Geminus, riding forth as he was on horseback, a little from his company, Wilt thou then (quoth he) till that day come wherein ye mean, with so great a do to set forward your armies to a general field, break a staff with me in the mean time; that by the proof and event of us twain, it may henceforth appear, how far the Latine men of arms, surpass the Roman? The young man his bloud and courage was soon up either upon anger and choler, or for very shame to refuse the combat, or because God would so have it, and it was his destiny that could not be avoided. Forgetting therefore his fathers commandment, and the express Edict of the Consuls, he returneth on head and rashly, to a single fight: wherein is skilled not much, whether he had the better or the worse, for any great odds thereby in the main trial of the quarrel. Thus when the rest of the horsemen of both parts were retired aside (as it were) to behold some spectacle or running at tilt: in the void place of the plain field that lay between, they ran their horses in full career one against the other, with sharp and deadly spear in rest. Manlius with his lance aloft glid over and raised the Morion of his enemy, and Metius with his spear lightly touched, and passed by the horse neck. Then having turned about their horses, Manlius came upon him first with a second charge, and so redoubled the push, that he thrust the others horse in between the ears. At the smart of which wound the horse reared and mounted with his forefeet, and with great force shaking his head cast his rider, And as he bare his spear and shield, to raise himself from his grievous fall, Manlius ran him through at the throat, so that the spear-head came forth at his ribs, and nailed him fast to the ground. And having disarmed & deploied him rode back to his own troop: and both together with exceeding joy hastened to the Camp, and so to the Generals Pavilion, even to his father: full little knowing his fatal destiny, and what was to befall unto him, whether he had deserved praise, or incurred danger of punishment. That all the world, quoth he, (O father) may be persuaded and report truly that I am defended indeed of your bloud, and your undoubted son. Lo here I am, who being defied and challenged to fight man to man, have killed mine enemy a man of arms: see here thy spoils of him slain and dead. Which so soon as the Cof, heard, presently he could not abide to look on his son, but turned away, and by found of trumpet, commanded the host to a publick audience. Which being assembled in great number. "Forasmuch (quoth he) as thou, T. Manlius, without regard of Cof, authority, or dread of thy fathers majesty and power over thee, against our Edict and express commandment, hast fought with the enemy, and that without thy rank and place; and as much as by in thee hast broken the discipline of war, whereby to this day the State of Rome hath stood maintained, and hast brought me thy father to this hard point, that I must forget either the Common-weal, or else mine own self and mine, we will abide rather the punishment and smart for our own misdeeds, than the whole state, to her so great prejudice and damage should pay for our folly and transgression. A fearful and dolorous example will we afford: but good & profitable to all youth for ever hereafter. As for me verily, both the inbred love and affection of all fathers to their children, and also this shew and proof of thy valour and knight-hood (although seduced with deceitful appearance and vain resemblance of honour) moveth me not a little: but since that, either by thy death the Cof, commands must be established, or by impunity of thy disobedience for ever disannulled, I would not with thee to refuse (if there be any of my blood in thee) but by thy punishment to restore and set up again the military discipline which this day by thy default is fallen down and ruined. Go, sergeant, and bind him to a stake. At this so cruel a sentence, they were all amazed and in an ecstasy, that were present: and as if they had seen the edge bent against themselves, for fear more than for any modesty or reverence, they were quiet. So when they were come again to themselves, as if their spirits had been recovered after some deep impression of a wonder which had astonished them, they stood still with silence: but so soon as the poor wretch his head was chopp'd off, and his blood seen to gush and spin out, then began they all of a sudden to speak freely and complain with open mouth, so as they forbore neither lamentations nor curses: they covered the youth his body with his own victorious spoils, they erected a funeral pile of wood over his corps without the trench and rampiers, set it on fire, and burnt him accordingly: and so with as great love and affection as soldiers could shew, performed their last duty unto him, and solemnized his obsequies. Thus the commandments of Manlius were not only dreadful for the present, but gave an heavy and fearful precedent for the future, to all sovereign Commanders of an Army. Howbeit, the rigour of this punishment made the soldiers more dutiful to their Captains and Leaders: and besides that, the rounds and sentinels, and the set corps de guard, were every where more carefully looked unto and observed: even in the very hazard and extremity also of the battel afterward, that austere severity did much good. For their fight was much like unto a civil war. So little, or nothing at all in a manner, differed the Latines from the Romans Common-wealth, but only in heart and courage.

Aforetime they used Roman long large shields, covering their whole bodies; but in process of time, after that they became Stipendiaries and to take pay, they bare shorter targets. And whereas aforetime they had their battalions thick and close together, like to the Macedonian Phalanxes, afterwards they began to range their battel into bands more loosely and distinctly, and last of all, they were divided into thinner orders and squadrons: every such order or squadron contained threecore soldiers, two Centurions, and one Port ensign. The forefront of the vanguard were javeliners called Hastati, in fifteen squadrons, distant some little way one from another: such a squadron had twenty soldiers lightly armed, and all the rest a sort of Targeteers. And those were called light-armed, who carried only a spear or javelin to fight with at hand, and other darts to lance from them aloof. This forefront contained the flower of youths, that grew up as apprentices to war-service. Then followed after them of stronger and riper age, as many bands or squadrons, which were called Principes: whom there followed hard at heels, thirty squadrons, all targeteers or shield-bearers, with brave armour above all others. And this battalion of thirty companies, they called Anteplani (avant-d'atere) for that the other fifteen orders or bands were placed hard before the ensigns. And of these, every band consisted of three parts: and each of them they called Primum pilum, and it was composed of three banners or pannonces: and every such banner contained 186 men. The first Pannone or banner conducted the Triarii, who were old soldiers of approved valour: the second, those that were called Rorarii, of less puissance both for age and prowess: the third, such as were named Accensi, who were of least account and trust, and therefore they were cast behind unto the tail of the battalion. When the Army was thus ordered in battel array into these bands & squadrons, the javeliners foremost of all began the fight: if they were not able to discomfit the enemies, than they with steady footing and soft pace retired back into the void places between the squadrons of the Principes who received them: then began the Principes to enter into the battel and to maintain fight, and were seconded by the Hastati or javeliners. The Triarii remained standing all this while firmly, about their ensigns, setting off their left legs afore them at length, with their Targets on their shoulders, and their pikes or javelins sticking on the ground, with their heads somewhat bending forward, much like as if their battel were fortified with a Pallisado or rampier of pales and sharp stakes. Now if those Principes had not good success in fight, they retired themselves by little and little from the forefront to the Triarii. And hereupon grew the proverb, that when a thing was at a dead lift and in distress they would say, We are come to the Triarii. Then the Triarii standing up right, so soon as they had received the Principes and Hastati, into the void place between their files, presently drew in their ranks

A ranks and files close together, and shut up as it were all waies of passage and entrance, and with one main joint and close battalion (as it now there were no more hope behind) advanced toward the enemy. And this most of all feared and terrified the enemies, when thinking to chase those that they seemed to have vanquished, they saw a new battel of fresh men starting up, and the same increased in number.

Now were there commonly four Legions enrolled, consisting of five thousand foot, and three hundred horse to every legion. As many more were added unto them, and those mustered out of the Latines, who at that time were enemies to the Romans, and had ordered their battalions after the same manner in all respects. And they knew well enough that not only enlign with ensign, B all pikes and javelins with pikes and javelins, Principes with Principes, but one Centurion with another, if the stratagies were not broken, were to encounter. Two Primipili or chief Centurions, there were amongst the Triarii in the one army and the other. The Roman, of body not so strong and wellset, howbeit a good soldier otherwise, skillful and of great experience: the Latine, exceeding mighty, and a notable fighter of all others. Well known they were unto the other, because at all times they had the same conduct and equal place of charge. The Roman not greatly trusting to his own strength, was permitted even at Rome by the Cof, to chuse unto him a under-Centurion whom he would: who might protect and defend him safe from an enemy that should hap to deal with him hand to hand. And it fortune that the young man by him elected, fought in the throng and got the victory of the Latine Centurion. As for the battel, it was fought not far from the foot of the hill of Vesuvius, in the very way that leadeth to Vesuvius. The Roman Consuls before they came into the field killed their beasts for sacrifice. And the bowl-pyng Soothsayer (as it is reported) threwed to Decius the head of the Liver on the inner side wounded (as it were) and cut off: otherwise in all respects, his sacrifice was acceptable to the gods. As for Manlius, he had as good signs of Gods favour in his, and all as well as might be. That is well expressed (quoth Decius) if my colleague speed well, and have good success by his sacrifice, their battels being so arranged, as I said before, they marched into the field, Manlius led the right wing, Decius the left. At the first they fought on both sides with equal forces and like courage and heat of stomach. But afterwards on the left wing, the Roman Hastati, not able to sustain the violent charge of the Latines, retired to the Principes. In which trouble and fearful disorder, Decius the Cof, called aloud to M. Valerius. "We have need of Gods help (quoth he) O Valerius, Where art thou, the publick high Priest of the people of Rome? Come and lay afore me that form of words, whereby I may devote and betake my self for the Legions. The Priest commanded him to put on his long purple robe embroidered before, called Prætexta, to cover his head, and to put forth his hand under the said robe at his chin, and standing upon his javelin, with both his feet, to pronounce these words after him as follow: (O Janus, Jupiter, father Mars, Quirinus, Bellona, O ye Lares and domesticall gods, ye gods Novensiles and Indigetes; ye gods likewise, whose power extendeth over us and our enemies, and O Manes the infernal gods, you I invoke, you I worship and adore, your pardon I beseech and fervour crave, that ye would prosper all power and victory unto the people of Rome and Quirites; and put to fear, fright, and death, the enemies of the people of Rome and Quirites. And just as I pronounce in these words, so for the weal publick of the Quirites, the Army, Legions and aids of the people of Rome, I betake me unto Manes the infernal spirits, and dame Tellus, the Legions and aids of the enemies, and my self after them.) Having made this prayer, he willed the Sergeants or Licitors to go to Manlius, and with all speed to tell him, that his colleague was devoted for the army. Himself girded after the Sabine fashion, and armed at all pieces, mounted on horseback and so rode into the midst of his enemies. Of both armies he was seen to carry with him much more stately and venerable port than a man as sent from heaven to be a satisfaction of all gods wrath, and to turn away all plague and mischief from his own people upon the enemies. All terror and fear he carried with him as he went, and first disordered the ensigns of the Latines in the edge and border of the battalions, and afterwards entered within into the whole army. This was noted and seen most evidently, that F which way so ere he rode the enemies were smitten with fear, as if they had been blatted and struck with some untoward aspect and influence of a planet. But so soon as he was slain and overcharged with shot of darts, presently from that place all about, the cohorts of the Latines (out of all question) as amazed men, fled away and avoided. And therewithal likewise the Romans, as if they had been discharged and freed from their religious fear and scruple of conscience, and as if they had but then and not before heard the sound of the trumpet to battel, began to charge and fight afresh. For both the Rorarii advanced forward and ran among the ranks of the Anteplani, and thereby re-enforced the Hastati and Principes, and caused them to fight more stoutly: and the Triarii kneeling on their right knee, waited till the Cof, gave them some token to arise. Afterwards in process of fight when in other parts the Latines in their number prevailed, Manlius the Consul, having heard of the final end of his companion, and (and right as piety would) accompanied as well with prayers and tears as with due praises to worthy and memorable a death for a while doubting, whether it were yet time for the Triarii to arise. Afterwards thinking it better that they should be relieved in heart and fresh, unto the last push of extremity, he biddeth the Accensi from the hindmost tail of the rearward to come forth before the standards. Who so soon as they were come in place, forthwith the Latines, supposing the enemies had done the like, raised their Triarii. Who having for a good while fought fiercely and wearied themselves, and either broken their javelins or dulled their points, and yet by meer force repulped their enemies; thinking now all had been done, and

and the victory achieved, as being come as far as to the utmost skirts of the battalions: "Then, H" quoth the Consul to the Triarii, life now fresh and lusty as ye are, against the wearied, mindful "of your country, parents, wives and children, mindful of the Consul, who for your victory hath "taken his death. The Triarii all hearty & unfeigned, were not so soon risen up, shewing themselves in their bright and glittering armour, but there began on a sudden & unlooked for, a new skirmish and conflict. For they receiving the Anturiani between their files, set up a shout and outcry, troubled & disordered the Principia of the Latines, gored their faces with their javelins, flew the principal flower and strength of their best & foremost men and passed untouched in a manner through the other bands, as if they had been disarmed: yea, and brake through their pointed and clove battalions, with so great a murder, that scarcely they left behind them a fourth part of their enemies alive. The Samnites also under the foot of the hill, being seen a far off in battel array, more a terror among the Latines. But among all either Citizens or Allies, the especial commendation of that service rested in the Consuls: of whom, the one turned all the threats and dangers from the gods both above and beneath, upon himself alone; the other in that battel shewed such valour and policy, that it is confessed both of Romans and Latines, who have written of that journey and commended it to posterity, that of whether army T. Manlius had the conduct, that way doubtless would the victory go. The Latines after their defeat and flight retired to Minturnæ: their camp presently upon the battel was won, and many a man there surprised alive and cut in pieces, but the Campains especially. That day could not the corps of Decius be seen, for that the night came upon them as they fought for it: the morrow after it was found amongst a mighty company of slain enemies, overwhelmed with swords, darts and javelins: and with all honour and solemnity according to his death performed by his brother Consul were his funerals.

This also amongst the rest, seemeth worth the remembrance and to be inserted in this place, namely, That it was lawful for Consul, Dictator, and Pretor, whensoever they sacrificed and betook to the Devil the Legions of their enemies, for to vow and offer withal, not themselves in any case, but any Citizen whom they would: provided always that he were one of the enrolled legion of the Romans. [And if the man who is thus addicted and destined to death, hap to die, all is well, and as it ought to be: But if he die not, then was the image of him seven foot high or above buried in the ground, and a purging or propitiatory sacrifice was slain in his stead: but wherefore it is chosen that image to be so interred, whether it is not lawful for any Roman Magistrate to set foot and come, But if a man would needs offer and vow himself to death, as Decius did; and die not, he shall not purely perform any sacred duty, do sacrifice, either for himself or the City, that hath once thus betaken himself. If he will bequeath and offer his armour to Vulcan, or to some saint whomsoever he listeth, it is permitted and lawful for him so to do, either by way of sacrifice or other offering as he pleaseth. As for the weapon or spear over which the Consul standing on both his feet, made his prayers and invocations, it is not lawful the enemy to seize thereon: but if he forsake to win the same, a propitiatory sacrifice must be offered to appease Mars, with swine, a sheep, and a Bull. And albeit the records both of all divine and humane customs and traditions, make no mention hereof, and are now grown out of use and remembrance, by reason that we prefer new and foreign ceremonies, before the old ancient rites of our own country and ancestors, yet I thought not amiss to make report hereof, even in those very words and terms, as they were used, delivered, and pronounced.

In some writers I find, that the Samnites having waited to see the event of this battel, came to aid the Romans when all was done and past. Also, that there was succour a coming from Latium unto the Latines, but not before they had the overthrow: by reason that they spent a great time in deliberation. And when as now the foremost ensigns and some part of the army was gone forth of the gates, and news came of the defeat and slaughter of the Latines; as they turned their banners and returned into the City, it is said, That their Pretor or Provost, named Mithrinus, spake these words, "That so small a way as they had gone, must cost them dear, and full sweetly "would the Romans be paid therefore. Such as were remaining of the Latines after the battel, and were scattered asunder in many and divers waies, when they were rallied together, shrowded themselves for safety in the City Pesica. Where, in their Councils and assemblies, Nimfius their General, averred, and assured them, that Mars indeed was common, and the hazard indifferent to both parties, as having made an equal massacre in the one army and the other; and that the bare name only of victory went with the Romans: for otherwise, they carried away with them the fortune of men vanquished, and sped no better than they. For (saith he) The two royal pavilions of their Coe are polluted and defiled: the one with the parricide of his own son, the other for the death of the Coe, who had vowed himself to die: all their forces in manner slain: their Javelineers and principals killed: a bloody slaughter committed both before and behind the Standards: and only the Triarii at the last uphonor renewed the fight and set all upright. And albeit (quoth he) the power of the Latines also be shrewdly abated, yet for a fresh supply, either Latium or Volsci are nearer than Rome. And therefore if they to thought good, he would with all speed raise the lusty flower and chosen manhood both out of the Latines and the Volsicians, and return again with a fresh army to Capua: and with his sudden coming unlooked for, surprise and defeat the Romans, expecting as then for nothing less, than a second battel. So by dispatching his cautious and deceitful letters into all parts of Latium and the Volsician nation (by reason that they who had not been present at the battel were sooner induced to give rash credit: there was a numerous army in great haste levied, enrolled, and assembled together out of all quarters. This

A This host as it marched, Torgatus the Consul met at Tifinum, a place between Sinuesa and Adurnum. And before they could chuse out a plot of ground to encamp in, they bestowed their carriages and baggage on heaps of either side: fell to a battel, presently, and made a final end and conclusion of all the war. For the enemies were brought to low, that as the Consul led his victorious Army to waste their Country, all the Latines yielded themselves to him: and this their rendering the Campains likewise followed. Thus Latium and Capua forfeited and lost part of their Territories. The lands of the Latines with the Privernates laid the top and the Territory of Falerii, which belonged to the people of Capua, even as far as the river Volturnus, was divided amongst the Commons of Rome. Two acres in the Latine Country, with a supplement of three four parts out of the Privernates land to make up the whole; and three acres in the Territory of Falerii, with addition of a fourth part to boot for amends, because it was so far off, were assigned for a m.n. The Laurentins only, of all Latium, and the horsemen of the Campains escaped this punishment and were exempted from the rest, because they had not revolted. And a decree passed, that the League with the Laurents should be renewed: and from that time, usually every year, is it renewed, after the tenth day of the Latine holidays. Those Campain horsemen were made free denizens of Rome, and for a monument and memorial thereof, they set up and fastened a brazen table at Rome in the Temple of Castor. The people of Capua were enjoined to pay yearly to every one of them, (and they were a thousand and six hundred in all) 45. Deniers.

Thus after the war fully determined, and both rewards dealt, and punishment inflicted according to each mans desert, T. Manlius returned home: whom the elders only for certain went forth to meet on the way: the youth, not only then, but ever after, during his life abhorred, and with curses detested him. The Antians made certain rides into the Territories of Hortus, Ardea, and Sulana. And for that Manlius the Consul was not able himself in person to intend and manage that war, by reason of sickness, he nominated for Dictator L. Papirius Crassus, who as it happened was at that time Pretor: by whom was named for General of the horsemen L. Papirius Cursor. This Dictator, albeit he kept the field and lay encamped certain months within the Comines, yet achieved no worthy and memorable exploit. After this year thus renowned for the victory of so many and so puissant nations, and withal, for the noble and famous death of the one Consul, and for the government of the other, albeit stern and rigorous, yet notable and renowned; these succeeded Consuls, T. Amilius Memercurus, and Q. Publilius Philo, who met not with the like subject and matter of great affairs: and they themselves were more mindful either of their own private business, and studious to maintain a ease and faction in the Common-wealth, than to advance the State of their Country. Howbeit, the Latines (who rebelled for anger that they lost their lands) they did commit in the plain of Fenestæ, drove them both out of their Camp, and forced them to leave the field. Where, whilst Publius (by whose governance and conduct the victory was achieved) received surrender of the Latines, the flower of whole youth was slain and killed up. Amilius led his Army against Pedum. As for the Pedans they had much assistance from Tyrrhens, Prænestes, and Veluterni, who took their parts: there came also aid from Lavinium and Antium. Where the Roman Consul, albeit he had the better hand in skirmishes, yet so that there remained behind a new piece of service about the City itself Pedum, and the Camp of their Confederates which was adjoynted close to the Town: all of a sudden he gave over the war unfinished, because he heard that triumph was decreed unto his brother Consul. He also himself returned to Rome, and called earnestly for triumph before victory. At which untimely and covetous desire of his, the Nobles being offended, denied him: that unless he either forced Pedum by assault, or won it by composition he should not triumph. Hereupon Amilius being discontented and alienated from the Senat, bare his Consulship afterwards, like to the seditious Tribunes. For so long as he was Consul he ceased not to charge and accuse the Nobles before the people; and his Colleague no whit gainst him as being himself one of the Commons. He took occasion of these accusations upon this, that the lands in the Latine and Falerin Countries, were divided in pinching and scant measure among the Commons. And after that the Senat, desirous to atone the time of the Consuls government, had decreed that a Dictator should be declared against the Latine rebels: Amilius (whose turn it was at that time to govern) nominated his own companion in office to be Dictator, by whom Junius Brutus was named General of the horse. This Dictatorship was popular: and altogether framed to the humour of the common people: both by reason of sundrous and accusatory Invektives made against the Nobles; and for that it enacted three Statutes, most favourable and pleasing to the Commons, and as cross and adverse to the Nobility: first, That the Acts devised and enacted by the Commons, should bind all the Citizens or Citizens of Rome: secondly, That all laws which were proposed, and to pass by the Statutes of the Centuries, before the Scrutiny began, and their voices gathered, the Nobles should show and approve: thirdly, That so far as they were come thus far already, that both the Censors might be of the Commons, now one Censor at the least should be a Commoner of necessity. Inasmuch as the Nobles thought verily that there was more lost at home this year by these Consuls and Dictator, than gained to the Empire abroad, by their victories and warlike exploits.

In the year following when C. Furius Camillus and Q. Minus were Consuls, to the end that Amilius the Consul of the former year, might be more notably reproached for the quitting and letting slip of a victory that should have been achieved in this year, the Senat began to murmur therefore a countermine, and platforms, and rolling frames, mounted against the walls but as good hap was by an opportunity that fell out, they had no use of these munitions and fabrics. For M. Fabius a Roman prisoner, taking advantage of the negligence of his keepers upon a festival holiday, and making means to break his bonds, let himself down by a long cord, fastened at one end to a pinacle or battlement of the wall, and slid by the arms, among the munitions and fabrics of the Romans: who so perished and prevailed with the General that he caused him to give an assault upon the enemies, now being fast asleep, as having filled their bellies with wine and good meat. So that with as little ado were the Antoniens and their City surprised, as they were alone vanquished in fight. A great booty of pillage was there got: and after a garriſon placed at Cales, the Legions were brought back to Rome. The Consul by decree of the Senate triumphed: and that Aspidius should not be without his glory too, both Coff, were appointed to lead forth an Army against the Sidicins: but before they went, they were appointed by a decree of the Senate, L. Emilius Mamercus to be Dictator, to hold the election of Consuls. Who named Q. Fulvius Philo for his General of horsemen.

In this Election, holden by this Dictator, there were created Consuls, T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumius, Who albeit there remained some part behind of the Sidicins yet to the intent they might gratify the Commons by some good turn, and prevent their longing before they spake themselves: proposed an Act concerning the bringing of a Colony to Cales: and when as the Senate had ordained that two thousand and five hundred men should be enrolled and assigned thither: they created Triumvirs for to bring them thither, and to divide the lands, namely, C. Duellius, T. Quinctius, and M. Fabius. After this, the new Consuls having received the army of the old, entered into the enemies confines waiting all before until they came to the very walls of their City. Now, for that the Sidicins had assembled a puissant army, and seemed themselves fully resolved and bent upon utter despair to put all unto the last adventure, and to fight it out to the last man, Moreover, because it was notified that all Sammum was risen up in arms: by authority from the Senate the Consuls appointed P. Cornelius Rufinus Dictator, and M. Antonius was nominated General of the horie. But hereupon grew again another scruple, that there was some error escaped in the creation: so they resigned up their places, and because there ensued also a plague hereupon (as if all their Auspices for Elections of Magistrates had been touched and infected with that error: and default) the managing of all affairs fell to an Interregis. Which being now ended upon by the fifth Interregis, M. Valerius Corvinus, then Consuls were created, L. Corneliust the second time and Cn. Domitius.

When all things else were at quiet, the rumour of the Gauls war was so ripe and hot, that it was taken for a very Tumult, Whereupon it was thought good, that a Dictator should be created. And M. Papirius Crassus was nominated who had P. Valerius Publicola for General of the horsemen. When they had mustered the soldiers more thoroughly and with greater regard than would have been for wars near hand, the espials who were sent out, brought word that all was well and quiet among the Gauls. But suspected it was that Sammum now the second year was ready to drop out of their allegiance and seek a change. Whereupon the Roman Army was not withdrawn out of the Sidic in country. Howbeit the war of Alexander King of Egypt, drew the Sammis into the Lucans country, which two nations uniting their forces, gave the King a battle, as he made rodes from Pessus. In which conflict Alexander having got the upper hand, entered into a League and amity with the Romans: although it was much doubted with what faithfulness he would observe the same, if all his affairs prospered as well. The same year was a solemn Levy or Numbering of the people of Rome held: and the new Citizens were matriculated and enrolled: and therefore two Tribes were annexed, Alia and Capia: the Levies that ordained them: were Publ. Philo and Sp. Posthumius. The Acerrians became Roman Citizens, by an act proposed by L. Papirius the Praetor: by virtue whereof they were enfranchised Denizens: but without the privilege of giving voices. These were the acts for this year both at home and abroad.

The year next following (were it through the unkind distemperature of the air, or by some wicked practise of man) was inauspicious when M. Claudius Marcellus and T. Veturius were Consuls. I find the surname of this Consul to vary in divers Chronicles, in some Flaccus, in others Pinus. But it matters not much whether be true, I his rather I could willingly have wished (and yet all Authors do not record it) that it had been falsely recorded. That those perils by sorcery and poison were made away, whose death hath defamed that year with the note of a pestilence. But yet is the thing is left in writing, I purpose to deliver it: lest that I should seem to derogate ought from the credence of any writer. When as the chief personages of the City died upon like diseases, and after one and the same manner of symptoms a certain chamber-maid presented her self to Q. Fabius Maximus (being for the time an Edile of State) and professed to know the cause of that public and contagious malady: if she might be assured by faithful promise from him: that by the utterance thereof, she should not come to harm nor trouble. Forthwith Fabius delivered this matter to the Consuls: and the Consuls made relation thereof to the Senate: by the consent of which State assurance was made accordingly unto the party aforesaid, to reveal the matter. Then she declared that by the lewd and malicious wickedness of women the City was thus afflicted: and namely, That certain Dames of Rome, even their own wives, boiled and tempered rank poisons, (to kill their husbands) and if they would follow it presently they might be taken to the manner. So they went straight-wies with the wench, and found some women as they were

A seething and preparing venomous drugs, yes and some poysoned confections already put up. Which were brought into the market place, and about 20. of those dames, with whom the poysons were found, were sent for by a Sergeant. Two of them Cornelia and Sergia, both noble women born, stoutly standing upon these terms, and stiffly avouching, That they were forever innocent innocents and whosoever for the body of man were by the chamber-maid aforesaid consuted, and enjoined to drink thereof, that they might disprove her, and make her a liar, and to have devised of her own fingers ends this false slander. Who took a time to commune and confer together, that the people were avoided aside to make them way. Now when as in sight of all the World, these two Dames had propounded the matter to the rest there in place, they also refused not: and by having drunk the poysoned potion, they all perished by their own mischievous practise. Then presently were their complices apprehended, who detected and discovered a great number of other Wives: of which 170. were condemned. Never afore that day was there any inquisition nor procces at Rome, about poysoning and sorcery. So as the thing was taken for a prodigious wonder, and imputed rather to their minds, beloveted and bewitched, then to any felonious intent of theirs. Whereupon the Magistrates of the City, calling to mind and searching the old Chronicles, found, that in times past, at what time as the Commons in a mad fit withdrew themselves and departed the City: there was a spike or great nail driven and fixed by the Dictator: and that the minds of the people, which by discord had been distracted and out of their right wits, were by that ceremonial satisfaction, brought again in good tune: and therefore it was thought good, that for the salting or sticking up of such a nail, there should a Dictator be created. So Cn. Quintilius was nominated, who named L. Valerius General of horsemen, who so soon as the nail was fastened, gave over their places.

Consuls then were created, L. Papirius Crassus the second time, and L. Plantius Vindex. In the beginning of which year, there came from the country of the Volscians as Embassadors to Rome, the Fabratens and Lucans, making request that they would take them into their protection, promising that if by them they were defended from the forces of the Sammis, they would become loyal and obedient subjects to the people of Rome: Then were Embassadors sent from the Senat, to give commandment to the Sammis, to forbear doing any violence upon the borders of those nations. Which embassy sped well and took place: not so much for that the Sammis desired peace, as because they were not as yet ready prepared for war. The same year began the Privernatus war. The confederates whereof, were the Fundans, and their Leader likewise a Fundan, one Virginius Vaccus, a man of great name and reputation, not only in his own country, but also at Rome. His dwelling house stood sometime in mount Palatine, even the very same, which after the building was pulled down, and the ground forfeit and confiscated, was called Vaccus Prata. Against whom as he waited and spoiled far and near the Setin, Norban and Coran countries, L. Papirius went forth with a power, and rested noisier from his very camp. But Privernus neither had the wit to keep himself within his trench against a mightier enemy, nor yet the heart to encounter far from his fort. But having put his soldiers in battle array, before they were all well out of the gate of the camp, whilst the soldiers had more mind to flee backward, then march forward and encounter the enemy: without either advice or confident courage he fought: and with as little ado, and without any question of the matter he was vanquished: so by reason of the shortness of the way, and the ease retire into the camp to heer, he found no great trouble to save his soldiers from much slaughter. For in the very conflict, few or none in a manner were slain, and not many in the preps of the rout and tail of the flight, at what time as they rushed into their camp. And in the beginning of the night, the army thus discomfited, made haste to Privernum, there to defend themselves within a wall rather than a trench. Plantius the other Goff, having from Privernum, overrun and foraged the territory, and driven booties away, conducted his army into the Fundan country. The Senat of the Fundans as he entered into their confines met him, saying: "They were not come as Orators to entreat either for Privernum, or for those that took his part: but for the people of the Fundans: who that they were innocent and not culpable for this war, Privernus himself hath plainly proved and declared, in that he chose Privernum to be his place of retreat and refuge, and not the City Fundi, the very place of his nativity." And therefore at Privernum the enemies of the people of Rome were to be fought for and pursued, who unmindful of both their own countries, had revolved as well from the Fundans as the Romans. As for the Citizens of Fundi, they were at peace with Rome, nay, they were Romans in heart, and carried thankful remembrance of a benefit received: they entreated therefore and besought the Consul to forbear hostility with a guiltless people: assuring him that their Lands, their City, their own Bodies, their Wives and Children were and should be at the devotion of the people of Rome. The Consul after that he had commended the Fundans, and sent letters to Rome that they remained firm and fast in their allegiance, turned his way to Privernum. But before he dislodged (as Cladius writeth) the Consul executed those that were the heads of the conspiracy, and three hundred and fifty of those rebellious conspirators were sent prisoners to Rome. But the Senat accepted it not, and were not content with that submission, as judging the Fundan people, desirous to be excused and discharged, with the punishment of the needy and base sort of people. Now when as Privernum was besieged and invested with two Consular Armies, the one of the Consuls was called home, to hold the Election of Magistrates. That year were elected in the great race called Circus, the Barriers from whence the horses and their charriots are let forth, when their prizes. But before they were well past the care of the Privernats war, there arrived a terrible and fearful brute of the Gauls war, which never was regarded slightly of the Nobles of Rome. Inconveniently therefore the new Consuls, L. Emilius Mamercus, and Cn. Plautius, on that very day, namely, on the * Calends of July, wherein they entered their offices, were commanded to determine and agree between themselves upon their Provinces: and Mamercus, who had the charge of the Gauls war, levied and enrolled an army without allowing any immunity and exemption from warfare. Moreover and besides, even the poor handicrafts men and artificers, such as keep their shops, and live by sedentary occupations, a sort far unfit for martial service, are said to have been called forth, and prest to the wars: and a mighty army was assembled and met together at Veii, that from thence they might march to encounter the Gauls: For it was thought good that they should now go farther forward, for fear lest the enemy taking another way, might deceive them and march directly to the City of Rome. But a few days after, when it was known for certain that all the trouble and fear for that time was overblown, they diverted their forces from the Gauls, and bent all against Privernum. But the issue hereof is reported two manner of ways, some write that the City was forced by assault, and that Privernus came alive into their hands: others, that before the utmost extremity of assault was used, they of their own accords, carrying before them white wands in token of peace, yielded themselves unto the Consul: and that Privernus by his own Country men was rendered and delivered unto him. The Senat being moved, and their opinion asked concerning Privernus and the Privernats; sent for the Consul Plautius to triumph, after that he had dismantled the walls of Privernum and there placed a strong garrison: and they gave order in the mean time that Privernus should be kept fast in prison until the Consul return, thence to be whipped and put to death. They appointed also that his habitation in Palatium should be pulled down, and his goods consecrated to their Lord Semo Sancus. And look what money [of brass] was raised thereof, it served to make brazen round Plates, which were offered and set up in the Chapel of Sancus towards the temple of Quirinus. Touching the Senat of the Privernats, thus it was decreed, that every one of the Senators calling, who remained at Privernum after their revolting from the Romans, should in the same condition and state as the Veliterns, be confined beyond Tyberis, and there dwell. These Aeds being thus set down, there was no more talk of the Privernats until the triumph of Plautius. After the triumph, the Consul having executed Privernus and his complices, supposing now that he might safely propound the cause of the Privernats, to the LL. of the Senat, whiles they were newly satisfied with the execution of the guilty offenders. "Since that (quoth he) my LL. of the Senat, the principal authors of this revolt and rebellion, have both at the hands of the immortal gods, and at yours, suffered now already condign punishment: what is your further pleasure, and what shall be done with the innocent and harmless multitude? For my part verily, although I be rather to demand your opinions than deliver mine own: yet seeing the Privernats next neighbors unto the Samnites, with whom we now at this time entertain a most uncertain and slippery peace, I would have as little grudge and rancor left as may be, between us and them. As the question in it self was doubtful and ambiguous, whiles men gave advice some to proceed cruelly, others to deal gently, according to each man his nature and inclination: so, there was one of the Privernat Embassadors that made it more doubtful, and put all out of square: a man mindful of that state wherein he was born, more than of his present need and extremity. Who being demanded of one (that had spoken to the point, and delivered some sharp sentence and heavy sentence against them) What punishment he judged the Privernats deserved? Marry (quoth he) that which they deserve, who deem themselves worthy of liberty and freedom. At whose stout and arrogant answer, when the Consul saw those to be more eagerly and bitterly bent, who before impugned the cause of the Privernats: to the end that he himself by some mild and gentle demand might draw from the party more modest language: What (quoth he) if we should remit and pardon your punishment: what kind of peace might we hope to have at your hands? If (quoth he) ye offer us good peace, ye shall find it on our part loyal and perpetual: but if ye tender hard conditions of peace, ye shall have it left but a small while. But then one gave out, that the Privernat began to threaten plainly: and said moreover, that such speeches were enough to stir up any peaceable and quiet people to war, that never thought to have fought. But the better part of the Senat drew forth his answers to a better sense, and said that it was the speech of a man, and of a man free born. For, was it credible (quoth they) that any state, nay, any particular person, would longer abide (than needs he must) that condition which he himself and goeth against his stomach? There only is peace sure and like to hold, wherein men are contented and will ing to keep themselves in peace: and never let men look or hope to find faithful loyalty, where they will impose thraldom and servitude. And to this purpose the Consul himself especially moved and inclined their hearts, reiterating these words to the Senators that were first to give their opinions, and that so loud, as he might of many more be overheard. That they above all other, and none but they indeed were worthy to be made Roman Citizens: who minded and esteemed nothing in the world, but their freedom. Whereupon, both in the Senat they obtained their suit: and also by the authority of the LL. a Bill was exhibited to the people, That the Privernats might be enfranchised Romans.

The same year were three hundred sent as a Colony, to inhabit Astur: and had two Acres of ground a peece allowed them. The year following was memorable in no respect, either of home

A home affairs of forraign, in the time of P. Plantius Proculus, and P. Cornelius Scipio Coss. Only this fell out that year, that in Fregella (which sometime was in the territory of the Siditins, and after, of the Volscians) there was a Colony planted and unto the people there was given a drible of distribution of raw flesh amongst them, by Atinius Flavus, at the funeral of his mother. Some there were that thought, how under a colour of honoring his mother, he destroyed and paid unto the people a deserved hire & reward, in that when he was by the Aediles arrested & brought to his answer for adultery committed with a Dame or married Wife in the City, the people had by their voices acquit him. This drible given for a favour paid at his trial, was the occasion also of a dignity following: for in the next Election, notwithstanding he were absent, he was preferred to the Tribunship of the Commons, even before those Competitors that were present in place.

There fell sometime the City Palapolis, not far from thence whereas now Naples standeth. In those two Cities, one and the same people inhabited, defended and deriving their beginning from Amur, and the Cumans fetch their off-spring from Chalcis in Euboea. With that fleet where, in they sailed from their own country, they were able to do much at sea, and were mighty upon those coasts where they dwelt. And first landing in the Islands Stenaria and Puteusula, afterwards they adventured to seat themselves in the main and continent. This City relying and trusting in their own power, as well as presuming upon the faithless and disloyal society of the Samnites with the Romans, or bearing themselves bold upon the rumor that ran of a pestilence that rained in the City of Rome, wrought much mischief and hostility against such Romans as inhabited the Campania and Faern Countries. Whereupon, when as (in the time of Lucius Cornelius Lentulus, and Quintus Publilius Philo Consuls, the second time) there were Factions fell to Palapolis, for to demand restitution again, and a proud answer returned back from the Greeks, a Nation more stout and valiant in tongue then in deed and execution: by the authority of the Senat, the people decreed, that there should be war made upon the Palapolitans. And when as the Consul had divided their provinces between themselves, it fell to Publius his turn to war upon those Greeks. Cornelius with another army was opposed against the Samnites, if they should hap to fly any way. For the report went, that they looking and expecting assuredly the revolt of the Campanians, would encamp neerer and join with them. There, Cornelius thought it best to keep a standing camp. The Senat was certified from both Consuls, That they had small hope of peace with the Samnites. Publius gave intelligence, that two thousand Nolan soldiers, and four thousand Samnites, were rather by the compulsion and importunity of the Nolans, than with the good will of the Greeks, received at Palapolis. At Rome it was for certain known, that in Samnium there were new mutters taken by the Magistrates direction, and that the whole country, and the people adjoining, were raised, and out in arms. Moreover, That the Privernats, Fundans, and Formians were without all dissimulation solicited and moved to rebel. Upon which causes, it was advised by the Senat, first to send Embassadors to the Samnites, before they made war: and from them they had an insolent answer, and they themselves made quarrel, and charged the Romans with wrongs offered first: and nevertheless they justified themselves for any thing by them done, and answered all objections that were laid against them full stoutly. "Namely, that the Greeks were not aided by any public counsel or order of theirs, nor yet were the Fundans and Formians by them solicited, as who need not be ashamed of their own power, but thought themselves sufficient enough to war if they listed. Thus much moreover, they could not dissimble, but speak it out in plain terms, That the Nation and Senat of the Samnites take it in ill part, that the people of Rome had re-edified and repaired Fregella, a town by them conquered, and won from the Volscians, and by them laid ruinat: and not only so, but they had placed a Colony also in the Samnites Country, which the inhabitants called Fregella. Which continually and reproachful injury, unless they that were the authors thereof would do their best to abolish and cancel, they would with all their might and main repell it from them. And when as the Roman Embassador made a motion, and would have had them to put the matter for to be decided unto the common Confederates and friends of both parties: What double and indirect dealing is this (quoth the Samnites?) What juggling is here to no purpose? As for the quarrels and differences between us (O ye Romans) neither the babbling words of Embassador, nor yet any days-man or arbitrator, but the very Campaign field, wherein we must encounter in earnest, even dint of sword, and the spears point, and the doubtful chance of battle shall determine. And therefore encamp we between Capua and Suessula, in the sight of one another, and let us then try the issue, whether Samnite or Roman shall be Lord of Italy. The Embassadors of Rome made answer, that they were not to go whether the enemy called them, but whither their General and Captains led them. In this mean while Publius had already got a convenient piece of ground, between Palapolis and Naples, and thereby impeached the enemies of the mutual intercourse of succors from the one to the other, which they had used reciprocally, as either place had need, and was distressed. Therefore, when as the time of Election of Magistrates at Rome drew on apace, and expedient it was not for the Common-weal that Publius (now approaching neer the enemies walls, and ready to assault) should be called away from the hope which daily he had of winning the City: the Tribuns were dealt withal, to propose an Act unto the people, That when the time of Pub. Philo his Consulship should be expired, he might in quality and name of Proconsul, remain in government until the war with the Greeks were fully ended, and unto L. Cornelius were letters sent, implying thus much. That whereas it was not thought good, that he now being entred into Saminius, should be called away from the chief push of the war, he should nominate a Dictator to be President of the Election of Magistrates: Who named M. Claudius Marcellus, and by him was appointed for General of horse Sp. Postumius. Yet for all this, was no assembly for the said election, holden by the Dictator. For it came in question, Whether he were rightly created or no. And the Angurs being hereabout consulted with, pronounced; "That the Dictator seemed not created aright. But the Tribuns discredited and made suspicious; and infamous, by their accusatory speeches, this their sentence and declaration, saying, That neither it was safe to know the fault and error in the creation, seeing that the Consul nominated the Dictator in the beginning of the still night, neither had the Consul written to any man publicly or privately thereof, nor yet was there any person could come forth and say, that he either saw or heard ought, that might not interrupt the Auspices, nor yet could the Angurs sitting at Rome, guess and divine, what error had happened to the Consul in the camp so far off. And who saw not (say they) that the Angurs found fault herewith, because the Dictator Elected was a Commoner? These and other such allegations were (to no purpose) by the Tribuns given out. For the matter grew to an interregnum, and the forelaid Election being still put off and adjourned for one cause or other; at length the fourteenth Interregnum, L. Emilius created Consuls, C. Postumius, and L. Papirius, (surnamed Macilanus or Curser, as I find in other Chronicles.

In that year it was recorded, that the City Alexandria in Egypt was founded: and that Alexander the King of Epirus was murdered by a certain Lucan, a banished person, to verify the Oracle of Jupiter Dodoneus, which had foretold his death. For when he was sent for into Italy by the Tarentines, he had warning given him, [To take heed of the Acherusian Water, and the City Pandusia, for there it was his destiny to end his days:] and therefore, with more speed he passed over into Italy, to be as far off as might be, from the City Pandusia in Epirus, and the river Acheron which issuing out of Molossia into the lower Meers and Lakes, discharge it self, and falleth into the Theoprotian Gulf. Howbeit (as commonly it is seen when men seek mozt to flee and avoid their fatal death, they run headlong and plunge themselves into it) he, having oftentimes vanquished and overthrow the legions of the Brutians and Lucans: won by force Heraclea Colony of the Tarentines, and Consentia in Lucania, and Sipontum, and also Acerria a Colony of the Brutians, and other Cities afterwards of the Messapians and Lucans: sent into Epirus three hundred Noble houses and families, whom he meant to keep as hostages: he encamped not far from Pandusia, a City situate near to the Confines of the Lucans and Brutians. And there he held three his somewhat distant asunder, from whence he might make excursions and rides into every part of his enemies country: and he had in ordinary about him almost 200, banished men of the Lucans, for his sure trusty guard: who notwithstanding (as the natures are of such for the mozt part) changed with every wind, and carried mutable minds according to the variety of fortune. Now it fell out so, that the continual rains which overflowed all the fields, had foreclosed and stopped the passages three ways between his armies, so as they could not help one another: whereby these two garrisons where the King was not in person, were surprized by the unexpected coming of the enemies: who having put them all to the sword, turned their whole forces to besiege the King. From whence, there were by the Lucan exiles, messengers sent to their own countreimen: whom the name of the rest capitulated, that if they might be restored again, they would deliver the King either dead or alive into their hands. Howbeit he himself with an elect number of men, made noble and hardy adventure, and brake through the midst of the enemies: and encountering the chief Commander of the Lucans hand to hand, killed him outright: and having rallied his men neart together, who were scattered asunder in fight, he came at length to a river, which by the fresh ruins of a broken bridge, that the violence of that water had born down, shewed passage. Which as the army passed over at an unknown and blind foord, one souldier wearied with heat and travel, cursing and detesting the unlucky and abominable name of the River, returned to say, Thou hast not thy name? Acheron for naught: which word when it came once to the King's ear, he presently began to think and muse of his final end; and there stayed still in a deep suspense whether he shall pass over or no. Then Scipio, one of the Kings servants and liegemen, asked him why he lingered and made delay, being in so great a peril and jeopardy as he was? and shewed him withal, how the Lucans intended to play false with him, and sought opportunity to forelay and do him a mischief. With that the King looked behind him, and espied them afar off in troop coming against him: whereupon he drew his sword, put his horse to it, took the River, and rode through the midst thereof; and when he was now so far passed that he was ready to take the land, one of those banished Lucans landed a dart aloof at him, and struck him quite through. Whereupon he fell down dead with the dart sticking in his body, and the stream carried it down as far as to the Corps de guard of the enemies. Where his breathless corps was shamefully misused and mangled. For they having cut it cross the middle, sent the one half to Consentia, and kept the other with themselves still, to practise a thousand villanies upon it. And as they shot and flung stones at it afar off, a certain woman being amongst this outrageous multitude (raging beyond all measure of anger and malice that mans heart can devise or believe) after she had besought them to forbear a while, with her eyes gushing out tears full unto them, That her husband and children were prisoners, and in the hands of the enemies: but she hoped with the Kings body, howsoever it were abused and martyred, to redeem them again. This slayed them from farther mangling thereof: Thus all that was left of the Kings body, by the means of one only woman, was burnt at Consentia: and his bones sent back afterwards to the enemies unto Metapontum, and from thence conveyed to Epirus, unto Cleopatra his wife, and his sister Olympias; whereof the one was sister, the other Mother to Alexander the Great. Thus much concerning the woful and unhappy end of Alexander the King of Epirus. Whole Albania fortune albeit was such, that he came short, and was cut off before he intermedd in the Roman war, yet because he warred in Italy, let it suffice that briefly by the way I have touched his story.

The same year there was a Levellment at Rome, (which was the first after the foundation and Building of that City) for the pacifying of the same gods as heretofore. Afterwards the new Consuls by the ordinance and direction of the people, sent defiance and proclaimed war against the Samnites. And as they themselves made greater preparation every way than against the Greeks, so they had besides new aids, whereof (as then) they least thought of: The Lucans and the Apulians (nations which to that day had no dealing nor commerce at all with the Romans) became their friends and loyal Allies, offering men and munition toward that war. Whereupon they were by some of Covenant and league entertained and received into their amity. At the same time also the Romans had good success in the Samnites quarters: for three towns there yielded unto them, and they became Masters thereof, to wit, Alife, Califis, Raffinum: all the territory besides at the first coming of the Consul, was pillaged and spoiled far and near. These exploits thus prosperously achieved, the other enterprise also of besieging the Greeks, was well followed and at the point of an end. For over and besides, that by certain sconces and blockades between the enemies forts and forces, one part was cut from the other; they endured also within their own walls, much more misery and calamity, than the enemy menaced and threatened without: and as if they had been captives to their own garrison souldiers, whom they had called to them for their defence, they suffered infinite villanies, and indignities in the persons as well of their wives as of their children, and even the hardest extremities, that follow upon Cities torched by the enemy. And therefore when it was noised abroad, that there were new succours coming from Tarentum and the Samnites: they supposed that for Samnites, there were already within their walls more of them than they would marry, as for Tarentines they looked willingly for their help, as Greeks both the one & the other, hoping by their means that they might as well withstand the outrages of the Samnites and Nolans, as the Romans their open and professed enemies. Last of all, of many inconveniences that they were driven unto, the least and easiest was thought, to yield simply unto the Romans, Cherilus and Nymphis two great men and the chief personages of the City, having laid their heads and plotted one with the other, so parted the matter between themselves, that the one should flie unto the Roman General, and the other stay behind, to find some opportunity, and minister ready means to render the City according to their designation. Cherilus was the man who presented himself unto Philo, and said unto him, "To the good and happy fortune be it said and done of the Palaeopolitans and the people of Rome, I am determined to deliver and surrender the City into your hands: in which Action, whether I may be thought to have betrayed or saved my country, it resteth only in the trust and fidelity of the Romans. As for myself privately, I am come neither to indent, nor yet to crave ought at all: but publicly in the behalf of the City, I would rather by way of petition request, than article and capitulate, thus much, That if this enterprise intended, speed well and take effect, the people of Rome would think and consider, in what affection, endeavour and jeopardy, our City returneth again into their amity, rather than upon what folly and rashness, it brake their allegiance and revolted. Then, after he had been bidden welcom by the General, entertained with good and gracious words, and highly commended, he received 3000, souldiers, to keep, surprize, and to seize that quarter of the City, where the Samnites were lodged, and which they held: of this regiment and garrison, L. Quintius a Colonel had the conduct. During this time, Nymphis also did his parts and dealt so creditably under hand with the Pretor of the Samnites, that he induced and wrought him to this point, That for as much as all forces, were either about Palaeopolis or in Saminius, he would permit him with the fleet to call about to the Roman coasts, for that he intended to forage and waste, not only the maritime parts, but the territories also adjoining to the City: and the better to deceive the enemy (quoth he) I had need to go by night, and therefore the Ships presently must launch forth, and be let aloft. And to effect this more speedily, all the youth of the Samnites besides the necessary garrison of the City, was sent to the shoar. Where whiles Nymphis in the dark, and amongst the multitude that hindered one another purposely, spent time in letting compassedly, some to this and others to that, Cherilus, according to the compact before, was by his associates received into the City: and having filled the highest places of the town with Roman souldiers, commanded to set up a shout, whereat the Greeks upon a secret token given them by their Captains, kept themselves still and quier. The Nolans then, at the backside of the town, escaped and fled by the high way, that leadeth to Nola. And the Samnites being excluded out of the town, as they had a more readier mean to flie for the present, so they found it, after they were past danger, a more shameful disgrace. For, they were disarmed and naked men, they had left all the good they had amongst the enemies, and returned home spoiled, naked and needy and served for a laughing stock and derision, not only to other nations, but also to their own neighbors and countreimen. Albeit I am not ignorant that there is another opinion opinion, whereby it is given out that Palapolis was by the Samnites betrayed: yet as I have credited and followed herein such authors, as me thinks it they should not deliver a truth; for so I am induced the rather to believe that the Neapolitans returned into amity with the Romans, because of the league extant in their name (for unto them afterwards the State and chief fear of the Greeks was translated.) Unto Publius was decreed a triumph, for that it appeared clearly and was believed constantly, that by his siege the enemies were tamed, and so continued to come to a composition and surrender. Two special favours hapned to this man above all others before him, namely the prerogative of his government, not granted to any man a lifetime; and triumph after his Magistracy was expired.

Upon the tail of this war, arose another with the Greeks of the other tract or coast. For the Tarentins having born the Palapolitans in hand a good while, and fed them with a vain hope of help, when they heard once that the Romans were possessed of their City, complained themselves like men forsaken, and not as those who had forsaken others, much blaming the Palapolitans, and with anger and envy raging against the Romans. Disquieted also they were, for that news came that the Lucans and Apulians (for both these nations that year began to contract alliances) were under the protection of the Romans. For now (say they) they are well near come unto us, and shortly we shall grow to this pass, that we must acknowledge the Romans for our Lords, or have them our heavy friends. And verily the trial and hazard of our estate, dependeth only upon the Samnites war; and the event thereof, which nation alone, and the same nothing mighty, remaineth now: since that the Lucans are gone and re-joined to the Romans: who yet might be reclaimed and moved to shake off the society with the Romans, if any fear were wrought and practised to some discord and dissention between them. These devices and overtures took place and prevailed with such, as were desirous of change and novelty: in so much as certain of the Lucan youth (better known, than trusted and reputed honest, amongst their countrymen and fellow Citizens, hired also for a sum of money) whipped one another with rods, came naked into the assembly of the Citizens, and with open mouth cried out aloud and said, that for presuming only to come into the Roman camp they were by the Consil, thus scourged, & escaped narrowly the losing of their heads. The thing it self piteous and unmeetly to behold, as bearing a shew rather of wrong done unto them, than of any malicious & subtil practice by them intended, stirred the people up, for e their Magistrates with their uncallant out-cries to assemble a Council. Some standing round about the Senate in council, call hard for war against the Romans: others run up and down to raise the multitude of Peasants to take arms; and in this stir and uproar, which was able to disquiet and amaze even those that were well minded, a decree passed; that the league with Samnites should be renewed, and Embassadors dispatched forthwith, to the same purpose. This was a sudden change; and as it had no colour of cause for carried final credit with it amongst the Samnites, who forced the Lucanians to give hostages and to take garrisons into their fortresses: and they, blinded with anger, and inveigled with flattery, refused nothing. But shortly after began the fray to appear and then it self manifest, after that the authors and devisers of these false surmises and flanders, were retired to Tarentum; but having put themselves out of all, and being not at liberty to dispose of their own affairs they had nothing else left them, but like fools to repent in vain.

That year hapned to the Commons of Rome another beginning of their liberty: in that they were no more either bound in chains, or held in thralldom by their creditors, which privilege against poor debtors was altered, by occasion of the filthy lust and notorious cruelty of one Ulfior. And L. Papius was the man unto whom C. Publilius for his fathers debt became bound, and consigned him; this prisoner, who a tender age and lovely favor which might and should have moved pity, inflamed the mind of this Ulfior to unkind lust and shameful contumely: for making full accounts that the prime and flower of his youth should satisfy and pay for the interest of the debt, he first began to allure and entice unto him the youth with wanton & unchaste speeches; afterwards feeling that his ears abhorred to hear such filthiness, he set to minatory words, & ever and anon put him in mind of his present condition wherein he stood; but lost of all perceiving by him, that he stood more upon his honor and freedom by birth, then respected his hard estate by fortune, he caused him to be stripped naked and whipping him to be beaten unto him. The poor stripping thus piteously rent and torn, ran forth into the open street, complained of the filthy lust & cruelty of his creditor. Whereupon a number of people, kindled as well with pity and commiseration of the stripping, and indignity of the injury, as also in regard of their own ease, and of their children; came running into the Forum a common place, and so from thence in a long train to the court of the Council. The Consils upon this sudden uproar were forced to call a Senate; and as the Senators entered into the Council chamber they lay all prostrate at their feet: as they passed by, one after another, & showed unto them the young mans back and sides in what it king they were. And that one day, by occasion of the outrageous enormity of one person, broke the neck of that mighty bond, whereby, that day the creditors had their debtors in danger unto them. For the Consil, had in charge, to propose unto the people, that from thence forward, no prison whatsoever, unless he had committed some heinous fact, and until he were to suffer therefore, should be either kept in fetters and givens, or stretched upon the rack, Ita, that for less money, the goods of the debtor and not the body should be obliged. So that wher ever in bondage became released and enlarged: and order was taken for the time to come, that none should be imprisoned by their creditors again.

The same year, whilst the Samnites war of itself alone, besides the sudden revolt of the Lucans, together

A together with the Tarentins the hatches thereof, held the Senators of Rome in care and perplexity enough: behold over and above all these, the Veltin people, as a succedent to their troubles, joined and banded with the Samnites. Which new occurrence, as for that year it rather maintained this discord amongst men in their ordinary way every where, than minitied cause of serious debating in public Council: to the Consils of the year following, L. Furius Camillus the second time, and Jun. Brutus Scaevola, thought no one thing more important than it, and needful to be treated of in the Senate, with the Consil. And albeit the thing were but new, and a breeding, yet so greatly were the LL. hereabout troubled, that they feared needs to begin to take in hand, then to neglect it altogether, and not to see it: doubting, lest if they were let go unpunished, the neighboring nations would grow too lusty and proud: and again, if they seemed to chastise them by war the rest for fear of the like measure, might be provoked to anger, take arms, and enter into a general rebellion. And all, and every one of them, namely, the Marians, the Pelignians and Marrucians: were in terms of arms comparable and equal to the Samnites every way which nations they might be sure to have their enemies, if they medled with the Veltins, and troubled them once never to little. Howbeit, that part prevailed and took place, which for the present seemed to carry more courage and valor, than sage advice and wisdom: but the ill use and event showed, that Fortune favoured Fortune. So the people by authority and direction of the Nobles decreed war against the Veltins: the charge whereof might by lot upon Brutus, and Sannius fell to Camillus. To both places were the armies conducted: and by the care and industry employed in the defence of the marches and frontiers the enemies were impeached: or joining their forces together, Howbeit the Consul Lucius Camillus, who had the greater and weightier charge laid upon him, turned to failgries only sick, and thereby could not follow the wars: who being commanded to nominate a Dictator, for to manage and conduct his affairs, declared the noblest warrior in those days, L. Papirius Cursor: by whom Q. Fabius Rutilianus was named General of the army, a couplet of great name and highly renowned for their worthy acts, at which in this government: but yet more famous and voiced abroad, by reason of variance and discord which fell between them: whereby they grew well near to the utmost terms of contending one another in all extremity. The other Consul warred with the Veltins many and sundry ways, but evermore with like fortune and happy success. For he foraged and wasted their country: and by piling, rising, and turning their houles and corn, forced them against their wills into the field: and in one battle to enciebed and abated the forces of the Veltins (but not without bloodshed of his own men) that his enemies not only fled into their camp; but also as not trusting now to their ramparts and trenchess, they were constrained to steal away into their towns, minding for to save themselves, as well by the natural situation of the places, as the strength of their good walls. In the end, he made a flank upon those walled Cities, purposing by force to win them. And first he gained Caserta by scaling, either through the exceeding courage of his soldiers, or their anger, being so chafed as they were at their hurts received: for that first they escaped out of the throng and skirmish, clear & not wounded. Then he likewise took Crotona and gave the pillage of both Cities to his soldiers. Neither gates nor walls could stand in their way and keep them out. But into Sannium the journey was undertaken by the Dictator with doubtful auspices and uncertain knowledge of the will of the gods. The default and terror whereof, took not effect in the main event and issue of the war, (for it was prosperous and fortunate) but turned to the rage and anger of the chief leaders, who fell out deadly one with another. For Papirius the Dictator, advised by the Pullarius, that had the custody and charge of the sacred Pullets, went back to Rome to take the Auspices, or the preface by the bird-flight again: and straightly charged his General of horse to keep himself close within his hold, and in no wise to give the enemies battle during his absence. But Fabius after the Dictators departure, advertised by the epicals that the enemies were even as careless as loose and disordered, as if there had been no Roman in Sannium: whether it were, that being a stout and lusty young Gentleman he took some scorn and thought it an indignity, that all should seem to rest in the Dictator only: or that he was induced with the good opportunity of doing some brave exploit (I wot not) but he went forth with an army in order of battle to Interbrinium (that was the places name) & there fought a field with the Samnites. But such was the happiness of this battle, that if the Dictator himself had been there in person it could not have been better managed. For neither Captain failed his soldiers, nor soldiers their Captain. The horsemen also under the leading of L. Corninius a Colonel by his place, (who sundry times charged and recharged again and could not with force break the enemies arrays) unbroke their horses, and so ran them off on the spur; that no strength was able to abide them: such an havoc, such a lane made they all about over armour and men. The footmen following this hot charge of the horse, advanced the engines against the enemies thus put in dismay: and twenty thousand men (by report) were that day slain. In some authors I find, that twice in the Dictators absence he fought, and twice had the upper hand. But in the most ancient writers I read but of one battle. In some Chronicles the whole matter is pulled over and let out clear. The General of the horse, having gained a mighty mass of spoil, as otherwise he could not chuse, upon so great a slaughter & miscre gathered together into one heap all the enemies armor made a fire under, & burned them: were it that he had made some such vow to one of the gods: or as I list rather to believe, it was a motive of Fabius himself, that the Dictator should not reap the fruit of his glory, and entitle his name thereto: in pomp carry those spoils before him at his triumph.

of Q. Fabius to his fellow soldiers.

Moreover, the letters of this victory by him sent to the Senat, and not a word thereof to the Dictator, were some proof, that he was not willing to impart and communicate his praises with him. But certainly, the Dictator took the matter in too ill part, that when every man else was joyful for this noble victory achieved, he only shewed anger and sadness in his very countenance. Whereupon suddenly he dissolved the Senat, and departed in great haste out of the court, giving out and often iterating these words: Then hath the matter of horsemen in deeds well exerted and overthrown, both Dictators Majesty and military discipline, as defeated the Samnites legions, if he can go clear away and escape unpunished, with so manifest contempt of my express commandment. Whereupon, full of threats and indignation, he halted to the camp, and took long journey: yet could he not prevent the bruit of his coming. For, there were Ventrurers that I polled from the City before, to bring word that the Dictator was coming, full of revenge, and let upon punishment, and at every second word almost, commending the late exemplary justice of T. Manlius. Then Fabius immediately calling an audience, beought the souldiers, that with what valour and vertue they had defended the Common-wealth from most deadly and mortal enemies, with the same they would protect him from the outrageous cruelty of the Dictator, himselfe (I say) by whose conduct and fortune they had gotten so glorious a victory. "For now, coming he is (quoth he) for envy out of his right wits, and beside himselfe: for anger at another mans manhood and felicity, furious and horn-mad: and all is no more but this, that in his absence, forsooth, we have lived well: who witheth rather in his heart, if he could change the course of fortune, that the Samnites had won the victory than the Romans: and nothing is for to rise in his mouth, as, That his commandment was contemned: as who would say, he forbad not batell with the same mind, wherein he now grieveth that we have fought. For as then his will was good, even for very envy to hinder and suppress the prowels of another, and went about to take weapons away from most forward souldiers, desirous of fight, that in his absence they might not lay hand to their sword: so now, see how he fretteth and fureth in great choller at this, that without L. Papirius the souldiers were not disarmed, dismembered as it were, and maimed: and for that Q. Fabius forgot not his place, but bare himselfe as General of the Cavalry, and not as a Servant and follower of the Dictator, standing at recit, and waiting at an inch when some under Captainship would fall, that he might step into the place. What would this man (think ye) have done, how would he have fretted, if (as the fortune and I doubtful chance of war oftentimes goeth) he had been put to the sword and lost the day: who now that the enemies be vanquished, the field is well fought, the State so well served, as by the most singular Captain in the world, better it might not be, thus menaceth execution to me the General of the horse, even in the honour of my conquest? Neither is he (my matters) cruelly bent and set upon mischief against the General of the horse more then against the Colonels, the Centiniers and common Souldiers: nay, he would (be ye sure) if he had been able, have ragged and lured as bitterly, yea, and executed his ire and furious rage upon all. But because he cannot, now he dischargeth his gall upon me alone. For even as envy, like a flaming fire, fear-cheth and mounreth up to the highest, to runneth he upon the chief Captain, and aimeth at the head of this worthy exploit. If he had once extinguished him, together with the glory of M. this brave service, then like a Conqueror and Lord over a poor captive army, whatsoever he might by law execute against a General of the Cavalry, he would attempt and extend, upon the simple souldiers. Make reckoning therefore, that instanding safe to me and in defence of my cause, ye uphold the liberty of all. For in case he shall perceive once, the same agreement of the army in the maintenance of the victory, which was well seen in the batell, and that ye all have a care and regard of the life and safety of one, his stomach will come down, his heart will relent and incline to clemency, and a milder sentence. To conclude, I recommend my life, and whole estate to your vertue and faithful protection. Then from all parts of the audience they cried unto him aloud & bade him take a good heart: for so long as the Legions of the Romans were safe, there should no perion do him harm or injury. Soon after came the Dictator, and presently by found of trumpet summoned a general assembly. And the publick Crier after an Orie made called by name for Q. Fabius General of the horse. Who so soon as he was come from a lower place where he was, and approached neere the Tribunal, (then quoth the Dictator) "I demand of thee Q. Fabius, since that the rule of the Dictator is soveraign and highest above all others, whereunto the Consuls erdined with kingly puissance and government, do obey yea, & Prætors created with the same authority that Consuls are: whether thou esteem it meet and right, that a General of horse should be obedient to his commandment or not demand likewise, whether I myselfe knowing that I took my journey and went from home with doubtful and uncertain auspices, ought to have put the mainstate of the Common-wealth in hazard against the order and religious observance in that behalf: and not rather, to go again to take new Auspices, that I might adventure & attempt nothing so long as I stood in doubt of the grace & favor of the gods? And withal, this I demand, whether the General of the horsemen could be feared, exempt & discharged of that scruple of conscience, which checked and stayed the Dictator from execution of his charge? But what mean I to make these demands? seeing that if he had departed without saying one word, yet thou shouldst have famed thy opinion and applied thy mind according to the interpretation of my will and pleasure? Why sayest thou nothing? Answer me I say, Forbad I thee not expressly, so do any thing in my absence? Forbad I not thee to fight with the enemies? How

tor to Q. Fabius.

A "How dost thou in contempt of my commandment, whiles our Auspices were uncertaine, & whiles our consciences were unrevolved and with scruples troubled, against Military customs & statutes, against the discipline of our ancestors, and against the will and direction of the gods: how durst thou, I say, be so hardy as to encounter with the enemy? To these interrogatories make answer directly. Answer I charge thee, to all these points, and nothing but these, and at the peril of thy life, not a word besides. Now come Sergeant and do thine office the while. To which severall Articles, when Fabius could not readily answer point by point, one while complaining that he had him for his accuser, who was the judge of his life and death: other whiles crying out aloud, that sooner might his life be taken from him, than the glory and honor of his Backs: and as he justified and excused his own self, so he began again to challenge and accuse [the Dictator.] Then Papirius being in more heat of choler than before, commanded the General of the horsemen to be stripped out of his cloaths and uncased, and the rods and axes to be brought forth ready. With that, Fabius calling earnestly for the help of the souldiers, whiles the officers were a tearing and renting his cloaths from his back, made means to retire himself into the ranks of the Triarii, who began already to make a mutiny and uproar in the assembly. From whence there arose an outcry over all the audience. Some were heard to intreat, others to threaten. They who threatened to stand next to the Tribunal, because that being within the view and eye of the Dictator, they might be known and noted, beought his Majesty to spare and pardon the General of the horse, and not with him to condemn the whole army. They that were farthest off in the skirt of the assembly, and especially that troop and company about Fabius, rated and cried out upon such a rigorous and merciless Dictator. And a little thing more would have made them mutiny: nay, within the very compass of the Tribunal all was not clear and quiet. The Lieutenants or Colonels of whole legions, standing about his seat or chair of state intreated him to put off the matter until the morrow: to give his choler some time to cool, and allow space and respite to consider of it with advice and counsel: saying, "That if Fabius had plaid a youthful part, he had paid sufficiently for it already, and his victory had received disgrace and dishonour enough. Befeeching him not to proceed to these extremities of utmost execution, nor to let such a brand and note of ignominy and shame upon the young Gentleman himself, so rare and gallant a Knight: or on his father, a most honourable and excellent personage, nor yet upon the noble house and name of the Fabii. But when they saw how little they prevailed by their prayers, and as little by any reasons they could alledge: then, they admonished him to have a regard to the furious assembly of the souldiers: and that it was not for a man of his years and wisdom, thus to put more fire to the hot stomach of Souldiers enkindled already, nor to admit of a more matter of mutiny: and if such a thing should happen, no man would impute the blame to Q. Fabius, who fought and humbly craved pardon of punishment, but to the Dictator: if he overcame with choler, should blindly so far pass himselfe in wilful peevishness, as to provoke the outrageous multitude against himself. Finally, that he should not think, how they laboured thus for any affectionate favour they bare to Q. Fabius; but were ready to take an oath, that they thought it not safe for the State and Common-wealth, that he should proceed at such a time, to execute the rigor of Justice upon Q. Fabius. By these and such like remonstrances, when as the Lieutenants had stirred up the Dictator his blood against themselves, rather then pacified his mood against Fabius, they were commanded to go down from the Tribunal. And when as the Crier had assayed to make silence all in vain, for that by reason of the noise and tumult, neither the Dictator his voice nor any of his apparitors and heralds about him, could be heard, the night came upon them and ended the contention, as it had been a batell in field. The General of the horse was commanded to appear on the morrow. Now when as every man gave it out and avouched unto him, that Papirius would proceed more vehemently, for that contesting of the Lieutenants, and that the more he was dealt withal, the worse he was: Fabius privily stole out of the camp and fled to Rome. And by the means of his father M. Fabius, a man who had been already thrice Consul and Dictator, the Senat was called together immediately. And as he was in the midst of his grievous complaints before the Lords, touching the violence and wrong of the Dictator, at all a sudden, there was heard before the Council House door, a great noise and hurrying of the Lictors, whiles they made way and voided the prels, And no marvel: for the Dictator himselfe was come with a revenging mind. For so soon as he had heard how Fabius was departed out of the camp, he followed after with his light horsemen. Then began the bruit to be renewed afresh, and Papirius called Fabius to be attached. Whereupon the chief of the Nobility, and the whole body of the Senat began to enterpole themselves by way of mediation: but all their intreaty notwithstanding, he perished fill in his implacable anger. Then stepped forth M. Fabius the father, "For as much as (quod he) neither the authority of the Senat nor mine old age whom you seek to make childless, nor yet the valor & noble courage of the General of horse by your own self cholen and nominated, can prevail; nor any humble prayers, which are able to appease the fury of the enemy, my oftentimes yea, and to pacify the wrath and indignation of the gods: I implore the lawfull help of the Tribuns and to the whole body of the people I appeal. And since that you challenge and except against the judgement of your own army, and of the Senat, I offer and present unto you that judge, who only is of more force and puissance; I am sure, than your Dictatorship. I will it, whether you will yeeld to this appeal, whereunto the Roman King Tull. Hostilius give place. Then out of the Council house they went straight to the Common place of audience: and

and when the Dictator, attended with some few, was ascended up, and the General of the Cavalry accompanied with all the whole troop of the chief of the City, Papirius commanded that he should come down or else be fetched from the Rafra, unto the lower ground. The father followed after him. "Well done (quoth he) in commanding us to be brought thither: from whence we may be allowed to speak our minds, if we were no better than private persons. At the first there passed no continued speeches so much, as wrangling and altercation. But afterwards the voice and indignation of old Fabius, surmounted and drowned the other noise: who greatly blamed and cried out upon the pride and cruelty of Papirius. "What man (quoth he) I have been also a Dictator of Rome: my self, and yet was there never so much as a poor Commoner, no Centurion, nor Souldier hardly entreated or misused by me. But Papirius seeketh victory and triumph over a Roman Grand Captain and General, as over the Leaders and Commanders of his enemies. See, I see, what difference there is between the government in old time, and this new pride & cruelty of late days. Quintus Concinnatus Dictator for the time, proceeded no farther in punishment against Manlius, when he was fain to deliver him lying enclosed & besieged with in his own camp, but to leave him as a Lieutenant in stead of Consul, in the army whereof he had charge. M. Furius Camillus, not only for the present tempered his choler toward L. Furius, who in contempt of his old age and authority, had fought most untowardly and with dishonor in the end; and wrote nothing to the people or the Senat but well, of his Colleague: but also being returned, made a special reckoning of him above all the Tribuns consular, whom also of all his colleagues, when as he had the choice granted him by the Senat, he elected to be his coadjutor in the charge of his government. Neither the people verily, whose power is sovereign over all, were ever more angry against those, that through rashness and want of skill lost whole armies, than to fine them at a sum of money. For the loss and mis carriage of any batel, that a General should be brought into question and answer for his life, was never heard of to this day. And now, rods and axes, whipping and beheading, are prepared for the Commanders under the people of Rome, and those who are conquerors and have deserved most justly triumphs; which by no law can be offered to those that have been vanquished. What else I pray you) should my son have endured, if he had beately suffered the field to be lost and his army withal? He had been discomitted, put to flight, and driven clean out of the field, how far forth further would the Dictator his ire and violence have proceeded, than to scourge and kill? And see how fit and seemly a thing it is that the City for the victory of Q. Fabius, should be in joy, in processions to the gods, and thankgivings, with congratulation and feasting one another and he himself by whole means the Temples stand open, the Altars smook with incense and sacrifice, and are heaped up again with vows, oblations, and offerings, to be stripped naked, to be whipped and torn in the fight of the people of Rome, looking up to the Capitol and the Caffe, lifting up his eyes to the gods upon whom in two such noble batels he called and invoked, not in vain nor without good and happy success? With what heart will the army take this, which under his leading and conduct, and under his fortune, achieved victory? What lamentation will there be in the Roman camp and what rejoicing on the other side amongst the enemies? Thus farred this good old father, thus pleaded he by way of expostulation and complaint, calling upon God and man for help, and withal embraced his son in his arms, and shed many a tear. "On the one side, there made with young Fabius, and took his part, the majesty and countenance of the Senat, the favour and love of the people, the assistance of the Tribuns, and the remembrance of the army absent. On the other side were alleged against him by Papirius, the invincible government and Empire of the people of Rome, the discipline of warfare, the Dictator's commandment (observed and revered at all times, no less than the Oracle & will of the gods) the severe edicts of Manlius, whose fatherly love and affection to his dear son was (as he beheld the service and common good of the State, also it was alleged, that the same exemplary justice, L. Brutus the first founder of the Roman liberty, executed in his two sons; and now mild and kind fathers, indulgent and fond old men in the case of contempt of other mens commandment, give liberty to youth, and pardon as a final matter, the overthrow of military discipline. Howbeit, he for his part would persist in his purpose still, nor remit one jot of condigne punishment to him, who contrary to his commandment and notwithstanding the trouble and confusion of religion, and the doubtful Auspicia, had given batel, saying, That as it was not in his power to abridge any jot the majesty of that State and Empire, for being everlasting, so L. Papirius would diminish naught of the authority thereof, withstanding. That neither the Tribuns puissance sacred and inviolable in it self, should by their opposition & interposing of their negative voice, violate the Empire of Rome: nor that the people of Rome, should in him above all others abolish and extinguish both blame (although in vain) not in L. Papirius, but in the Tribuns, and in the perverse judgment of the people: when as the military discipline being once polluted and stained, neither souldier would obey the Centurions commandment, nor the Centurion the Colonels, nor Colonels the Lieutenant, nor Lieutenant the Consuls, nor yet General of horse, the Dictator: whiles no man hath regard and reverence either of men or of gods: no Edicts of Dictator, no flight of Birds observed; but that without passport, the souldiers may wander and rove, either in their own ground or the enemies land, and unmindful of their sacred military oath, may cashier and discharge themselves from soldiery, through a licentious liberty of their own, whensoever they list leaving

A "leaving their ensigns and colours not attended, nor meeting at summons, not repairing to the Remedies, according to proclamation: without all discretion, making no difference whether they skirmish by day or night, on even ground or uneven, with advantage or disadvantage, with direction; or without; observing no signals and watchword no array. In sum, the whole course of military service henceforth, blind, rash, and inconsiderate, after the guile of robbing, to stand and go current for tolemin and sacred warfare. With these crimes and absurd incursions, (Oye Tribuns) charged you must be to the worlds end: lay down you must, and gage your own lives for the audacious disobedience of Q. Fabius, for whom ye are now answerable. The Trib. were astonished hereat, and for themselves as now, rather careless and perplexed, than for him who had re- course unto them for refuge and succor. But the general content of the people of Rome, turning to prayer and intreaty, eased them of this heavy load and burden: and with one voice humbly besought the Dictator, to remit the punishment of the General of horse, for their sake. The Tribuns also, seeing that was the way, and all encending and growing to Petition, followed after, and did the like: earnestly beseeching the Dictator to forgive this human fragility, and youthful folly of Q. Fabius, saying, that he had suffered chastisement enough. Then the young man himself, then his father M. Fabius, forgetting all strife, and laying aside debate, fell down at the Dictator his feet, and besought him to appease his wrathful displeasure. Hereupon the Dictator after silence made, "Yea marry (quoth he) O Quirites, this I like well, and thus it should be: now hath military discipline got the victory, now hath the majesty of your Empire prevailed indeed, which lay both a bleeding, and were in hazard to have been abolished and overthrown for ever, after this day. Q. Fabius is not aquit of his offence, in that he fought against his sovereigns commandment: but being thereof convicted and cast, is forgiven, nay is given rather to the people of Rome and the Tribuns power, whose assistance and help is granted for their instant prayers, and not of duty. Well, Rise up Q. Fabius and live, a more happy man for this agreement of the City in thy defence, than for that victory, upon which erewhile thou barest thy self so bravely. Live (I say) thou that hast been so bold to commit that fact, which to thine own father here, if he had been in L. Papirius his place, would never have pardoned. And as for me, into my grace and favour thou mayst come again, at thine own will and pleasure: But to the people of Rome, to whom thou art beholden and obliged for thy life, thou shalt perform no greater duty and service than that the example of this day's work may be a teaching and warning to thee for ever, to obey, as well in war as in peace, all lawful commands of superior Magistrates. After that he had pronounced the pardon of the General of horse and discharged him of the Court, and was departed himself out of the common place of audience, the Senat joyful and highly contented, and the people much more, came all about them, and on the one side bidding joy to the General of the horse aforesaid, and on the other side giving thanks to the Dictator, followed after, and accompanied them both: and it was generally thought, that military government was no less confirmed and established by this peril and danger only of young Q. Fabius, then by the late piteous execution of young Manlius.

By chance that year so fell out, that as often as the Dictator absented himself from the Army, he often the enemies rose and raised troubles in Sammium. Howbeit, the fresh example of Q. Fabius was ever in the eye of M. Valerius, Lieutenant General and Governor of the camp, who feared as well the dread wrath of the Dictator, as any violent attempts of his enemies whatsoever. Inasmuch, as when purveyours for corn being entrapped by an ambush, were slain in a place of disadvantage; commonly it was thought and believed, that they might have been by the Lieutenant rescued and saved, but for fear of these rigorous and terrible edicts. For anger hereof, the Dictator lost the hearts of the souldiers, who were already malecontent, for that he was so inexorable in the case of Q. Fabius, and had denied them that, at their instant intreaty, which afterwards he yielded unto and pardoned, at the suit and request of the people of Rome. The Dictator, after that, he had left for the government of the City L. Papirius Crassus the General of horse, discharged Q. Fabius, and forbidden him to administer any thing by virtue of that office, returned into the camp. Whole coming was neither very welcome and joyful to his own countymen the souldiers, nor yet struck any terror in his enemies the Samnites. For, the next morning, were it, that they knew not that the Dictator was come, or little cared and weighed whether he were present or absent; they approached the camp in order of batel. Howbeit, that one man, L. Papirius the Dictator, was of such valor and importance, that if the love of the souldiers had seconded the policy and sage conduct of their Commander, the war with Samnites had that day been quite dispatched and ended, past all peradventure, so skillfully set the batel in array, so warily chose he his ground of advantage, so strengthened he the same with supplies out of the rearguard, in all warlike skill and singular policy. But the souldiers failed for their parts, and went coldly to their business, even of purpose, that the valiant and commendable parts of the Captain might be discredited and depraved; and so the victory was much hindered and impeached. Howbeit, many of the Samnites were slain; and in exchange as many of the Romans hurt. But he like a wife and expert Captain soon perceived, what was the cause that stayed the victory. He saw well enough, that he was to temper his own nature, and to allay that severity of his, within mildness and cunctation. And therefore, taking with him the Lieutenants, himself in person went about to visit the wounded souldiers, putting his head into their tents & cabins, asking each one how they discharged the Lieutenants, Colonels, Provosts, Marshals, and other officers of the camp, to tend and look unto unto the sick soldiers, recommending their care unto them particularly by name. This being a thing in it self popular, he handled and ordered with such dexterity; that by curing their bodies, their minds also and hearts were much sooner gained and reconciled to their General. And nothing made more for the speedy recovery of their health, than their thankful acceptance of that care and diligence of his. When he had thus refreshed and repaired his army, he encountered once again the enemy with assured hope of himself and his soldiers, to obtain a final victory; and so difcomfited and put them to flight, that the Samnites after that day, durst never fight again with the Dictator. Then the victorious army marched, as any hope of booty and pillage guided and directed them: and as they overran their enemies country, they found no force nor resistance, either in open field, or covert ambush. This also encouraged them the more, and cheered their hearts, for that the Dictator had by proclamation given away the whole spoil among the soldiers: so that their privat gain whet them on against their enemies, no less then the common anger and publick quarrel. The Samnites tamed and subdued by these losses and overthrowes, fled to the Dictator for peace: with whom they capitulated, and made offer to allow unto every soldier one livery, and the full wages of one year. But being commanded to go to the Senat, they made answer, That they would accompany the Dictator, recommending and putting their cause and whole estate to his faithful protection, to his vertue and goodness only. Thus the Army was withdrawn from the Samnites, the Dictator with triumph entered the City: and when he would have resigned up the Dictatorship, the Senat ordained, That before he gave ower, he should create Consuls, So, C. Sulpitius Longus the second time, and Q. Emilius Lepidus were elected.

The Samnites not having concluded peace, (for that they varied about the conditions, and were to treat farther thereupon) yet brought with them from the City of Rome, truce for a year, which they observed not faithfully: so soon were their stomachs up again to make war after they had intelligence, that Papirius was out of government. Whiles C. Sulpitius, and Q. Emilius (or Adius as some Chronicles have) were Consuls, besides the reviving of the Samnites, there arose a new war also from the Apulians. Both ways was there a power lent. Sulpitius his lot was to go against the Samnites, and Emilius against the Apulians. Some write, that upon the Apulians themselves no war was made, but contrariwise, that the confederate States of that Nation were defended from the violence and wrongs of the Samnites. However, the low estate of the Samnites at that time, hardly able to maintain and defend themselves, maketh it more likely and credible, that the Apulians were not warred upon by them, but that the Romans made war with both Nations at once. But no memorable act or exploit was there performed: only the Apulian country, and Sabinum was wasted: and the enemies no where at all to be found, but at Rome there happened a scare by night, which raised every man so suddenly out of their first sleep, and so affrighted the City, that presently at one instant the Capitol and the Castle, the Walls and Gates were full of armed men. And when as from all places there was running, and crying alarm, the morrow morning at the break of day, there appeared neither author, nor cause of this fear.

The same year the Tulsulans were judicially converted before the people of Rome by procel, and that by a law that Flavius preferred. This M. Flavius, Tribune of the Commons, exhibited a bill of Emendment to the people that some punishment might be inflicted upon the Tulsulans: For that through their assistance and Counsel, the Veliterns and Privernians had taken arms against the people of Rome. The Tulsulans with their wives and children resorted to Rome, Which multitude having changed their apparel, and clad in poor array and habit, as prisoners at the bar, went about from Tribe to Tribe, falling down upon their knees to every man. Whereupon pity prevailed more to obtain pardon of punishment, then the goodness of their cause, to the purging of their guilt. So all the Tribes except Politia, disarmed and made void the Emendment aforesaid. But the sentence of the Tribe Politia was, That as many as were of age and undergrown, to wit, fourteen year old and upward, should be scourged and put to death. Item, that their wives and children, by martial law, should be sold in open port-sale. And for certain it is reported, that the Tulsulans took to deep an anger against the authors of so hard a censure and cruel doom, that they have carried it in mind even to our fathers days. For in despite thereof no Candidate, or Competitor for an office of the Tribe Politia, was ever wont to get the voices of the Tribe Papiria. The year following, whiles Q. Fabius and L. Fulsinius were Consuls, A. Cornilius Arvulus Dictator, led M. Fabius Ambulius General of horse, having taken a straighter levy of soldiers then ordinary, for fear of a greater war in Samnium (for it was reported that the whole manhood and flower of the youth were taken up and waged out of the countries adjoining) led forth a goodly and puissant army against the Samnites. But they pitched their camp so carefully in the enemies ground; as if the enemy had been far off: and the Samnite legions came on a sudden so proudly, that they set forward the trench and rampart, and encamped close to the Camp of the Romans. However the night approached so fast, that they were hindered from flying the Camp: but they gave it out plainly, they would do it the morrow after by day light. The Dictator seeing that he must fight nearer than he expected, or hoped; for fear lest the straightness and disadvantage of the ground, might prejudice and hinder the valour of his soldiers, leaving fire-thick burning in the camp, for to disappoint the sight of the enemies, in the still night with silence led forth his legions: but yet could he not for the needs of their camp escape, but be espied of them. The horsemen forthwith followed upon them in the tail,

A and pressed hard upon the army in their march, yet in such sort, that before it was day, they would not fight, nay, the very footmen were not allised out of the camp before day light. At length when it was broad day, the Horsemen adventured to charge upon the Romans, and partly by playing upon the tail of the hindmost, and partly by skirmishing in places that were hard to be passed over, they hindered their march and kept them behind. In the mean while their Infantry did overlook the Cavalry, so as now the Samnites with all their forces came upon them. The Dictator seeing he could not go farther without his great loss and disadvantage, commanded his men to fortify even in that very place where he stood: but for as much as the light Horsemen of his enemies were so crippled all about, they could not possibly go to provide stakes to make a parapet or rampier, nor begin to cast a trench. When he perceived therefore that he neither could go forward, nor stay and fortifie, he removed all his baggage out of the ranges, and set his men in batel array. The enemies do the like, and were not behind either in courage or in forces. But this sort of all hearted and encouraged them, for that they being ignorant that the occasion of the enemies retreat was the disadvantage and straightness of the place, presumed that they did it upon fear: and therefore they in terrible manner followed after them, as if the Romans had fled and been affrighted. And even that for a good while held the fight in doubtful balance, albeit the Samnites now a long time had not been used to abide so much as the first shout of the Roman army when they give the charge. But verily that day, from the third hour unto the eight, it is said that the battal stood so equal and indifferent, that neither the shout and cry was redoubled, nor heard the second time, after it was once let up at the first buckling: nor the engines were let forward, or withdrawn backward, but remained where they first were: nor yet of any part were they seen to retire or go back, but every man in his degree and place, bending forward and pressing with his shield, without breathing or looking back, till fought a-front: the same noise, one resolution to die or fight it out, and not to give over before utter weariness or dark night. Now began the strength of men to fail, now the spear point and edge of the sword, began to turn and lose their force, and now the Captains themselves were to seek for counsel and what to do: By what time all at once the Samnites Horsemen, hearing that the carriages of the Romans with one only Cornet were gone a good way off from the armed soldiers, without any other guard and fortification; for greediness of spoil let upon them. Which when a messenger in great haste and fear reported to the Dictator: Let them alone (quoth he) let them encumber themselves with the spoil, and spare not. Then came others one after another, windles with running, crying out and laying, that all was gone; and that every where the soldiers goods were rifled, ranfacked and carried clean away. Whereupon he sent for the General of Horsemen, See ye not (quoth he) O M. Fabius, the battel abandoned of our enemies Cavalry? They stand still and are encumbered and pestered with our carriages. Now therefore charge upon them, disband as they are, (which usually happeneth to any multitude, busy in pillage) find them you shall (no doubt) few on Horseback, and as few with weapon in hand: and whiles they are lading their Horses with spoil, kill them unarmed, and make it a bloody booty to them, and let them buy it full dearly: as for me, let me alone with the charge of the legions and footmen: have you the honour of the Horsemen service. Then the Cavalry ranged into a Squadron, as exquisitely and skillfully as possibly might be, ran forcibly upon the enemies dilarraced and clogged with carriage, beating them down, and making a miserable massacre of them in every place. For being (as they were) among packs and fardels which they cast from them suddenly, and now lay against their feet to stumble on as they fled, and in the Horses way, that were amazed and afraid, they were not able well, either to flee or to fight, and so were slain. When as the enemies Cavalry were thus defeated and welnear all come to naught, then M. Fabius wheeling about his wings of Horsemen, for to fetch a compass, set upon the Infantry at their backs: Whereupon arose a new fearful cry, which caused the hearts of the Samnites to tremble and quake. The Dictator withal, seeing the formost of the enemies fighting in the front, looking back ever and anon, their engines out of order, and all their battalions waving and floting to and fro: called hard upon his soldiers, and exhorted them to fight lustily: cried unto the Colonels, the Sergeants of Bands and Corporals severally by name, to re-engage and renew the battel again with him. Thus with a fresh and new shout, they advance the Standards, and set forward the engines: and the farther they march on, the more perceived they the enemies to be troubled, and in dilaray. And now by this time, the Horsemen also were within the sight of the formost in the vanguard: and Cornelius looking back to the bands and companies of his footmen, making sign with hand and with voice as well as he could, showed and made demonstration unto them, that they law the colours and targets of their own fellow Horsemen. Which when they once heard, and law withal: presently as if they had befriended themselves against the enemy as lustily, as if they had newly come out of their rents, fresh and in hearty heart and seen but now the signal, and heard the sound of trumpet, to a battel. Now were the Samnites no longer able to sustain the terror of the Horsemen behind, and the violence of the footmen before: but were either slain in the mids between, or scattered abroad in flight. Such as stayed and were environed about, the footmen flew: those who fled, were trodden under the Horse feet and killed: among whom the General himself left his body on the earth. This battel above all other, so quelled and daunted the hearts of the Samnites and crushed their forces, that in all their Diets and Councils they muttered and gave out, That it was no marvel that they more lumber-ome than the other. Into that plain aforetold the Romans marched down with their army another way, through and hollow rock, but when they went on forth to the other straight valley, they found it stopped and made up with the fall of trees, one croix over another, and likewise with an huge heap of mighty stones, laid full against them in the way. And they had not so soon discovered this guilful practise of their enemies, but they might deary withal, a power of them also on the top of the Hill. Then with all speed they seek to go back again the same way they came: but it they found also dammed up in like sort, and beset with armed men. Whereupon they made a stand, without any mans commandment: and as their minds were all amazed and astonished, to their bodies also were possessed as it were with a strange and extraordinary nummedness in their limbes: and whilkes they looked one upon another, each man thinking his self low to be more witty, and have better understanding than himself: for a good while they stood still, and said not a word. But afterwards, when as they saw the two Consuls pavilions setting up, and some making ready things necessary to fortification: although they saw well enough, that in this desperate case, past all hope of recovery, for all the defences they could devise, they should but lose their time and travel and prove fools in the end: yet nevertheless, because they would not seem to censure their distressed fortune, and double it with their own default and negligence, every man what he could, to his power, without the direction of any leader, fetled himself to work, and to fortify along the water side their camp, with a trench and rampier. And besides the insolent and proud scoffing and derision of their enemies, every man with pitiful confession scorned and checked his own work and travel, as vain, and to no purpose. As the Consuls then were penive and discomforted, and called none about them to counsel, (for that indeed they supposed they were past all advice and help) the Lieutenants and Colonels came unto them of their selves unilent for, and the soldiers turning to the Prætorium or Consul's Quarter, cried to their Captains for help and succour, which hardly the very immortal Gods could afford and give them. But they, rather made their moans and complaints one to another of their misfortune, than sat in sage counsel to give or take advice, until the night came upon them: whilcs each man according to his natural humour and fancy, muttered diversly. "One said, let us break through the stoppages opposed against us in the way: another, let us pass over the mountains and woods before us, what way soever we may be able to carry armour: for so we get to the enemy, whom we have almost for these thirty years vanquished and chased before us: all will be plain, even and easy unto us Romans fighting against these faithless, perjured, and disloyal Samnites. Tush, faith another, whither should we go, or which way? What? Are we about to remove mountains out of their places? So long as these tops of Hills are over our heads, how will you possibly come to the enemy? Armed or unarmed, courageous or cowardly, all is one, we trapped we are, and undone every one. Our enemy will not so much as offer us the sword, whereon we may dye like men with honor: he will sit still and end this war. Thus passed words to and fro, and thus passed the night away: unmindful were they of taking repast: never thought they of taking repose and sleep. The Samnites on the other side, in this so fortunate and happy opportunity presented unto them were as much to seek what to do, and what course to chuse and follow. Whereupon, they all in general, were to dispatch letters to Hercennius Pontius, the father of their General, and to know his opinion. Now this man beforetime, by reason of his great age, had given over not only Military affairs, but also all civil businesses: howbeit in that old crafty and spent body of his, he bare the fresh vigour of mind and a pregnant wit to give counsel. When he understood that the Romans army was shut up fast within the two forests, at the Caudine Gullers, and that his advice was asked by his sons messenger: he gave presently this counsel, That with all speed they should be let go from thence every one, without any harm at all done unto them. Which opinion of his being rejected [his son and the army] his mind was demanded a second time, by the same courier sent again unto him of purpose. And then he gave advice, that they should be all killed, and not one left alive. Upon which answers so far disagreeing, and thus delivered, as it were out of a doubtful Oracle: albeit his son himself imagined, of all others most, that his fathers wit was in the wane, and aged as well as his feeble waited body: yet by a general consent of all he was overcome, to lend for him in person for to declare his meaning by word of mouth. Neither thought the old man much thereof, for he was brought (by report) to the camp in a chariot: and being called to counsel, he was in the same tale still: so as he nothing changed of his former advice: but alleged only causes and reasons thereof. "Namely, that in his former resolution (which he took to be simply the best) his meaning was, by a singular benefit and good turn, to confirm peace and amity for ever, with a most mighty and puissant people: in the second his purpose was, by the utter loss of two armies, whereby the State of Rome would not easily recover their strength again, to deter the wars for many a year. And as for a third counsel, he had none at all. When his son and other chief Captains, by questioning inquired of him, what if a middle course between both were taken, namely, to dismiss them safe, and according to the Law of arms and conquest to impose upon them, hard Laws and Conditions? "Marry (quoth he) this is the way indeed, that neither winneth you friends, nor yet riddesth you of your foes: save them whom ye have provoked with shame and disgrace: and see what yetteth thereby. The Romans are of this nature, that they cannot be still and quiet so long as they have the worle: it will never dye in their hearts, but will be always fresh whatsoever shame this present extremity shal brand them with: and

A "and never will it give them any rest, before they have been by manifold and sundry wayes revenged of you. So his advice was not accepted, neither the one nor the other, and old Hercennius was carried home again from the camp. The Romans likewise in the camp, after many attempts (but all in vain) for to break forth and escape away, being now in great penury and scarcity of all things, for very necessity were driven to send Embassadors unto the enemies: who first should crave an equal and indifferent peace: and if they might not obtain it, then to bid defiance and challenge them to a battel. Pontius made answer, that there was no talking of battel: for that the field was won already: and because they being vanquished, and as good as taken captive, knew not how to come down and confesse their poor estate: he gave them to understand, That he would put them under the gallows, depoyled of their armour, and stript into their shirts: and as for other conditions of peace, they should be such, as were meet to pass between men conquered, and conquerors: namely, if they would depart out of the Samnites country, withdraw their colonies, and to both Samnites and Roman in equal alliance live under their own laws and customs: upon these Articles and Capitulations he was content to come to some point of accord with the Consuls. If any of these covenants disliked them, then he forbade the Embassadors to repair again to him any more, but at their peril. When relation of this answer was made in the camp, there arose suddenly such a sighing and groaning amongst them all, and so great peniveness and anguish of heart seized upon them, that it seemed they could not have taken it more heavily, and to the heart, if word had been brought that they must all have died in the place. After long silence, when as the Consuls wist not how to open their mouth, either for the accord and composition to themselves, or against it so necessary: then L. Lentulus, who as well in regard of his virtue, as of his dignities, was chief of all the Lieutenants, said: "I have heard my father (quoth he) O ye Consuls, oftentimes make report, that he was the only man in the Capitol, who perswaded the Senate, not to ransom and redeem with gold, the City from the hands of the Gauls: at what time as they were not inclosed either with trench or rampier by their enemies, (a Nation to say a truth, of all others most idle in such works, and fortifications) but might have broken through them, if not without great danger, yet without evident ruin, and assured destruction: Were the case so now, that as they then, being armed might have run down out of the Capitol upon their enemies under them (in which sort oftentimes the besieged have fallen out upon them that lay in siege) so we might but fight with our enemies in any place (it skillesh not) good or bad, even or uneven: I would not in giving counsel, be any jot behind my father in courage and valor. For I confesse verily that to die for our country is a brave death: and for my own part ready am I even to offer my body as a sacrifice to prevent death, yea, and it were to engage myself among the thickest of my enemies, thereby to save the people of Rome and the legions: Bur alas, here I see my country, here I see all the Roman Regiments and Legions that are, who unless for their own selves they will run upon their death, what have they else to face by their death? Why, will some man say, the houses and buildings of the City, the walls, and that multitude that inhabit the City. Nay rather, if this army fortune here to miscarry, they are all clear betrayed into the enemies hand and not saved. For who shall defend them? Peradventure, the weak and unarmed multitude: even as well surely as they defended it against the violence of the Gauls: Or, will they send for an army from Vitis, and beseech the help again of Captain Camillus? "Even the one as well as the other. But here in this place is our whole hope, here is all our power and puissance: in saving it, we preserve our country: in offering it to die, we abandon and betray our country. To yield and render our selves, is a foul and shameful thing: true, but such is the love of our Country, that we ought to preserve it, as well with our utter flame, if need require, as by our death. Let us undergo then, and abide this shameful indignity whatsoever, and obey that fatal necessity, which the very Gods themselves cannot overcome. Go to then, Consuls, a Gods name, redeem the City with your armor and weapons, which your forefathers ransomed with their gold. Then went the Consuls to Pontius for to parle, And when as he began like a conqueror to debate about the capitulations of Covenants, they denied plainly that any league could be made, without the privy will and authority of the whole people: not without the Fecials, and other solemn and usual Ceremonies. So that this Caudine accord was not (as commonly it is believed, and as Claudius also writeth) concluded by form of absolute covenant, but by way of stipulation and promise. For what needed either iureries in a perfect agreement and league, or hostages to be given when the matter is passed by this form of prayer, By whose default it happened that the conditions agreed were not observed, that people Jupiter would so punish, as the swine here was by the Fecials nurtured? The Coss, Lieutenants, Treasurers, and Colonels, who undertook as sureties, published and signed: and the names yet are extant of them all: where, if the matter had passed by way of an absolute league, there should have been subscribed no more but the names of two Fecials only. Moreover, by reason that the conclusion of this accord was of necessity deferred, there were required also 600 Horsemen hostages, who should lose their heads, in case the covenants of the agreement were not observed. And thereupon was the time appointed and let down of delivering the said hostages, and yielding the army without their armor. Now the coming of the Consuls renewed again in the sorrow in the camp, that hardly they could hold their hands from those, through whose rash conduct they were come to that place of disadvantage: and through whose cowardice they were to depart from thence more shamefully than they came: complaining that they had not so much as a guide to direct direct them, nor an epial to discover the coasts: but like beasts were driven blinded into a trap or pitfall: and one looked upon another beholding the armor that within a while they were to deliver up, viewing their right hands, which anon should be unarmed, their naked bodies exposed to the mercy and devotion of the enemy. They let before their eyes, the gallows prepared by the enemy for them to pass under, the iron and reproachful taunts of the Victor, his proud and disdainful looks, and how they (disarmed) should pass in a long train and go through the armed enemies: then afterwards, the piteous spectacle of the way which they must go, and the shameful dishonor of their disgraced army: briefly, their foul and dishonourable return through the Cities of their allies unto their country and parents, whither they themselves and their ancestors oftentimes had gone in triumph. They were the only men, which without wound, without dint of weapon, without battle fought, were discomfited and vanquished: who might not so much as draw their sword, and never come to joy or encounter with their enemy; having armour, having strength of lim, having hearts given them in vain. As they brayed out with great discontentment and anguish, these words, the fatal hour of their reproach and shame was come; which by proof and sensible experience, was to make all matters more heavy and woful, than they conceived and imagined in their minds aforehand. First and foremost were they commanded all, to go forth without the trench disarmed, and in their single garments: then were the hostages presently delivered, and had to ward: after this, were the Sergeants and Officers willing to depart from the Consuls: whose rich coats of arms, when they were plucked from their shoulders, moved such pity and compassion even in them, who a while before with all cursing and banning, judged them worthy to be delivered bound hand and foot into their enemies hands, for to be mangled despiteously and cut in pieces: that every man forgetting his own estate, wherein he stood, turned away his eyes, as it were from an abominable spectacle, and could not endure to behold that disgracing and disfiguring of so great State and Majesty. The first that were put under the gallows, were the Coss, well-near half naked: and according to their degree and place, so was every one in order put to the shame: and afterward, the legions one after another. The enemies in their armor stood all the while about them, scornful, mocking, and making a game of them: many had swords and daggers set against their hearts, in menacing wise, some were hurt and stabbed to death: namely, such as with stern countenance and grim looks above the rest, for the indignity of their things, offended the conqueror. Thus were they sent with shame enough under the gallows, and (that which was more grievous than the thing) even in the sight and view of their enemies they were not so soon got out of the forfeit, but although they seemed but then as plucked out of dark hel to see the day, yet the very light itself was worse than all kind of deaths, when they beheld so illfavoured an army and unteemly. And therefore, albeit they might have reached to Capua before night, yet being doubtful of the faithfulness and protection of their allies, or else daunted for very shame, they call their poor and silly bodies upon the ground, about the high ways not far from Capua. Whereof, when news came to Capua, the juit and due pity which they took of their allies, overcame the inbred arrogance and pride of that people by kind. Immediately they sent unto the Coss, their ensigns and ornaments belonging to their place of authority, the Lictors and Sergeants with their rods they sent armor and Horses, apparel and victual also for the soldiers bountifully: and as they came near to Capua, the whole Senat and people went out to meet them, and performed all duties of kindness and hospitality, both privat and publick that could be devised, and as meet was and requisite. And yet neither the courteous usage nor the pleasant countenances and light some speeches of their allies, could draw from them any words, no, nor so much as make them to hold up their heads and eyes, and to look again upon their friends, when they yielded them all these comforts they could. So as, besides their grief and sorrow of heart, a certain baseness and shame forced them to shun all communication and conversing with men. The morrow after, when as certain young Gentlemen of the Nobility were returned, who had been sent in convoy from Capua, to accompany them and bring them on their way, as far as their liberties and confines: they were sent for into the Senat-house, and being demanded by the ancients and elders, what news they reported, that they seemed unto them much more heavy and cast down than before, so silent and in manner dumb, they marched along: that noble mind and courage of the Romans was now mute and mum their hearts clean done and gone together with their armor, not able to get again, no, nor to give a word to those that saluted them, nor one of them for fear able to open his mouth, as if still they bare that yoke and gallows upon their necks, under which they went. That the Samnites had indeed not only a brave victory, but also a perpetual over them, and the hand of them for ever; and had now won not Rome, as the Gauls aforesaid, but also (which was a more hardy and valiant exploit) had conquered the Romans courage, stoutness, and valour. As these news were reported, and audience given thereto, with such aspects, that every man lamented now the Roman name, as desperate: and concluded generally it was in the counsel of these their faithful confederates, that they were past recovery: one Offidius Calpurnius, the son of Ofidius, a man right nobly born, renowned for his valiant Acts, and besides, very grave and reverend for his age, spake by report in this manner and said, That he took the matter far otherwise than they all did: for that stubborn and resolute silence, (qd, he) thine eyes fallen to wifely on the earth, those deaf ears to admit all solace and comfort, that shame of theirs to look up and behold the light, were expels and certain tokens of them that tossed and rolled from the very root and bottom of their heart, a huge heap and mass of anger & despite, Either (qd, he) know not the nature of the Romans, or else that silence & silence will

A will shortly cost the Samnites, woful cries and doleful groans: and the remembrance of this Caudine accord, will be more heavy and dolorous a good deal to the Samnites than to the Romans: for, as for them, they will every man find their hearts and courages again, wherefore they shall hap to encounter: but the Samnites shall not meet every where with the Caudine treights for their purpose.

And now by this time was this shameful overthrow and disgrace known at Rome. Intelligence they had before, how they were belef and enclosed about: but afterwards arrived a messenger with news more heavy and sorrowful for that ingominous peace, than for any peril and danger otherwise. At the first noise and bruit that they were besieged, they began to mutter; but after they heard, that they had so shamefully yielded themselves, all that preparation of aid and succor was discharged and sent away: and presently without any order from publick authority, they gave themselves every one to all manner of mourning and lamentation. The shops all about the market place were shut up. A general vacation began of it self, and pleading in all courts ceased, before Proclamation made: the purple and scarlet robes were left off, the golden rings laid away, and the whole City in a manner more sorrowful and heavy, than the very army. Neither were they angry and offended with the Captains only, with the authors of the peace, with the cautious and furtives for the same: but hated also the guiltless soldiers, denying flatly, that they were worthy to be received into City or house. Which heat of stomach and wrathful indignation, the first arrival of the army, utterly allayed; which even to angry persons was pitiful and lamentable. For they returned not as men that escaped safe, alive, and unlooked for into their country,

C but like captives in habit and countenance; they entered late into the Town, and hid their heads, every man within own house: so as the morrow after, and for certain days following, none of them would come into the market place, nor put his head out at doors to look into the streets. The Consuls likewise for their part, kept in, as privat men, and would exercise no function pertaining to their charge, but only that which they were forced unto by an Act of the Senat: namely, to nominate a Dictator for to be President at the Election of Consuls. So, they elected Q. Fabius Ambulstus for Dictator, and P. Valerius Paullus, General of Horse. Who being wrong created, and without the approbation of the Auspices, there were chosen in their room, M. Aemilius Papirius for Dictator, and L. Valerius Flaccus General of the Horsemen, and yet by them was not the assembly holden for the Election above said. And forasmuch as the people were even weary

D again of all that years Magistrats, as unlucky and unfortunate, it grew at length to an Interregnum. So Interreges there were, Q. Fabius Maximus, and M. Valerius Corvinus, who created Consuls, Q. Furius Philo, and L. Papirius Cursor the second time; with the whole consent, no doubt, of the City, for that in those days there were not two more noble and renowned Captains to be found.

These same day they were created, they entered their Magistracy (for so the LL. of the Council had decreed:) and after certain solemn and ordinary acts of the Senat passed, they went in hand to consult about the treaty of the Caudine peace. And Publius, whose countie it was then to have the sovereignty of rule; "Speak (quoth he) Sp. Posthumius, to the matter propounded, and let us hear your opinion, and what you can say. Who after he was risen and stood up,

E with the very same countenance and cheer that he went under the gallows, I am not, (quoth he) "O ye Consuls, ignorant, that I am first called forth, not for honour, but by my disgrace; and commanded to speak, not as a Senator and Councillor, but as a man culpable and accused, both for an unfortunate war administered, and a shameful peace concluded. Howbeit, seeing that ye have not propounded and touched ought, concerning either our trespass or our punishment, (setting apart all kind of excuse and defence, which would be no very hard matter to maintain, before men that are not ignorant of humane fortune, and of necessities, whereto men may be driven) I will in brief deliver my mind concerning that, which you have moved and propounded. Which sentence of mine may sufficiently witness and testify, whether I mean to spare mine own life, or save your legions, when as I became bound to that dishonest or necessary stipulation and promise, call it wherelye will. And yet, seeing it was made without the peoples privacy and grant, the State of Rome is not obliged thereto, and thereby nothing due to the Samnites, but only our bare bodies. Let us therefore be rendered by the hands of the Peciales and Heralds, in our shirts, and fast bound: let us deliver and rid the people of all scruple and trouble of conscience, if we have entangled them with any; that there be no law in Law of God or man, but that both justly and lawfully ye may begin the war anew. In the mean while my mind and advice is, that the Consuls levy, enrol, arme, and lead forth an army: but not to enter within the enemies marches, before all things duly belonging to the delivery of us into their hands, be fully accomplished. Now, I pray and beseech ye, O immortal Gods, that seeing it was not your good will and pleasure, that Sp. Posthumius and T. Valerius Consuls, should with fortunate conduct fight against the Samnites, yet ye would be satisfied herewith, That ye beheld us put under the gallows: that ye saw us obliged in an infamous and shameful bond of covenant: that ye now view us naked and delivered bound into the enemies hands, ready to receive upon our heads even the loss of our lives at their anger, malice, and despite: and that it would please you, that the new Consuls and Legions of the Romans, may in that sort war with the Samnites, as evermore the wars before us Consuls have been conducted, managed and performed. When he had spoken these words, all men both to wondrous at this man and pitied him too, that one while they would not believe he was the same Sp. Posthumius, who had moved and persuaded for foul and dishonest a treaty of peace: otherwhiles they lamented that so brave and noble a personage, should suffer any especial torment above other, at the enemies hands, for anger and despite of reverting and breach of that accord. When as now they all utter inglorious praises of the man, condescended to his opinion: the Tribuns of the Com. L. Livius and Q. Metellus, attempted for a while to oppose themselves against this proceeding: saying, "That neither the people could be acquit and absolved in conscience, by their delivery, unless every thing were again restored to the Samnites, in the same estate wherein they stood at Caudium: nor they themselves (in that they subscribed and became bound for the accord of peace, to save the holt of the people of Rome) had deserved any punishment: nor yet, last of all, ought they being sacred Magistrats and inviolable, to be yielded to the enemies, and exposed to any outrage and violence. Then (quoth Posthumus) in the mean while deliver us up that are but lay and profane men, whom with safe I confidence and without offence ye may. And as for these, (so sacred-saints as they now be, ye shall hereafter render them likewise, so soon as they are out of their charge. But if ye will be ruled by me, let them before they be thus yielded, here in this common Hall be whipped and scourged for the usury and interest of their punishment, which they would seem to defer and put off to long. For whereas they allege and say, That by the delivery and yielding of us, the peoples consciences cannot be cleared and absolved: who is so ignorant in the Feciales and Heralds law, that knoweth not that these men ipake this, for this end rather, that they themselves might be rendered, than for that the truth requireth so. Neither do I deny my Lords, that bare promises and stipulations are unviolable, and to be kept as well as covenants and obligations with those men, among whom both Religion to Godward, and faithfulness to men is in regard and estimation: but I deny again, that without the peoples assent and grant, any thing can be established good and effectual, to bind the people thereunto. What! if the Samnites, in the same pride and infidelity, wherein they outruded and forced upon us this stipulation, yea, and wrong it in us, would also have urged us to utter and speak the solemn form of words, which they stile to do that surrender up Cities: would ye (my Masters that are Tribuns) infer and say, that by virtue thereof the people of Rome is surrendered into their hands? and that this City, with the Temples, Chappels, Limits and Waters, by strength thereof, are the Samnites possession? Well, I let pass to speak of dedication, because the matter in question is touching only a stipulation. What, I pray you if we had promised and undertook, that the people of Rome should forsake and abandon this City? or let fire on it? or not have Magistrats, Senat, or laws any longer? or to be governed again by Kings? God forbid and deny that, say you, Well, it is not the indignity of things, that caeth the bond of stipulation. If there be any one case, wherein the people may be obliged, then in truth may they be in all as well: neither skilleth it any whit, (whereat haply some will make a stay, and think it is material) whether Consul, Dictator, or Pretor, exact into bond and become surety. And even this it was that the Samnites themselves judged so to be, and stood upon: thinking it not sufficient, that the Consuls became bound, but they put the Lieutenants, the Treasurers, and the Colonels there, to the same. And now, let no man demand of me, why I entered into stipulation, being a thing not incident to the Consul his charge and right, neither was I to undertake unto them peace, which was not in my power to effect: nor in your name to promise it, from whom I had no commission and warrant. Certainly my Lords, and Senators, there was nothing at Caudium done at all by mans policy and counsel. The immortal Gods beset both your Generals and the enemies too, of all their sense and understanding: for neither we, in the conduct and ordering of our service, stood warily enough upon our good guard: and they again, as they got the victory full badly, if they lost it as lawdly: whiles they hardly trusted the strength of those places, by means of which they had gained the vantage and better hand of us: and while they made such haste, upon what agreement they cared not, to disform men that are born martial, and naturally made for wars. For, if they had been in their right wits, what an hard matter was it for them in the time that they sent for old aged men from their home, to come to Council, for to have dispatched their Embassadors to Rome? and for to have dealt and treated with the Senat and people, about a perfect peace and final league indeed? It had been but three dayes journey for men not encumbered, but lightly appointed. All that mean while there might have been truce, until the Embassadors from Rome, had brought them either certain victory or assured peace. For that had been a covenant and stipulation good in law, the which we should have agreed unto, by warrant of the peoples will and approbation: But ye would never have granted and allowed it: no more should we have entered into any such stipulation. Neither was it Gods will and providence, that there should be any other issue and end of things, than this: that both they should vainly be deluded and feed themselves asit were, with the fancy of a more joyfull dream, than their minds could well conceive and apprehend: and also that the same fortune, which had entangled, snared and brought into danger our army, should relieve the same, and rid it again out of perikill, as their victory was frivolous and vain, so to a vainer and more frivolous peace, should make frustrat and worth nothing: and that such a stipulation and promise should be interposed and come between, which might oblige and bind no person, but the very makers themselves. For what dealing hath there been with you my Lords of the Senat? or with the people of Rome? Who can challenge you? Who can call you into question? Who can come forth and complain that he is by you deceived? Enemy, or Citizen? To enemy ye have passed no promise: Citizen to undertake for you and in your name, ye commanded.

A "commanded none. Therefore ye have nothing to do to meddle with us, to whom ye gave "nought in charge: and with the Samnites as little, with whom ye had no treaty at all. To the "Samnites, we are sufficient pledges enough, and answerable to perform that which is our own: "for that, I say, which we are able to make good and yield: even our bodies and lives: upon "these let them exercise their rage, upon these let them whet their swords and their impishful "malice. And as for the Tribuns of Commons, consult ye together, whether they may be rendered presently, or ought to be reserved and put off to any other day: let us in the mean time (O Veturius, and ye that are the rest) offer these wretched heads and lives of ours, like caitives to "discharge our bond, and by our punishment and execution, deliver and set free the Roman

B "army. Both the cause it self, and the Advocate also, moved the Lords of the Senat: and wrought so much not only with the rest, but also with the Tribuns themselves (of Commons) that they promised to be at the Consuls ordering and appointment. Whereupon immediately they gave up their offices, and were delivered into the Feciales hands with the other, to be led aly, to Caudium. There was not so soon an act of the Senat passed hereof, but it seemed that the very light and rays of the Sun shone upon the City again. Posthumus was in every man his mouth, him they praised and extolled to the heavens: comparing him with the voluntary offering of P. Decius the Consul, for the safety of the army, and other worthy and noble acts of others: Saying, that by his overture, by his means and travel, the City was delivered from a servil, dishonourable and un-

C "chonell peace: He (say they) hath offered himself to all the torments, anger, and vengeance of the enemies, and made full satisfaction thereby for the people of Rome. Nothing now but war, war! Alarm, now cryed every man: and oh, that ever they might see the day to encounter on: again with the Samnites, in their armour and with weapon in hand. So, whiles the City was thus inflamed and boiled with hateful ire and indignation, there was an army levied, well near all of Voluntaries. New legions were mustred and enrolled again out of the same soldiers, and a puissant army let forth to Caudium. The Feciales marched before, and when they were come to the gate of the City, commanded the Sureties, such as had subscribed and signed the accord aforesaid, to be deposed and stript out of their cloths, and their hands to be pinned behind him. And when the Lictor or Sergeant, for very reverence of Majesty in Posthumus his person, bound him

D at large and at ease, Why doest not thou (quoth he) draw and pull the cord streight, that the rending and delivery of us may be according to law and as it ought to be, and no fault to be found withal? Afterwards, when they were come into the assembly of the Samnites, and before the Tribunal judgment seat of Pontius; A. Cornelius Arvina one of the Feciales or Heralds thus spake: Forasmuch as these persons, without commandment and commission from the Quirites and people of Rome, have undertaken by stipulation, That there shall a league and peace be made with you: and in so doing have offended and trespassed against the State, therefore, to the end, that the people of Rome might be freed and absolved from a detestable and heinous offence, Here I deliver and yield unto you, the self same men. No sooner had he uttered these words, but Post-

E "humus with his knee smote the Fecial his high, with all the might he could: and with a loud voice said, That he being now a Samnit citizen, and the other an Embassador and an Herald of the people of Rome: had against the Law of Nations injured him and offered him the abuse: whereby the Romans might more justly make war. Then quoth Pontius, "This delivery neither will I accept of and admit, neither shall the Samnites hold it good and lawful. But why doest thou not sp. Posthumus, if thou believe there be any Gods, either undo and cancel all, or stand to thy bargain and covenant? For by right either are they all due unto the Samnites, whom they once had in their power: or else peace, in lieu of them. But why speak I thus, and challegeth thee, who doest yield thy self again prisoner to the conqueror as faithfully and loyally as thou canst? The people of Rome I challenge, who, if they repent of the promise and bargain made at the streets of Caudium, let them bring again the Legions into that gullet, wherein

F "they were environed, enclosed, and compassed. Let no man deceive and delude other. Let all be undone again, and every thing as it was: let them take again their armour, which by covenant they yielded up: let them return into their own camp, and have whatsoever they had the day before the Parle. Then let them please themselves with war, with valiant and magnanimous deeds: refuse they then, and spare not all covenant: reject they then all treaty of peace. Let us have the same fortune, the same opportunity and vantage of the places, which we had before the mention of peace: and to make war, and trie the issue. So shall neither the people of Rome, blame the Consuls stipulation, nor we find any lack and default in the faithfulness of the people of Rome. And will ye never have done, but always find shifts and excuses, and not stand to your covenants, when ye are overcome, and have the worke of your enemies? Ye gave G "sometimes hostages to King Porcina: and when ye had done, afterwards stole them away. For a sum of gold you bought again your City of the Gauls: and as they were receiving the same gold, murdered they were by you and hewn in pieces. Peace ye have covenanted with us upon condition that we should restore again your legions unto you: that peace you cancel and make void and evermore ye let some colour of right upon your cautelous and fraudulent dealing: Well, alloweth not the people of Rome of the saving of their Legions, by a dishonourable and shameful peace? Say it is so. Let peace go whether it will: but give you again to the Victor your Legions captivat, is this your faithful dealing? are these your covenants, and ceremonies of Feciales & Heralds?

words commanded the fouldiers, so greedy of murder and bloudthirsty, to go forth of the camp. Whereupon when they were highly discontented and in great indignation, for that they were flaid and interrupted in this sweetness of easing their anger, and latiating their revenge to the full; it was time to deliver this speech unto them, wherein the fouldiers were given to understand, how the Consuls neither were behind any of them in malice and hatred to their enemies, nor would be hereafter: but as they were their chief conductors to the war, so they would be their leaders and shew them the way, to unsatiable appetite of revenge and execution; had not the care and regard of those 600 Horsemen, which were kept as hostages in Luceria, cooled their thirst and flaid their stomachs; lest haply the enemies in despair to find pardon and mercy, should run upon them in a blind fit of fury and rage, and put them all to the sword; choosing rather to torment and kill them first, before they died themselves. The fouldiers greatly commended this counsell, and rejoiced that thus their choler was allaid, and their fury bridled, confessing, That they were indeed to abide all whatsoever, rather than the life of so many of the forwardest and principal young Gentlemen of Rome, should be betrayed, or in danger. This audience being dimissed, they drew together to a Council, whether with all their forces they should assail and press hard upon Luceria, or with one of the armies and chief Leaders, give the attempt to sound the Apulians, a close and secret kind of people thereabout, who ever to that day had stood in doubtful terms with them.

Publius the Consul, who had taken this journey to over-run all Apulia, in that one voyage and expedition, either by force subdued and brought under his obedience certain States, or upon conditions entered league and society with them. Papirius also, who staid at the siege of Luceria, within a short time sped according to his expectation. For having forelaid and beset all the ways, by which victual was conveyed thither out of Sannium, the Samnites who lay in garison at Luceria, pinched and tamed with famine, sent Embassadors to the Roman Consul, making offer to release and deliver up into his hands those Horsemen, (the only cause of the present war) in case he would raise and levy the siege. To whom Papirius made this answer, that they should have gone first to Pontius, the son of Herennius, by whose counsel they had put the Romans under the yoke (and the gallows) to learn and know of him, what in his opinion they were to abide, who were vanquished and overcome. Howbeit, forasmuch as they had rather, and chose rather to be consumed indifferently, and to receive equal conditions of their enemies, than of their own selves, he willed the Embassadors to give them to understand in Luceria, that they should leave their armor, their bag and baggage, their beasts of carriage, and impotent multitude not fit for the war, within in the walls. And as for the fighting fouldiers, he would put them to paies under the gallows in their single shifts, for to revenge the shame first offered them, and not to inflict any new ignominy upon them. Nothing was denied and refused: seven thousand men of war were put under the gallows, a rich and huge pillage raised within Luceria, all their own ensignes and armor regained, which they had lost at Caudium: and that which surmounted all other joys, they recovered again those Gentlemen of arms, whom, lying for pledges and security of the peace aforesaid, the Samnites had sent to Luceria to be kept in safe custody. There is not lightly to be found a victory more noble, and of greater consequence to the people of Rome than this, in regard of the sudden change of fortune, in case (as some records bear witness) Pontius also himself the son of Herennius, and General of the Samnites, to make satisfaction and quitance for the Consuls disgrace and shame, was put under the yoke, as well as all the rest. But I less marvel that it is not clear, but left uncertain, that the enemies General was rendered, and went under the gallows: this rather I wonder at, that doubted it is, whether Lucius Cornelius Dictator, with L. Papirius Consul, General of the Horsemen, managed these acts first at Caudium, and then afterwards at Luceria: and being the only revenger of that disgrace of the Romans, triumphed most worthily (I dare be bold to say) of any man before that time, next to Furius Camillus: or whether the chief honour hereof pertain by right to Papirius as Consul. Upon this error followeth another in the neck of it, whether Papirius, furnished Curios, for his good service at Luceria, in the next Election, continued in Magistracy, and were made the third time Consul with Q. Amylius Caristinus; the second time: or whether it were L. Papirius Megillanus, and the error grew upon the surname. But it is agreed upon by all writers, that from this time forward all the reliques of the wars, were performed and finished by Consuls. Amylius in one prosperous battle made a final conquest of the Ferentans, and upon composition had the City delivered up unto him, whither they had retired their forces for succor after their defeat in the field, and hostages were imposed upon them. With like good success fought the other Consul with the Saturnians, who being Roman citizens, had revolted to the Samnites, after the loss at Caudium, and had received into their City a garison of theirs. For when as the Roman army approached under the walls of Saturnium, and that the citizens within (after Embassadors sent to treat by way of humble petition for peace) had received this hard and heavy answer from the Consul, That unless they would kill the garison of the Samnites, or deliver them into his hands, they should come no more again to him: the Coldders and inhabitants were more frightened and terrified with that speech, than at all the forcible attempts of their army. Whereupon the Embassadors followed their suit hard and continued still, demanding very often of the Consul how he could believe, that they being but few, feeble, and unarmed, should be able to force a garison so strong and well appointed, against their wills? being willed to ask counsel of them, by whose means they had received the said garison into the Town, they departed

A parted their wives: and having hardly obtained leave & licence at his hands, to consult with their Senate, and to bring answer, they return home again. Their Senate was divided into two factions, which disagreed and hed them in impence, that they could not soon resolve. The one, consisting of the chief personages and head men, who had illuited them to revolt from the people of Rome, the other of true hearted and loyal Citizens. Howbeit, both sides strove in the end and endeavored to labour the Consul for reconciliation of peace. The one part thought it sufficient (because the Samnites garison having not provision enough at hand to hold out the siege, was to depart the night following) to give notice to the Consul, what hour of the night through what gate the enemies would go forth and which way they would take: the other, namely, against whose will they were revolted to the Samnites the very same night, opened another gate besides to the Consul, and privily let their enemies armed into the City. So by a twofold comploit of treason, they were surprised unawares and all their throats cut, not only the garison of the Samnites (by reason that the woods all about the high way were laid for them and bet) but also at one instant there was a shout and alarm raised by the enemies within the City, which was full of them: and thus in the space of one hour both the Samnites were slain, the Saturnians taken; and all they had in the world seited into the hands of the Consul: who after diligent inquisition by torture, Who were the principal authors of this revolt? whomsoever he found guilty, those he scourged and beheaded: and letting there a strong garison he took from the Saturnians all their armour, from thence Papirius Curios departed to Rome for to triumph (as they write, that day, by his leading Luceria was recovered, and the Samnites put under the yoke.) And without question, a man he was worthy of all commendations of a warrior, surpassing not only in fortitude and courage of spirit, but also in force and natural strength of body and namely, for his good footman'ship: whereupon he got his surname * Curios. For in running (they say) he had not his peer, but went away with prick and pace before all other in those daies: and were it by reason of his bodily vigour and strong constitution, or his much exercise, a stout and mighty eater he was, he drank as liberally to his meat, and could carry it as well. Never had foot or horse under any Captain more rough and harder service, for that himself was of so rough mettall and steel to the very back (as they say) that he could abide any pains and travail whatsoever. His horsemen upon a time were so bold, as to request him in lieu of their good service in some exploit, to ease them a little of their ordinary D toll and labour: very merry will I (quoth he) and that ye shall not complain that ye have no easement at all, I will ease you of this pains. That when ye alight from your horses, ye shall not need any more to stroke their shoulders, back and buttocks. He was a man besides for severity straight, and of right great command, as well over his allies and confederates as his own Citizens. The Prætor of Prenefte, for very fear chanced once to be somewhat behind, and slack in bringing forward the reterward, into the vanguard and front of the battle: as he walked before his pavilion he commanded him to be called unto him: when he was come, he willed the sergeant to bring forth his axe immediately: at which word when the Preneftin stood amazed and well near dead, Dit-spur his Lictor (quoth he) took me up and grub this root that hindreth them that walk this way: and when he saw him altonied and his heart in his heels for fear of death, he set a good round fine upon his head, and so let him go. Doubtless in all that age (than which there was never any more fertile and fruitful for vertue and valour) there was no one man, upon whom the state of Rome relied and relied more: Inasmuch as men had declined, and in their minds appointed him to have matched and made head with Alexander the great, if after the conquest of Asia, he should have bent his power hither, and warred in Europe.

Albeit it may well appear that I have nothing less fought, ever since I began this work, than a digression to digress and decline more than was needful, from the order and course of mine history, and by extravagant garnishing and mingling my writings with variety of matters, both to seek for the readers pleasant starts and diversities to repose themselves, and for my self some ease and recreation of my spirits: yet the mention of so mighty a King and renowned Captain, maketh me to think upon, and to utter abroad the secret conceits and discourses, which often I have cast and tossed in my mind: and which induce me now to search and examine willingly, what event would have hapned and befallen to the Romans, in case they had waged war with Alexander. First and foremost, the things that seem to bear sway and prevail in war, be these (to wit) number of fouldiers, valour, and courage withall, wit, sufficiency and dexterity of their chief leaders, and lastly, fortune, which as in all other humane and worldly affairs beareth a great stroke, for in war most of all. Which points, if a man consider either severally by themselves, or jointly altogether, do proveth that the Roman Empire and government had stood as well against him as other princes and nations invincible. And first to begin with comparing of the Captains themselves: I do not deny, but that Alexander was a noble and singular warrior: and this maketh more for his fame and renown than that he was a sole commander of himself that he was a young man and died in the growth of his prosperous affairs before he had felt and tasted of adverse fortune. For to pals other overthrow glorious Princes and brave captains, (the great mirrors and examples of humane changes and varieties of this world) what was it that exposed Cyrus, whom the Greeks commend and magnifie above all other, as also of late time, Pompey the great, to disfavor & the turning wheel of fortune, but only this that they lived long? Let me but rehearse and reckon up the Roman captains: and those not all, nor in every age, wherein they flourished: but even them only, with whom being either Censurs or Dictators, Alexander should have warred, if had he come: namely, M. V. Iulius Corvinus, Corvinus, C. Martius Rutilius, C. Sulpicius, T. Manlius Torquatus, Q. Publilius Philo, L. Papirius Cursor, & C. Fabius Maximus: the two Decii, L. Volturnus, M. Curius. Besides other brave men and valiant personages that followed after in case he had fought the Carthaginians were fitted (for if he had lived he meant to have warred there) and then passed over into Italy, when he had been well steeped in years. In every one of these there were the same good parts, the like towardness of nature, as much forwardness of courage and spirit, as in Alexander, yea, and as good Military discipline, which even from the foundation of the City, passing from hand to hand, grew at length to the form and perfection of an Art, framed & compiled of continual rules and precepts, and confirmed by experiments. For so, after one course the Kings conducted their wars: even to next unto them the banishers of the Kings, (to wit, the Junii and Valerii) so, consequently the Fabii, the Quinctii, and Corneli: (to did Furius Camillus, whom those two Romans in their youth (Manlius Torquatus and Valerius Corvinus) with whom Alexander should have encountered, saw an aged man in the latter end of his days. And whereas Alexander ventured his own proper person in battle, and performed all Military duties with other soldiers, (which was not the least part of his praise & glory) would Manlius Torquatus have given him one inch of ground, think ye, if he had met with him in skirmish equally matched? or Valerius Corvinus either, both of them brave & stout soldiers before they were leaders and captains? Or would the Decii have given him place, who with devoted bodies to death, came among the thickest of their enemies into present danger? Would Papirius Cursor have given him way, a man of that incomparable strength of body, & invincible courage of heart? And (not to name every one particularly) would that Senat & Council have been overwrought with the stratagems & policies of that one young man? which, whosoever he was that said, it consisted and was composed altogether of Kings, was the only man that conceived & comprehended the true image and Idea of the Roman Senat. Many here was all the doubt (forsooth) left that he knew how to chuse out a convenient plot of ground, to pitch a Camp in, more wisely & cunningly than any one of those before named, to make provision for victual, to foresee & beware of ambushes, to pick out & take a meet time for to fight a battle, to set his battalions in array, and to strengthen the same with sufficient succours & supplies from the rearguard. Surely, he would have said himself, that he had not now to deal with Darius, which Monarch carrying with time a train of dainty women and tender Eunuchs, weakened and made effeminate with wearing purple and gold, with all his rich furniture, for show and ostentation of his wealthy and superfluous fortune, Alexander without any bloudshed, with doing nought else but knowing well how to content such toys and vanities conquered as a prey and booty rather than an enemy and warrior. He would have thought verily that the situation and nature of Italy far differed from that of India, through which he marched at his ease with his drunken Army, leaving and banqueting all the way; but specially, when he should have beheld the woody forests and unpassable Straights of Apollonia, the high hills and mountains of Lucania, and the fresh marks and tokens of the toils that happened in his own name and house, namely, where not long before his Uncle Alexander late King of Epirus miserably perished. Our talk all this while is of Alexander, not drowned yet with the overflow of prosperity; wherein no man had ever less rule of himself than he. Whom if we consider, as he was arrayed in the habit and attire of his new fortune, and (if I may so say) of a new nature, whereinto after his conquests and victories he was transfigured; surely he would have come into Italy more like a Darius than an Alexander, and brought a bastard army with him, nothing at all resembling but quite forgetting their native country of Macedonia, degenerated already, and growing out of kind, into the manners and fashions of the Persians. It grieveth me, and I am ashamed, in so great a Monarch as he was, to report the proud changing and variety every while of his misapprehensions, his excessive vain-glory and desire of being courted and crouched unto (as he was) in flattering manner by men lying upon the earth groveling and prostrate at his feet. Such abject baseness should have been hardly endured of Macedonians conquered and subdued; much less than being conquerors as they were. Abashed I am to recount the foul and horrible torments & executions, the murders of his well deserving friends, even in the midst of his cups and dainty viands: last of all his vanity, his over-weening, and forging to himself a divine race and pedigree from the gods. But what if his drunkenness and unmeasurable love of wine, were every day more than other? what if his fell anger and exceeding heat of choler increased daily? (for I report nothing, but that which all writers agree upon) reckon we not these infirmities for great blemishes and wondrous hindrances to the virtues and perfections of a warrior & general commander? But here is all the danger and fear (which some are wont to give out & alledge even the valiant persons of all other Greeks, who favour & magnify the glory of the very Partians in comparison of the Roman name) that the people of Rome had never been able to abide the very majesty and name of Alexander the great. (And I think verily that even themselves that talk so much of him never heard the truth, so much as by the brute and fame) and that against whom in Arbeia, O a City mightily decayed by war with the Macedonians, and even then, when as they might see before their face the ruins of Thebes in manner smoking full in their eyes, the Orators durst freely make publicke invectives (which appeareth by the very records of their Orations now extant) against him: I say, not one of so many States and noble personages of Rome durst have opened his mouth and given one word again frankly and boldly. How much faster the grandeur and greatness of this man may be conceived and imagined in the mind, all that shall be but one only man, rising, growing, and come to his height with the felicity of little more than ten years.

Which

A Which happiness of his, they that extol in this respect, that the people of Rome, although in no war they were subdued, yet in many battels had the foile and lost the day: whereas Alexander never fought field but he won the victory; little understand they, that compare the exploits of one person and him a young man, with the deeds and acts of a State, which had now warred eight hundred years. And can we marvel, if when on the one part there may be reckoned more ages than years on the other, that in so long a time, fortune should vary more, than in the space of thirteen years? But why compare you not man with man, Captain with Captain, and lay their fortunes together? How many Roman Captains and Generals, in this case am I able to name, who never lost field? Ye may turn every leaf and page of the yearly annals of Magistrates, of day-books and journals of those Consuls and Dictators, whose valour and felicity the people of Rome had never came to repent of and be discontented for, so much as one day. And that which maketh them more wonderful, and to be admired above Alexander or any other King in the world, some of them bare the Dictatorship but ten or twenty days; and none the Consulship longer than a year. Their legates and ministers now and then were letted and impeached by the Tribunes of the Commons. The due and best time for war otherwhiles overslipped them, and yet they went forth. Before their term expired, they were often called home for to be presidents of the Magistrates Election. In the very midst and busiest time of their affairs, the year very often turned about. The inconsiderate rashness one while, and the peevish crookedness another while of a College and companion in government was hindrance and harm both. They succeeded sundry times after the loss and overthrow of their predecessors, and received the army either of raw untrained soldiers, or such as were in ill discipline trained up; whereas Kings and Monarchs contrariwise, not only freed and exempt from all such obstacles and inconveniences, but also Lords and Masters, and of absolute command over their enterprises, over times and seasons fit for execution, give direction to others, draw all after them to their advice and counsel, and are themselves directed and obeyed by none. Say now, that Alexander were invincible, and dealt with these Captains as invincible as himself, he should likewise have hazarded as great pawns and favours of fortune as any of them; nay rather, he should have adventured and incurred more jeopardy; in that the Macedonians had but Alexander alone, a man not only subject but also exposing himself to many perilous chances: but many Romans there had been equal to Alexander, either for glory or greatness of their worthy deeds: who every one should have lived and died according to the fatal course of his own several destiny, without the hazard of the whole and main chance. It remaineth now that forces be compared with forces, and armies to armies, either in number, or in quality of soldiers, or multitude of Allies, from whom they had their aids. There were esteemed by computation in the Taxing years, and Surveys taken by the Censors of that age, two hundred and fifty thousand polls Citizens of Rome. And therefore in all the revolts and rebellions of their allies the Latines, they were able to levy and enroll ten legions complete of Roman Citizens well bear and none else. And for many years oftentimes there were four and five armies employed at once, which maintained wars in Tuscan, in Hetruria, in Umbria, take also the Gauls with you their enemies likewise Lucania in Sannio. Besides all these, Alexander should have found all Latium.

E With the Sabines, Volscians, and Aequians; all Campania, part of Umbria and Hetruria with the Picentes, the Marsians, Pelignians, Vestins, and Apulians, and all the coast adjoining thereto of the Greeks, along the necher Tyrrhen sea, from the Thuriens to Naples and Comes, and from thence, the Samnites, as far as to Antium and Hestia. All these he should have met with, either mighty and puissant allies and friends to the Romans, or if they were enemies, vanquished and subdued by their arms. He should have passed the seas himself, having of old Macedonian bands, not above thirty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, and those, most of them Thessalians: for this was all his power. And in ca he had joynted thereto the Persians, Indians, and other such nations; he should have drawn along after him, more let and encumbrance, that help and succour by them. Take this, over and besides, The Romans had fresh supplies always ready and near at hand, at home in the City: whereas Alexander his army (as afterwards it happened to Annibal warring in a strange country) would have waxed old and decayed. They had for their armour and weapons, a shield or buckler, and a spear in manner of a pike. The Romans had a target of larger capacity to cover the whole body, and a javelin, being a weapon much better and more forcible than the pike, either to strike and push withall near hand, or to be lanced a far off. The soldiers, I confess, both of the one side and the other, stood their ground surely, kept their place and array still within their severall ranks. The Macedonian huge Phalanx moved not, was steadfast and alwaies aiter one fort: but the Romans battallion more distinct, and consisting of many parts easie both to divide and display, or to joyn and reunite upon any occasion. To speak now of painful work and travell, what soldier is comparable to the Roman? Who better able to endure all sorts of labour? Alexander by the loss but of one battell had been clean done, and his war at an end forever. But the Romans, whose hearts, neither the shameful disgrace at Cun-dinna, nor the wofull defeat at Cannae, could amare and danc; what power would have discouraged? What battell in the world would have broken their backs? Certainly, Alexander although he had prosperity and good success in his first beginnings and enterprises, would oftentimes have missed his Persians and Indians, and desire with all his heart to have had dealing with them again, and other cowardly and dastard Nations of Asia: nay, he would have said, that he had warred before but with women, as Alexander, King of Epirus (by report) gave out, when he was wounded to death, conferring the ease occurrents of war which this young Prince's nephew met withal in Afra, with the difficulties of his own, that he found herein in Italy. And verily, when I call to mind and remember the conflicts and fights at sea, in the first Punic war, for the space of twenty four years, with the Carthaginians, I suppose the whole age of Alexander would hardly have brought about and finished that one war, and against one of those two States. And peradventure, when both Carthaginians and Romans had been combined, either according to the ancient leagues, or for equal fear of a common enemy, and those two Cities most puissant both for men and munition, had taken arms at once against him, he would have been overwhelmed with the Punic and Roman war together. Moreover, the Romans have made good proof of the Macedonians as enemies; if not when they had Alexander to be their Captain, nor while the Empire of Macedonia was at the best, and stood upright unfoiled: yet tried them they have, and made head against them under the conduct of Antiochus, Philip, and Perseus: and it never cost them the loss and overthrow of their own part, nor so much as any appearance of danger at all. I would not be thought to speak a proud word, but be it said without arrogance, and setting all our civil wars aside: never were we distressed, either by horde or foot, never in open field and battel ranged, never on even and plain ground, never in unequal places of disadvantage, were we endangered. The souldier in heavy and complex harness, I confess, may fear the Cavalry in the plains: may fear shot of arrows, comber some forests and woods, straight gullies, and unpaffable wilds, without waies forward or backward: but let there be a thousand armies greater and stronger than the Macedonians or Alexanders, so long as we hold together, and continue still in this love of peace and care of civil concord, wherein we live at this present, we are able and ever shall be, to discomfit and put them all to flight.

After this were M. Follius Flaccus, and L. Plautius Venox Consuls. The same year there came from sundry Nations of the Samnits Embassadors, to treat for the renewing of the league, and moved the Senat, most humbly kneeling prostrate upon the ground: but being put off and referred to the people, their prayers availed not to such effect: for as concluding a league, they had a stay nay. And after they had for certain daies together importuned them one by one apart, with cap and congee: at length after much suit, they obtained truce for two years. And out of Apulia the Theanians and Canusins wearied with rodes and spoil made in their Territories, after they had put in hostages to Lucius Plautius the Consul, yielded themselves to his protection. The same year first began Provols to be created at Capua, to govern under certain laws given unto them by L. Furius the Pretor: after that themselves had made suit for the one and the other, as a remedy for their state, greatly decalcated through civil discord. And at Rome were two more Tribes added to the rest, Ufretina, and Falerina. When Apulia began once to shrink and go backward, the Theanians being also Apulians, presented themselves unto the new Consuls, C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Emilius Barbula, and sued to enter into a league with the Romans. And since they were the men that led the way first, and by their example and perswasion induced all Apulia to be in peace with the Romans, and had confidently undertaken, as sureties and pledges to bring it to pass they obtained their request. Yet was not the league indifferent and formal, with equal conditions, but so, as they should be in subjection to the people of Rome. After that Apulia was conquered (for Junius had won also Tarentum, a strong town and rich) they marched forward against the Lucans. Then upon the sudden coming of Emilius the other Consul, Nesulum was by force taken. And after that it was noised abroad amongst the allies of the people of Rome, that the state and weal publike of Capua were established by Roman discipline and government, the Antians also, who made moan and complained, that they lived without positive law and Magistrates, obtained of the Senate certain Advocats and Commissioners, to ordain Statutes likewise for that Colony. So, that not only the Roman arms, but also their law and jurisdiction extended far and near, and was of great request. C. Junius Bubulcus, and Q. Emilius Barbula Consuls, in the end of the year, delivered their Legions not to the Consuls by them created, S. Nautius, and M. Popilius, but consigned them to L. Emilius the Dictator. Who with his General of horde, L. Fulvius, began to lay siege to Saricula, whereby he gave the Samnits occasion to rebell. Which brought upon the Romans a double fear two waies. For of the one side the Samnits having assembled a mighty army, to deliver their allies from the siege, pitched their Camp not far from the Romans' leagger: on the other side, the Satricans let open their gates suddenly, and with a great tumult brake into the wards and corps de guard of their enemies. And so both parts, relying rather upon hope of succour and help elsewhere, than trusting upon their own strength, within a while began to charge the Romans in full battell, with banner displayed, and distressed them. And although the Dictator was assailed both waies, yet was he sure and safe on either side, because he had got a plot of ground, not easie to be compassed, and made head both against the one and the other, advancing his ensignes accordingly. Howbeit, he charged more hotly upon them that sallied forth, and without much ado beat them again within the walls. Then turned he the whole battell upon the Samnits. Where there was hard hold, and more to do. The victory, though long first, was neither doubtful nor variable. The Samnits being chased and driven into their Camp, having in the night put out all their fires, dislodged and departed privily away: and being pift all hope of defending Saricula, they besieged Plifia, a town confederate to the Romans; to requite their enemy with the like disadvantage. The resolution of the year being gone about, the war continued under the conduct of

A Q. Fabius Dictator: and the new Consuls, like as the former remained still at Rome. And Fabius came before Saricula to receive the Army of Emilius, bringing with him a new supply to make up the broken bands: for the Samnits made no stay at Plifia, but having levied and sent forth fresh souldiers from home, presuming upon their great numbers, encamped in the very place where they lay afore: where by braving the Romans, and challenging them with many skirmishes, they would have forced them to raise the siege. But the Dictator so much more earnestly bent his forces against the wals of the enemies, thinking it the best piece of service to assail the Town, as being of such importance to the rest of the war, which depended thereon: and was more careful therefore of the Samnits, and only opposed against them certain guards both day and night, along the trench and rampire, to keep them from making any assault upon the Camp. But the Samnits on the other side, so much the more fiercely skirmished on horseback about the fortifications, and never gave them rest. In so much, as when the enemy now was at the point to enter the gates of the Camp, the General of the Horde, Q. Emilius Cereatus, without advice and direction of the Dictator, riding forth in a great noise with all his Cornets of Horde, repelled the enemy. But even in that light manner of skirmish, and no let battel of any long continuance, Fortune lo paid her part, and shewed what she could do, that on either side there befall notable loss, with the glorious death of both the Captains. For the General of the Samnits first taking it to heart, to see Emilius so fiercely led and give the charge, and himself to be distressed and driven out of his place, with much intreating and exhorting his horsemen, renewed the fight. Against whom, as he advanced himself bravely to be seen amongst his men and fought most valiantly, the Roman General of the horde, which (pear in rest, so galloped his horde, that with one push he unhorsed him and left him for dead: and yet for all this was not the whole troop besides (as commonly it is seen) at the fall of their Captain so much amazed, as provoked rather to fight. For they that were about him charged Emilius hard as he rashly rode without heed, and engaged himself too far within the thickest of the squadrons of his enemies, and lanced their javelins at him: but they gave the special honour to the brother of the Samnits Captain to be revenged for his death. He, full of anger and sorrow, plucked Emilius from his horde, and slew him in the place, even in the midst of his victory: and for that he fell among the troops of his enemies, he had like to have left his dead corps among the Samnits. But presently the Romans alighted on foot, and the Samnits were forced to do the same: and thus being arranged suddenly in great haste into battallions, there began a cruell fight on foot about the bodies of the Captains. Wherein the Romans went clear away with the better, and having recovered the corps of Emilius, in great joy, intermingled with sorrows, they returned winners into their Camp. The Samnits thus having lost their Captain, and grieved their strength what they could do in fight on horseback, left Saricula, which they supposed could not possibly be defended, and to returned again to the siege of Plifia. After few daies, Saricula was surrendered by composition to the Romans, and the Samnits by assault won Plifia. Then changed they the seat town of the war. For out of Sannium and Apulia, the Legions were removed to Sora. This Sora was revolted to the Samnits, and had slain all the inhabitants therein, that were Romans. E Against which place, when the Romans were come first by great journeyes to revenge the loss of their Countrymen, and to recover the Colony, their epials and Scouts whom they had sent out dispersed along the high waies, brought word, that the Legions of the Samnits followed, yea, and one after another gave advertisement, that they were not far off. Hereupon they went forth to meet with the enemy, and near to a place called Lanula, there was fought a desperate and dangerous battel: for no slaughter it was, nor flight of either part, but the very sight that parted them, and they knew not whether they had the better or the worse. In some Chronicles I find, that the Romans lost the day, and that they died in this battell. Q. Emilius General of the horde, C. Fabius chosen in the room of Emilius, came with a new and fresh army from Rome, and having dispatched messengers before to the Dictator to know his advice, where he should stay and rest, and what time, and withon on horse should set upon the enemy: after he was well informed, and instructed in all points what to do, he put himself close in ambush. The Dictator himself, who had for certain daies after the last skirmish, kept his souldiers within trench, more like one besieged, than besieging, all on a sudden, put forth the signal and token of battel: and thinking nothing more difficult, to animate and kindle the coverages of hard men, than to know of no other help or hope, nor to trust upon any man but in themselves, he concealed from his souldiers the coming of the General of Horde and his fresh forces, and so there had been no other way but one, even to break forth and fall with token. "We being (quoth he) my souldiers, pent here and taken tardy in these straights have no other issue but that which by victory we shall make open. Our hold, wherein we lie is fortified here enough, but G the time for scarcity of all things no more, is long, and hurtfull to us: for all parts hereabout are revolted from whence we should have convoy of victuals: and were it that the people were disposed to help us, yet the advences & passages are hard, and the place of one abode incommo- dious. Therefore will not I deceive and abuse you any longer, by leaving here your tents (to which ye may after ye have misfed, the entire victory) because your selves, as ye did the other day: for our fortifications and holds, ought to be defended by force of arms: and not our arms by forced forts. Let them have their Camp well fortified, to shut them out and to retire thither again at their pleasure, who have a purpose to make a long war of it. But let "us cut off all regard of other matters, but only of a present and final victory. Advance then! your ensigns directly against the enemy: and so soon as our Army is once without the trench and rampiers, let them let the tents a fire, that have the charge so to do you shall make up your losses again, my soldiers, with the spoil of all the nations heretofore, that have revolted. At this speech of the Dictator, which shewed no other semblance but of extreme necessity, the soldiers took heart and were hot for to march straight to the enemy. And the very sight of their tents burning behind them (albeit those only which stood next were set on fire, for so the Dictator had given commandment) was no small provocation and prick unto them. And therefore they gave a charge like mad men, and at the first push and brunt they brake the array of the enemies: and withal, in good time, the General of the horse, when he saw a far off the tents on fire (for that was the signal agreed between them) came hastily upon the back of the enemies and assailed them. So the Samnites being environed round about, made every man what shift he could to get forth and escape, and so fled. But the main multitude that were shuffled together all on a round heap, for fear, being an hinderance one to another in the press, was slain in the midst and cut in pieces, the enemies camp won, and ransacked: with the pillage whereof the soldiers were laden and the Dictator brought them back unto their own Camp: who were not so joyous for the victory, as for that they found (besides a little part thereof disfigured by fire) all the rest safe and found, beyond their expectation.

From thence they returned to Sora, where the new Consuls M. Petillius and Cassius Sulpitius took the Army at the hands of Fabius the Dictator: who discharged many of the old soldiers, and brought certain new cohorts for supply in their stead. But when by reason of the difficult and unaccessible sight of the Town, they knew not well which way, and by what means to make assault, and feeling that the winning of it would either ask long time, or be exposed to manifold and present dangers: a certain runaway-Traitor of Sora who was closely stolen out of the Town, got to the Roman Sentinels, and required forthwith to be brought to the Consuls: who being presented before them, promised to betray the Town: and being questioned withal, how and by what means he would perform that which he undertook, seemed unto them to allege some reasons to good purpose, and prevailed so far with them, that he caused the Roman Camp, which lay in a manner close under the walls, to be removed six miles off the Town, saying, that thereby, the wards by day, and the watch by night would be neglected, and less careful and diligent to keep the City. Himself the night following, after he had willed certain cohorts of horsemen to lie in ambush within the woods near the Town, took with him select and chosen soldiers: and through steep places, and such as were not well passable, conducted them into the Castle, having brought thither more shot and darts to throw than to serve for small number of men: besides, there was good store of stones at hand, which lay there, either scattered by chance (as commonly in such craggy and rocky ground) or else heaped together by the townsmen of purpose, for the better defence of the place. Where, after he had bestowed the Romans, and shewed them a narrow and steep path-way out of the town into the Castle. From getting up here (quoth he) there needs no more but three men only well armed to keep back the greatest multitude that is: ye are in number ten, and more than that, Romans: and of Romans the most hardy and valiant: the place will stand you. I know, the darkness of the night will be for your purpose, the night, yfay, which by reason of uncertainties, maketh all things seem much more than they are to men affrighted and amazed already. I will for my part set all in a hurry bury, look you in the mean time that you duly keep the fortrels. This said, he runs down with as great a noise and shouting as he could; crying, Alarm, help, help Citizens, the Castle is taken by the enemy, come away to defence. These words he rebounded ever as he rapped at the gates of the principal Citizens and Noblemen: these words he redoubled aloud to all that he met, and to as many as ran forth affrighted into the streets. This fearful alarm received from one man: was set abroad by many more all over the City. The Magistrates quaking for fear, sent certain to the Castle in secret to discover the truth: and advertised by them that the Castle was surprized indeed by armed men, and full of armor for they made the number, and every thing else, more than it was) were plain put out of all hope to recover their Fortrels. So every where they fell to running away: the gates were broken open by them that were not well awake, and those most part unarmed. At one of the gates, those companies of the Romans afore said, who lay in ambush, and were raised with the noise and clamour, brake in, and killed all that in this night ran headlong in their way. This was Sora won against the Consuls should come in the morning betimes by break of day: and look whose fortune it was to escape out of the massacre made in the night, and to flee away those they took to mercy upon submission: whereof two hundred twenty five, even those who by the general voice of all were pointed at, and reputed above the rest the principal actors in that horrid massacre afore said of the Roman Colonies, inhabitants, and the authors of thereof: they had away with them to Rome, bound hand and foot. The other multitude they left at Sora a half dead and planted there a garrison. All they that were brought to Rome were in the market-place scourged with rods, and beheaded with the exceeding joy and contentment of all the Commons, whom it concerned most, that the multitude which should be sent into sundry Colonies might in every place live in safety and security of their lives.

A Territories of the Aufonians: for the coming of the Samnites after the battle of Lautula, they were all out, full of insurrections and commotions, and many conspiracies there were in all places about Campania: neither was Capua itself without blame and faultless. Nay, this matter passed as far as to Rome, where information was made against some of the Nobles, and warning given to enquire into them. But the whole nation of the Aufonians, by reason that the Cities were betrayed, like as Sora, was reduced under obedience to the people of Rome, Aufonia, Minturne, and Veii were the Cities, out of which twelve of the chief young Gentlemen having conspired and sworn together to betray their own Cities, presented themselves unto the Consuls, giving them to understand, "That their countrymen wished long ago for the coming of the Samnites, and so soon as they heard of the battle near Lautula, made account that the Romans were utterly vanquished, and helped the Samnites both with men and munition. But now, say they, that the Samnites were chased from thence, they lived unresolute in doubtful terms of peace, and shut not their gates in dread upon the Romans, for fear of bringing war upon themselves, yet obdurdly bent to shut them, if their Army approached toward them. In this wavering and doubtful floating of their minds, they might at unawares be suddenly surprized. By this perswasion of theirs they encamped nearer, and at one and the self same time were soldiers lent about those three towns before named, some in armor closely to lie in ambush in convenient places near the walls: others in hide gowns with swords under them, who a little before day, so soon as the gates were set open, should enter into those Cities. By whom the matter was so handled, that at one instant they began to kill the warders at the gates, and gave a signal to those armed soldiers who lay in ambush, for to rise at once and come to succour. Thus were the gates seized and possessed, and three towns in one hour by the same stratagem surprized. But because this exploit was performed in the absence of the Captains, there was no stay in execution and slaughter, but beyond all measure, and without all mercy, no sex nor age was spared: and so the whole nation of the Aufonians, before they were detected for certain of revolt, was destroyed and extinguished, as if they had warmed mortally and been at deadly feud.

The same year Luceria came into the hands of the Samnites, by reason that the City had betrayed and delivered the Roman garrison to them: but the traitors went not long unpunished for it. The Roman Army chanced to be not far from thence, and at the first assault, the City standing as it did on a plain, was won. The Lucerians and Samnites both were put to the sword every one: and so far forth proceeded their furious rage, that when the Senate sat in council at Rome, about sending men to inhabit Luceria, many were of mind, that the City itself should be raised to the ground and destroyed: for besides the cursed and execrable hatred they bare against them being twice conquered and revolted: the distance also of the place so remote, caused them to mislike greatly, and abhor the confining, as it were, of their Citizens, so far from home, to live amongst such a kind of people so cruel and dangerous. However, their opinion took place and prevailed: who gave advice, that Colonies and inhabitants should thither be sent, and to the number of 3500 were there planted.

The same year when as the Romans found all unjoyal unto them, and nothing but falsehood on all sides; at Capua also certain secret conspiracies of the Nobles and best of the City were detected and revealed. Touching which, the Senate advice was asked, and the matter not neglected by them, but Commissions were appointed: and thought good it was that a Dictator should be nominated for to sit upon the same commissions and inquisitions. And C. Manius was created, who named M. Feltius General of the Horse, Great was the terror of that Magistrate, and thereupon either for fear or guiltiness of conscience, the two Calpurnii, Quintus and Novius, who were the chief of that complot, before information was given against them by name to the Dictator died: & questionless by their own hands (horred their daies and so avoided the trial of justice and punishment accordingly. After that, when the Inquisition wanted subject matter once about the Capuans, the Inquisitors (by interpretation of words in the Commission) proceeded to Rome, saying, that the Senate had good warrant to make enquiry and straight search, not by name and precisely, who at Capua only: but generally, who in any place whatsoever had used conveniences, and conspired against the Common-wealth: and all secret meetings, say they, and packings together, for to get Dignities and Offices, were directly against the State and Common-wealth: so that the Commission extended larger both for person and real action. Yea, and the Dictator himself nothing gain said, but that the verue of his Commission was directed without limitation. Hereupon were certain Gentlemen of the Nobility brought into question: and notwithstanding they were called upon the Tribunes for to assist them, with interposing their negative, yet there was not one of them would favour and relieve them, the preiudgment was taken against them, and they indicted. Then the Nobility, I mean not them alone who were in trouble, but generally the whole Gentry of the City, at once, pleaded, that they were not the natural and true Noblemen indeed, who were to be touched and charged with this crime: who if it were not for sinister and indirect courses, had ease and open places unto all honourable places and promotions: but certain new upstarts and Gentlemen of the fifth head: saying, That it was the very case of the Dictator himself, and his General of Horse, who were rather parties guilty, and offenders themselves, than sufficient inquirors, and competent Judges: and that should they well know and understand, when they were once out of their place and office. This made Manius to bestir himself, who mindful of his good name and reputation, than respective of his high place and absolute absolute government, went up into the common place of audience before all the people, and spake to this effect: "My Matters and friends all Citizens of Rome, well assured I am, that private are to the whole carriage and course of my former life; and besides that, even this very honour and dignity which you have bestowed upon me, is able to rectify and approve mine innocence. For, to sit upon these iniquities, there was not to be chosen now for Dictator (as oftentimes heretofore, according to the dangerous occasions and necessity of the time) a man reputed the best and most noblest warrior of all others; but such a one, as throughout his whole life hath most of all militated and condemned ambitious conventicles. Howbeit, forasmuch as certain persons of noble lineage, (for what cause, it is more meet for you to deem and judge than for me being a Magistrate, to speak without book, as they say, and upon no sure ground) first have endeavoured with all their might and main to overthrow the process of the inquisition itself; and afterwards, seeing they were not able themselves to bring that about (notwithstanding they were Patritii) have fled to the holds of their very adversaries, even the protection of the Tribunes and their negative, rather than to justify themselves and stand to the trial of their cause; and at last having there also a repulse (which means slier than to approve their innocence) have fallen upon us, and bashed not (private men as they are) to accuse and touch the person of him that is Dictator: to the end therefore, that both God and man and all the world may know, that as they have assiduously to compass that which they are not able to bring to pass, namely, to avoid the rendering an account of their life and demeanor; so, I am ready (to set forward their accusations) to offer myself unto mine adversaries; and giving them means to call me to mine answer, here I resign up my Dictatorship. And I beseech you, O Consuls, if so be this charge be laid on you by the Senat, to proceed in examination against me first, and this Gentleman the General of Horse M. Feltius: that it may appear, how we, through our own innocency alone, and not by the countenance and privilege of our dignity and high calling, are protected and safe from these slanders and intended crimes. Herewith he gave over his place of Dictator: and after him incontinently, M. Feltius yielded up his roomlikewise of General over the Horse. These persons were the first, who being charged and put to their trial judicially before the Consuls, (for to them by order from the Senat, was the commission directed) notwithstanding all the depositions and testimonies of the Patritii, were in every point found unguilty, and acquitted. P. Philo also, albeit he had at many times attained to the supreme dignities of state, after he had achieved so many worthy deeds, as well in peace as war, yet a man maliced or envied rather of the Nobility, was put to plead for himself, and finally absolved. But this inquiry into such men of name and quality, lasted no longer in force, (as it is usually seen) than while it was fresh, and in the first heat thereof. From them it began to fall to persons of less reckoning and baser account, until such time, as by the same conventicles and factions against which it was devised, it fell to the ground, and was trodden underfoot.

The bruit of these things, and more than that, the hope of the Campains revolt, whereto certain had conspired and sworn (as ye have heard) recalled the Samnites back again to Caudium, who were turned and bent wholly into Apulia: that from thence, being so near at hand unto Capua, they might (it haply any insurrection and trouble presented the overturn and opportunity) seize upon it and take it perforce from the Romans. Thither came the Consuls with a strong and mighty army: and at the first they staid and lingered about the passes and straits, having on the one side and the other an ill way of passage unto the enemies. Afterwards the Samnites fetching a short compass about, came down with their army through the open places into the plains, I mean, the champaign country and fields about Capua. And that was the first time that the enemies had a fight one of the others Camp. Whereupon by light skirmishes, on horseback oftner than on foot, they tried masteries on either side: neither were the Romans one jot discontented with the issue and event thereof, nor repented of the delay whereby they drew the war a length. Contrariwise, the Samnites perceived their forces to wear daily by small losses, and their courage to cool and decay evidently by that lingering war. Whereupon, they came abroad into the field and divided their Cavalry into wings: with a special charge, to have a more careful eye backward toward their camp (for fear of any impression and assault that way than to the main battle: which would be guarded safe enough by the Infantry. The Consul marshalled themselves in this manner Sulpicius led the right point of the battle and Peitius the left: the right side (where as the Samnites also were arranged in thinner ranks and files, of purpose to compass and environ the enemies, or not to be compassed and enclosed themselves) shewed itself more abroad and open. They on the left hand, besides that they stood thicker and more close, were by occasion of a sudden policy of Peitius the Consul further strengthened. For those cohorts and bands which were reserved apart in the rearward, for help at any need, and kept fresh against all occurrences and hazards of long fight, he advanced presently to the forefront in the van guard and with all his forces at once charged the enemy at the first encounter & forced him to retreat. When the footmen of the Samnites were thereby troubled and disheartened, the horsemen followed close and entered into the skirmish. But as they rode cross and overthwart between the two hosts, the Roman horsemen picked and galloped their horses to flank them: and disordered and troubled the enemies, cornets, squadrons and troops of foot and horse pell-mell together, until he had caused the whole battle of that side to turn their backs. In this left point not Peitius alone, but Sulpicius also joyned with him, and was present in person to exhort and encourage the soldiers: for he had transported and distracted

A distracted himself from his own men, who as yet were not come to join battle at the city & shout that arose from the left side: and seeing on that part undoubted victory, he went towards his own charge, accompanied with 1200 men: Where he found a change of fortune, namely, the Romans to have retreated and lost ground, and the enemy as victor, advancing forward his ensigns upon them fore-dimaid and daunted. Howbeit, the Consul his coming made a present alteration: for both at the sight of their Captain were the soldiers hearts refreshed and comforted; and for to aid them, there came a greater supply indeed than in shew of number, of all and lusty men. So when they heard first, and saw soon after, the victory got of the other part, they renewed the fight. After this on all sides the Romans had the better hand, and the Samnites giving over fight, B were either slain or taken prisoners: saving only those, who fled to Malercentum a town now named Beneventum. It is left in record that there were upon 3000 Samnites, either left killed in the place, or brought away captive.

The Consuls having obtained this notable victory, forthwith from thence lead their Legions (taking leave unto Bovinum) and there wintered before the Town, until such time as C. Peitius (chosen Dictator together with M. Feltius his General of the Horse, by the new Consuls L. P. P. P. P. for the fifth time, and C. Jun. Bubulcus the second time) received the Army at their hands. Who hearing, that the Castle of Frégella was by the Samnites taken, left Bovinum, and went forward to Frégella, which he recovered again without drawing his sword: for that the enemies had quit the place, and were fled by night: and when he had placed a strong garrison there, he returned from thence into Campania, of special purpose to regain Nola by force of arms. Thither were retired within the walls, a little before the Dictator his coming, both all the whole multitude of the Samnites, and the ritual priests about Nola. The Dictator having viewed the situation of the Town, to the end he might have the more open access to the walls, set all the houses on fire that were in the suburbs along the counter-slope (and there they stood thick and were well inhabited). And not long after, whether it were by Peitius Dictator (I know not) or C. Junius Consul (for it is reported as well of the one as the other) Nola was forced and won. They that would draw unto the Consul the honour of winning Nola, add moreover and say, That he won also Atina and Calatia: and that Peitius upon a petition that began, was made Dictator, for the setting or fastning of a spike or great nail. Two Colonies that year were conducted to Surfusa and Pontia, Surfusa belonged to the Aurunci. The Volscians inhabited the Island Pontia, situated over against their own shore within a kenning. And a decree passed from the Senat, that to Cassianum also, a third Colony there should be sent inhabitants. M. Valerius and P. Decius, the Consuls that next succeeded, ordained three Triumvirs, for that purpose, and sent four thousand to people those places.

The war with the Samnites was in a manner now dispatched and brought to an end: but before that the Nobles and Senators of Rome had let the care thereof a brute was blown of the Tuiscans war. And there was in those daies another nation (being the Gauls tumults aside) whose forces and hostility they more feared; for that their country was so near a neighbour and so populous withal. Therefore, whiles one of the Consuls was occupied in dispatching the reliques of the war in Samnium, P. Decius who staid at Rome grievously felt, by authority of the Senat, named Dictator C. Junius Bubulcus. He according as the important affairs required, caused all the younger sort to take the military oath, and prest them for soldiers. Armor, and whatsoever requisite besides, with great diligence he prepared. And albeit he were thus furnished and well appointed yet was he nothing bold and forward to begin war, willing (no doubt) to be quiet and stand upon his guard, unless the Tuiscans themselves themselves first in arms. The same purpose had the Tuiscans also, both in preparing for war, and in making stay to begin war. So, of neither side they departed out of their own limits.

In that year there was a famous Censorship of App. Claudius, and C. Plautius. But the name of Appius became more memorable of the twain, and of happier renown unto posterity, for that he paved with stone the cauley or "Pore-way" (bearing his name) and conveyed a channel of water into the City of Rome, which works he finished alone, for that his Colleague for shame of an infamous and odious choice of certain Senators which he made, gave over the office. But Appius having the stout stomach, engrained in his name and house from the beginning, bare the Censorship alone. By the motion and means of the same Appius, the Patritii, to whose family properly belonged the Priestly service, at the altar of Hercules called Maxima, had taught certain publick servantes (for that the function might be committed over to them as delegats) the solemn rites and ceremonies of that sacred ministry. Hereupon is reported a wonder to be spoken, and that which might strike a scruple of conscience, and make men afraid ever after, to alter any thing in religion from the former state and first institution. For whereas at the same time there were twelve houses of the Patritii, and in them about thirty that were above fourteen years of age; within one year it is said, that they died all, with their whole issue and off-spring. Moreover, that not only the name of the Patritii became thus extinct, but that Appius also the Censor, within certain years (such was the ire of the gods mindfull of revenge) fell blind. Therefore the Consuls that followed in the next year, C. Junius Bubulcus the third time, and Q. Emilius Barbula the second time, in the very entrance of their office framed a complaint unto the people: That by the leud and corrupt Election of some new Senators, that honourable state and order was deformed, and namely, how some were over-slipp, who were of more worth than those that were taken in: And saying plainly, That

That they would not observe and have in any regard such a choice, which without respect of good and bad was made for favour and affection to some, and at the pleasure of the Censors: and immediately they cited the Senat by name in that order and form, as had been used before the Censors, App. Claudius and C. Plautius.

And in that year were two places of charge and command, first given by the people, both pertaining to warfare: the one, that sixteen Colonels for four Legions, should from that time forward by the people be created, which before were in a manner the gifts and favours conferred by the Dictators and Consuls: and few or none of the people had any hand or voice therein. This Act and Ordinance was propounded by L. Postumius and C. Marcius, Tribunes of the Commons. The other was, That the same people should have the appointment and ordaining of two Duumvirs at sea for the fitting, repairing, and trimming of the Navy. The maker of this Act was M. Delcius, another Tribune of the Commons.

I wouldler pass nothing that happened this year, as of small weight and importance, and not worth the speaking, but that it seemed a matter pertinent to religion. The minstrels that played upon the flute and hautbois, for that they were prohibited and debared by the late Censors, to have their good cheer any more in the Temple of Jupiter, according to an old custom and tradition, took snuff there, and in a peeling chafe all in one company went their waies to Tybur: so as there was not one of them in the City left to sing and pipe before the pomp of sacrifices, and on their festival daies. The Senat made some conscience hereof, and were troubled in their mind, Whereupon they dispatched certain messengers to Tybur, to travel with the townsmen, and endeavour all they could, that these good fellows might be restored and sent home again to the Romans. The Tyburtins undertook the matter, and promised right courteously to do their best: and first they sent for these minstrels into their Town-Hall, and perswaded with them to return again to Rome: But when they could not be brought to that, for any thing they could do, then they wrought another policy and feat with them, that forced and fited well the humour of such kind of people and of their coat. Upon a festival holiday, under a colour of making merry with minstrelle and musick about them, some invited one and some another, to give them a fit of mirth accordingly. But they plied them with wine (which all the sort of this profession love but too well) that they drank untill they winked, and winked so long, till they fell fast asleep. And being found asleep, the Tyburtins brought them gently to their beds in certain waggon, and thus bestowed, conveyed them to Rome. Neither perceived they ought, senseless drunken forsy they, before that their wagons were left in the market place of Rome. Nay, before they had slept out and concocted their wine that steamed up into their heads, and clouded there, the day-light came upon them and then they awoke. The people came running together from all parts to them, and after they had ciphered at their hands or charged them to stay, and make no more such frolicke, it was granted unto them, that three daies every year, being disguised and dressed in a mask for the purpose, they might range and walk about the City, with singing, and founding their instruments, after this licentious manner and jollity, which now adies is yearly used, and their privilege of eating in the temple was restored to them again, namely, to such as sung and played in time of their divine service and sacrifices: and all was well. This ridiculous pageant hapned amidst the care and preparation of two great and dangerous wars.

The Consuls parted their Provinces between them: To Junius fell by lot the Samnits to Emilius the new war in Hesperia. In Samnium, Cluvia, a fortress and hold of the Romans being impregnable by an assault, was a long time besieged: and forced by extrem famine, was delivered up to the Samnits. After they were on a Massers of the fort, they took the garri'on soldiers, and notwithstanding they yielded themselves, yet they whipped and tormented flesh most beauly, and in the end, without all mercy killed them. Junius exceeding wroth at this cruelty, thinking nothing more needful to be done, first than the winning again of Cluvia laid all other matters aside, and the same day that he assailed the walls, took it by force, and slew all he could find above fourteen years of age. In this train of victory the Army was brought again to Boiuntium. This was the chief place of the Pentrians in Samnium, the wealthiest City, the best provided, and most furnished of all other with men and munition. The soldiers very eager and sharp set for the rich pillage won the Town. But for that they were nothing so angry and hot of revenge as before, they dealt not so cruelly with the enemies: but they got together and carried away more spoil and faggot from thence than they ever had well near out of all Samnium: and as liberally it was bestowed every whit upon the soldiers. And forasmuch as no pitched battell in plain field, no Camp so well fortified, no Cities and Forts, howsoever fenced, were able to withstand the puissant Romans in force of open arms: all the Princes in Samnium studied and applied their wits to find means of sleight and subtil policy: it haply, as they wasted and forraged the Territories after a loose and licentious manner, the Army disbanded once, might be entrapped and enclosed with in some ambush. It fell out so, that certain fugitive peasants of the Country, and Captives, some by chance, and other of purpose, coming in their way, made relation of tidings to the Consuls: well agreeing all in one tale, and the same founding of a truth indeed; namely, that a great sort of sheep and other cattle were driven together into a by-forest out of the way: and so induced them to lead thither the Legions lightly armed, and to fit their hands with a fat booty. Now the Samnits had privately forelaid all the high waies with a mighty army, and after that they saw the Romans to have entered & engaged themselves within the chafe or forest, all of a sudden

A sudden they rose up and with a great cry and shout ran upon them to charge them when they least thought of any such thing. At the first this so strange and unexpected occurrence made them afraid, while they took them to their weapons, and laid their fardels and baggage together on a heap in the midst. But after that every man was cald of his load, and had put on his armor, they rallied on all sides to their enemies: and without the command or direction of any man, they of themselves put the battell in array, each one knowing his rank and place according to the accustomed order of the ancient Military discipline. The Consul perceiving that he was brought to a most doubtful and dangerous battell, alight from his horse: and protested before Jupiter and Mars, and the other gods whom he called all to witness: "That he came not into that place to get glory to himself by any enterprize, but only a booty for his soldiers: and that no fault else could be imputed unto him but an overmuch desire and affection of his to enrich his soldiers by the spoil of the enemy. From which blame and shame both, nothing could free and acquit him self, but the manhood and prowess of his soldiers: exhorting them with one accord but to slay themselves and endeavour all together to let upon their enemy, defeated and a vanquished in battell driven out of Camp and field, bereaved of his Towns and strong holds, and to know to attempt his last and utmost hope of privy and theifish trains of forlaging, trusting upon the advantage of the ground and not pure force of arms. But what place is there now unassailable or unpregnable to the valiant Romans? Here withall he named the Cattle of Fregella and Sora, and what place of disadvantage and hard access he ever they had won by force. With these words the soldiers encouraged and enflamed, forgetting all diffculties and dangers, marched apace and advanced forward up to the army of the enemies that now approached them, and were over their heads. Where the Romans found some difficulty: all the while they climbed up the cliff or ridge of the hill against them. But after that the foremost engine were mounted up and had gained the plain in the top, and perceived they were embattelled upon an even and equal ground, presently the terror turned upon those that lay in wait for them, & being disbanded, scattered, and driven to fling away their weapons, they fled and trudged as fast as they could to recover again those flanking and lurking holes, wherein before they had hid themselves. But even those difficult places which they had sought of purpose for their enemy, and their own deceit and guile, encumbered themselves. For very few of them could find the way out, and escape by flight, inasmuch as to the number of 20000 were slain. And then the Romans after this victory ran up and down at their pleasure to that booty of sheep and cattle, which was first presented unto them by the enemy, as a bait to catch them with.

Whiles these things thus went in Samnium, all the people of Hesperia by this time, but only the Aretins, were up in arms, and entered into a right great war; beginning first with the siege and assault of Surinam: which City being allied to the Romans, was (as a man would say) the very Barriers of all Hesperia. Thither came the other Consul Emilius with an army to relieve and deliver their allies, and to raise the siege. Against the Romans coming, the Surins currently brought victuals to the Camp, lying before the City. The Tuficans spent the first day in consulting whether they should make a short war of it, by hot assaults, or temporise and protract the time by a lingering siege. The morrow after, when as the Captains liked rather of expedition and hasty courses than of more lase and late proceedings at the sun rising they set out a flag of defiance and the signal of battell, and armed they go forth of their Camp into the open field to fight. Whil' after it was told the Consul, presently he commanded a watch-word to be given, that the soldiers should take their breakfast: and after they had refreshed and strengthened their bodies with food, go straight to arm themselves: which was obeyed accordingly. The Consul seeing them well appointed in readines, commanded the engines to advance forward out of the rampier, and not far from the enemy marshalled his battels. For a good while they stood on both sides, wittily looking, and waiting that the shout and charge should begin from the adverse part. But it was past noon before there was one dart flung or javelin launched either from the one side or the other. But then, because they should not go away without doing somewhat, the Tuficans began to let up a cry the trumpets found the charge, and the standards came forward. Neither were the Romans any jot behind to begin battell: Thus they ran to it, and encountered with exceeding animosity and fury; the enemies more in number, the Romans better in hardiness and virtue, the fight was doubtful and dangerous, and cost the life of many a man on both sides and namely, those that were most forward and valiant: neither began they to shrink on any part, before that the second battalion of the Romans, fresh and lusty, advanced to the forefront of the vanguard into the place of their wearied fellows. The Tuficans for that their vanguard was not supplied and reinforced by any new succours both before and all about their engines were beaten down and slain every man. Never in any one battell had there been less running away, or more bloodshed, if the night had not protected the Tuficans: so resolute were they all to die in the place: inasmuch as the winners gave over play before the loisers. After the sun fell, the retreat was founded: and by night both parts returned into the Camp. After this, no exploit was performed before Surinam that year, worth remembrance: both for that, the forward of the enemies army, was wholly in that one battell defeated and destroyed; and they had none left but the Subsidiary soldiers of the rearward, and those hardly able and sufficient to guard and defend the Camp: and also, the Romans were so hurt and sore wounded, that there were more of them died after the battell of their hurts than were slain in the very skirmish outright. Q. Fabius, Consul for the year following, succeeded ed and entred upon this war at Sutrium. And for his colleague he had C. Marius Rusticus; and like as Fabius brought a new supply from Rome to furnish out the broken bands; so there came fresh forces also unto the Tuscan, levied at home.

For many years there had been no jars and debates between the Magistrates of the Nobility and the Tribunes of the Commons: but now there began a variance and contention out of that family and house, which even then was fatal, (as it were) and born to do mischief to the Tribunes and Commons both. Appius Claudius the Censor, after eighteen months expired (which by the law Emilia was the full term of bearing that Magistracy) notwithstanding that C. Plautius his Colleague had given up his office; but by no means possible before he went to go out and give over the place. Then rose up one P. Sempronius, a Tribune of the Commons, who took in hand this matter as touching the demission of the Censorship within the time prefixed by the law: an action doubtless, not more popular than just and right, nor less acceptable to the better sort, than pleasing to the very Commons and base people. He having frequently rehearsed and reiterated the law Emilia, extolled with praises up to the sky, the author and maker thereof, Marcus Emilius a Dictator: who had reduced the Censorship, an office at that time of five years continuance (a puissance and authority, which by the length thereof favoured of Lordship) within the compass of a year and six months. "Come on, quoth he, Appius Claudius, answer and say, "what you would have done in case you had been Censor, when C. Furius, and M. Genucius were "Censors?" Appius answered and said, that this demand and question of the Tribune did not greatly touch or concern his cause. For put the case, that the law Emilia had obliged those Censors, during whose Magistracy the Act was made, (for that after those Censors created, the people had granted that law, and look what they last allowed and ordained the same was good, lawful, and ratified) yet neither he nor any of them, who after that law enacted were created Censors, could be bound by virtue of that law. Whiles Appius thus cavilled, and no man there present looted him up, or gave applause and assent unto him: "Behold Quintus, quoth Sempronius, "again, the progeny and race of that Appius, who being created Decemvir for one year, elected himself the second year: and in the third, being chosen neither by himself, nor by any other in "quality of a private person, held the sovereign dignity and government, with all the regal marks; and ensigns thereof: and thus continuing still in rule and dominion, would never give over, before that his usurped governments of his ill-gotten, badly born, and naughtily kept and reined, were his final fall and utter overthrow. This is the same family and house, (my Masters and friends, Citizens of Rome) by whose violence, by whose wrongs and oppression, ye were driven like poor banished persons to forgo your own dear native country, and to seize and hold the Mount Sacra: the very same, against which ye procured and purchased to your selves the support and help of Tribunes: the same, for which with two armies ye were fain to possess your selves of the Aventine hill: the same that always withstood the Statutes devised against Utiq; the same that ever impugned the laws for division of wast lands among the people: the same brake for the time, and interrupted the marriages between the Nobles and Commons: the same kept out the Commons so long from bearing any dignities of the Chair, and of State: finally, this name is much more spitefully and mortally bent against your freedom, than that of the Tarquins. And is it to indeed, O App. Claudius? Would you have us believe, that being now an hundred years since Marcus Emilius was Dictator, there have been so many Censors most noble and valiant personages, that none of them all ever rid the twelve Tables? and none of them knew that to be law which the people last granted and allowed? Yes I wis, they all wist that well enough: and thereupon yielded they, and obeyed rather the law Emilia than the old and ancient Statute, (whereby the first Censors were created in the Common wealth) even because the people approved it last: and by reason that there are two ordinances repugnant and contrary one to the other, there the new always repealeth and abrogateth the old. And is this your laying, O Appius? That the people are not bound to the law Emilia or rather that they are tied unto it, but your good self alone is free and exempt therefrom? Was the law Emilia able to bridle and curb those violent Censors C. Furius, & M. Genucius, who shewed ed sufficiently what harm and mischief this Magistracy could do in a Common-wealth, when for anger & despite that their term was abridged and cut short, they disfranchised, and deprived of the right of voice and suffrage yea, and brought within the range of Tributaries, M. Emilius the worthiest and most excellent personage of his time, both at home in peace, and abroad in war? This law took hold of all the Censors, one after another in order, for the space of an hundred years after; and bindeth now C. Plautius your Colleague, created with the same Aulipes, and in equal authority with you. Tell me (I pray you) did not the people elect and make him with as good right and authority as any Censor might be? Are you the only and special man amongst all others to have this prerogative, this privilege and singular preeminence by your self? Suppose a man should create the King Sacrificer, should he, having once got the name and title of a King, give out and avouch, that he was King indeed, of as great a prerogative as any King of Rome? Who, think you, will be content with a Dictatorship of six months, or with an Interregne for five daies and no more? Whom may a man boldly and confidently create Dictator either to fasten a pike or great nail? Or for the state's plaies and games, or horse-running, and such like? How foolish, think ye my Masters, how base-minded and simple were they in this "man his conceits, who within twenty daies, after notable exploits done and achieved, gave over their

A "their Dictatorship? or they that being created with some error and default, went out of their "place? But what need I to rehearse examples of old date? Of late, even within these ten years, "C. Manius Dictator, for enforcing a commission more severely than stood with the fairness of some great & wealthy persons, was charged by them with the guiltiness of the same crime, whereupon he late and made inquisition; who, to the end, that being a private person, he might answer the accusation of his adversaries, and justify himself, resigned up his Dictatorship. But I would not, that you in any hand were so modelt: no, no, degenerate not a jot from that most imperious stock and proud race: go not you forth of your office, howsoever you do, a day no, nor an hour sooner than you needs must: but see then withall, that you exceed not the ordinary time limited "and let down. At leastwise, it might content you to draw out your Censorship a day longer, or "to stretch it farther by a month. A month? what tell you me of a month? I will exercise my Censorship (quoth he) three years and six months, more than may be by the law Emilia: yea, and by myself alone will I exercise it. Yea, my fir, this is somewhat like indeed, and spoken like a King. What will, you will you substitute unto you a Colleague in the room of the other? will you to? Whom "lawfull it is not to subrogate and chosen, no, not in the dead his place? For you think it not enough, belike, that you (religious holy Censor that you be) have translated and transmitted, that most ancient solemnity, and only instituted by that good [Hercules] in whose honour it is celebrated, from the function of most noble Sacrificers and Chaplains, of that divine and sacred service, unto the ministry of base servants, and abject slaves: and that a kindred and lineage of greater antiquity, than the very first foundation of this City, so sanctified by entertainment "and lodging of the immortal gods, by your means, and by occasion of your Censorship, within one year is rooted out and perished every mothers son: unless also by the same means, you hazard the whole Common-wealth, and bring all into the same enormity and guilt of wickedness, which even to preface and conjuncture, my heart doth tremble and quake again. In that [Lustrum] (or five years space) was the City of Rome taken by the Gauls, wherein L. P. Appius Censor, because he might not go out of his Censorship, took a Colleague unto him, M. Cornelius Maluginensis, in the place of C. Julius the Censor late deceased. And yet see how much more sober and moderate was his ambitious humour in that behalf, than this of yours, O Appius. For L. P. Appius neither alone, nor yet beyond the just set time by law administered his Censorship: "D yet found he never any one person after him, that would imitate and follow his example. All Censors from that time forward, upon the death of their fellow Censor gave up the office. But as for you, notwithstanding that the date of your Censorship be fully out, and your companions in government departed out of the place; neither law nor flame, is able to rule and restrain. You suppose that virtue consisteth in pride, in audacious boldness, in contempt both of God and man. For mine own part truly, O App. Claudius, for the reverence and majesty of this honourable place, which you have born, I would not willingly enter into any such hard contests, as to touch your person by violence of hand: no, nor so much as to offend your name with any foul or unkind language. But as these words that have already passed, your own peevish and perverse forwardness, your opinionative contumacy, and insolent pride, having written and forced me to: so unless you will obey the law Emilia, by your leave, I will be so bold as command you to ward and prison. And since our forefathers and ancestors have so provided and ordained, that in the Election of Censors, if either of the twain come forth of sufficient voices required, that to choose him the other cannot be admitted and declared Censor: and so they must proceed again to a new election, and the former Scrutinies are of no effect: shall I suffer you to "exercise the Censorship alone, who may not lawfully be created alone? These and such like remonstrances after he had alleged, he commanded the Censor to be attached and committed. In these proceedings of his, six of his fellow Tribunes adhered unto him, and three only assisted Appius: who called instantly upon them for their protection and lawful succour: and so with exceeding ill will, and highest discontentment of all states and degrees, he went clear away, and bare the Censorship alone.

These matters thus passed at Rome, and Sutrium was besieged (till by the Tuscan: and as the Conf. Fabius was leading about at the foot of the hills, certain forces to succour his allies, & to allail the fortifications of the enemies what way he could, they with an army in battle array met with him. Whose great multitude when he might discover upon the plains underneath, because he would help out the small number of his men by some advantage of the ground, he wheeled a little about, up toward the hill tops (which were rough and craggy places spread all over with stones) and from thence he turned his banners full upon the face of the enemies. The Tuscan forgetting all things, and thinking upon nothing but their multitude, whereof only they presumed; gave battell too hastily and in such greediness, that casting away their shots and darts from them, to the end they might the sooner come to hand-strokes, they drew their swords, as they marched against the enemy. The Romans on the contrary side, laid load with shot, and applied them one while with darts, another while with stones which the place plentifully afforded them. Which, as they thumped and clattered, and flunk upon their shields and morions, although they hurt them not much, yet troubled them not a little: neither could the enemies easily come within them to fight near and close, nor any darts or javelins had they to sling and lance afar off, and thereby to annoy their enemy. And whiles they stood still exposed as Butts, to receive all

to gave ground and retreated, and the whole battle was wavering and unsteady, the Roman Hastati and Principes, came forward with a new shout, and charged them afresh. This violent assault could not the Tuscans bear, but turning their ensigns, fled again in disarray toward their camp.
But when as the Roman horsemen who were rid over through the plains and had gotten before, met them afront in the rout, they left their way unto the Camp, & turned toward the mountains:
from whence with their whole company in a manner disarmed and fore wounded, they recovered the forest Ciminia. The Romans having slain many thousands of the Tuscans, gained thirty eight ensigns of the field, and won also their tents with rich pillage; began to consult about pursuing the enemy. The wood Ciminia was at that time more unpassable and to be feared, than were of late daies the German forests: for never to that day had it been travelled and frequented much as by merchants. And scarcely any one but the Captain himself durst venture to enter into it: for, all the rest had not forgot as yet the unhappy luck they had at Candium. Then the Consul his brother, one that was there, (M. Fabius, as some say, as others, Cas), and as other some C.
Claudian, his brother only by the mothers side) promised that he would go as afcort inpal, to deskry the wood and within a while bring certain news. He had in his tender years been brought up at Cere, among the ancient friends of his house and family, where afterwards he was taught the Tuscan learning and knowledge, and thereby was perfect in their tongue and language. And find some authors of credit that writ, how in those daies the Romans young children went to school to learn to parl Tuscan, as now they do to speak Greek. But it standeth more like a truth, that there was some special matter in this man, who with so bold semblance and diffimulation, durst intrede and insinuate himself amongst the enemies. It is said, that one only servant accompanied him, one who had been brought up and nurled together with him, and thereupon not ignorant of the same language. And all the way as they went they did nothing else, but superficially and after a general sort, learn the nature and site of the quarters which they were to enter into, and the names withall, of the chief rulers and principal personages of that country and nation: to the end that in their speech and talk, they might not alter and trip, and be taken tardy in any apparent thing, which might bewray and discover them. They went clad in pastoral weeds like herd-men, armed like country Kernes or Peasants each of them with a falkion and two javelins. But neither the familiar use and commerce of the tongue, nor the fashion of apparel which they were, or weapons that they carried saved them so much as this one thing, That no man would ever believe, that any forreiner and stranger durst enter upon those thick Ciminian forests. Well forward they went (by report) as far as to the Camerins in Umbria. There the Roman ventured to bewray who they were: and when he was brought in to their Senat, he treated with them in the Consuls name, about a league and amity. Whereupon, alter he had been courteously entertained and friendly intreated he had his dispatch, and was willed to relate unto the Romans, That there should be ready for their army, sufficient victuals for one whole month, if they would come into those parts: Allo, that the youth of the Camerins in Umbria should be at their command, preft in arms at all times. These tidings being reported to the Consul, after that he had sent before his carriages at the first watch of the night and commanded the legions to go after, himself staid still with the horsemen: and the morrow morning by day-light he began to skirmish with the corps de guerd of his enemies, which were quartered without the forest, and when he had long enough kept them play and amused them at his pleasure, he retired into his Camp; from whence he went forth at another gate, and before night overtook the main army. The morrow after, at the point of day-break he was got up to the crest of the hill Ciminia: from whence, after he had beheld and viewed the goodly prospect of the rich grounds and fields of Heituria, he sendeth out his soldiers abroad to forrage and fetch in prizes, and by that time they had got, and were driving a fat booty, certain tumultuary bands of the rustical Peasants of Heituria, gathered together in great hast and of a sudden, by the States of that country met with the Romans; but so out of order were they that being come to rescue a prey, they had like to have been a prey themselves. A number of them were slain or put to flight, and the Romans, having wasted and made spoil all over the country, enriched with store of all things, returned victorious into their Camp. Thither were arrived (as it fell out) five messengers or puffers with the Tribune of the Commons to warn and command Fabius in the name of the Senat, not to pass through the forest Ciminia.
But these messengers being glad that they came too late for to hinder and interrupt their enterprises, returned home again to Rome with news of the victory.

By this expedition and journey made by the Col, the war rather encreased and spread farther, than was dispatched brought to an end. For all that tract lying along the bottom & foot of the mountain Ciminia, felt the smart of this rode and provoked to anger & desire of revenge, not only the State of Heituria, but also the borders and marches of Umbria. Whereupon there came to Sutrinum, a greater power than ever before: for not only they removed their Camp forward out of the woods, but also for the eager desire of fight withal speed, they came abroad into the plain field.
Afterwards, they stood first embattled in a plot, by them sily chosen, leaving over against them a space of ground for the enemies to set themselves in order of battel: but perceiving the enemies to fall off & loath to fight, they approached the very trench and rampiers: but finding there, that the guards were retired within their hold all at once they began to cry with one voice to their captains, for to give order, that the rest of their allowance of victuals for that day should be brought them

them thither out of the camp; for they would stay in their armor and harnefs, as they were, and either in the night, or else in the morning betimes by day-light, give the assault upon their enemies camp. The Roman army was no more quiet then they, yet at their Generals commandment kept in Now it was welcomer the tenth hour of the day. When as the Consul willed his soldiers to take their reftection, and warned them to be ready in arms at what hour soever by day or by night he should give them the signal of battell. And in the mean time maketh a short speech unto them, praising highly, and letting out of the Samnits wars, debating the Tuscans, saying, that there was no comparison between either enemy to enemy, or number for number: over and besides, he said that he had another feat and secret device in store for them, which they should know when time served; in the mean while they must keep silence of necessity, and hold their peace. By these dark speeches and hidden mysteties, he made semblance, as though he had some privy intelligence, that one part of the enemies would betray the rest when time came: this did he, to the end; that the heart of his soldiers (which haply were dismayed and discouraged at their great multitudes) might be comforted and refreshed: and for that the enemies lay abroad in field without any hold and fort, it was more likely and probable, which he pretended. The soldiers having taken their repast, they laid their bodies to repose and sleep, and somewhat before the reliefe of the fourth watch, they were raised without noise, and armed themselves. The soldiers belies and lackies, and such as followed the camp, had mattocks and spades divided amongst them, to call down the ram-pire, and to fill up the ditches with the bank, whilst that within the compasse and circuit of the camp, they were marshalled in battell array. The chosen cohorts or bands were placed at the gates and passages forth. Then at the sound of trumpet, a little before day (which in summer nights is the time of the deepest and soundest sleep) the whole army, when the rampire was laid along and levelled, issued forth at once, and charged the enemies on all sides, lying there and there scattered on the ground. Some before they were stirring, others half asleep and half awake in their couches: but the greater part, making halt in that sudden fright to take arms, were slain and cut in pieces. Few bad time to put themselves in armour, and they having no ensigns, no colours to follow, and no captains to direct them, were by the Romans soon discomfited, put to flight, and pursued in chase. Some made halt to the camp, other to the woods, sundry waies one from another. But the woods were the safest place of refuge. For their camp pitched in a plain, was the same day taken and won. All the gold and silver there found, was by express commandment brought unto the Consul his pavilion; the rest of the pillage, was the soldiers share. Slain and taken prisoners that day, there were of the enemies to the number of 60000. This so noble a battell (some writers say) was fought on the other side of the wood Ciminia, before Perusia: who also report, that the City of Rome was in great fear, lest that the army being inclosed within so dangerous a wood, should have been surprised and defeated by the Tuscans and Umbrians, who were risen up in arms together from all parts. But wherover it was fought, the Romans had the day. Whereupon there came Embassadors from Perusia, * Coriena, and * Arctium, where were in manner the chief and principal Cities at that time of all Tuscan, treating and suing to the Romans for peace, and a league:
but they obtained truce only for thirty years.

During these affairs in Heituria, the other Consul, C. Martius Rutilius, wan from the Samnits the town * Alifia. Many other villages and castles were either utterly demolished and destroyed by way of extreme hostility, or yielded safe and whole unto their subjection. At the same time the Roman navy also, under the Conduct of P. Cornelius, whom the Senat ordained Admiral of the sea-coast, set sail for Campania, and being arrived at * Pompeii, the mariners and sea-servitors went a land to wait and forage the territories about * Nucerina: and after they had made spoil, and pil-laged by inches the parts lying nearest unto the sea, from whence they might safely again return to their ships; they adventured farther for the sweet sake of gain and booty (as usually it falleth out) and so gave the alarm to the enemies for to rise. As they straggled all over the fields, no man made head against them at what time, as they might have been soon slain every one: but as they were returning with a disordered march, and stood not upon their guards, a troop of the peasants of the country overtook them, not far from the Ships, and calsed them of their spoil and pillage, and flew some of them: the rest of the multitude, as many as escaped the sword, were calsed to their feet.

The journey of Q. Fabius beyond the forest Ciminia, as it caused great fear in Rome, so it gave occasion of as joyful news in Samnium. For the rumor ran, that the Romans army was shut up and besieged. And hereupon they called to remembrance, and alledged the like example of a loose and shameful disgrace at Claudian; reporting and giving forth, that these Romans being a nation greedy always of increasing farther, and winning more ground, were through the same rashness now run heading into the blind forests impassable, and invironed not so much with the power and force of enemies, as the dangerous difficulties of those passages. In such sort as amid this joy of others, they envied also that fortune had turned the glorious honour of the conquest over the Romans, from the Samnits, to the Tuscans. And therefore being well appointed with men and armour, they ran out from all parts, to tread down and confound C. Martius the Consul trever: minding from thence, in case Martius would not abide a battell, to go into Heituria through the Marsi and Sabins. But the Consul met with them by the way; where was fought a shippe and cruell battell with doubtful event, and much effusion of blood on both sides. And as uncertain as it was, whether part lost more blood, yet the rumor went, that the Romans had the

worfe, by reason of the losse of certain knights and gentlemen of Rome, and Colonels, and one Lieutenant; and that which made most, for that the Consul himself was hurt. Hereupon the brute (as commonly is seen) got more feathers fill as it flew, and made every thing greater: so as the L.L. of the Senat in Rome, were in great fear and perplexity, and agreed to create a Dictator. Neither was there any doubt at all, but that Papirius Cursor should be the man, who in those daies was reputed the only warrior above all others. But neither could they be assured of sending a messenger into Samnium (considering all the country was up in arms) nor that the Consul was for certain alive. And as for the other Consul Fabius, upon an old secret and privat grudge, he mailed Papirius: which quarrell, left it might hinder the service of the Commonwealth, the Senat thought good to send unto him certain Embassadors (as it were) even such as had been Consuls; who of their own authority, as well as by virtue of publick commission from the State, should admonish and counsel him to remit and forget all old displeasures and rancours, for his countries sake. When these personages were come to Fabius the Col., and had delivered unto him the decree of the Senat, and used withall such speech and reasons of their own, as futed well to the errand they had in charge: the Col. calling his eyes down toward the ground, departed from the Embassadors without giving ever a word, and left them doubtfull what he would do. But the night following, in the dead time (as the manner is) he nominated L. Papirius for Dictator. And when these messengers or Embassadors gave him great thanks for maultering and ruling his affections to exceeding well, he held his resolution still of silence, and without any answer given, or mention made of himself, dismissed them; that it might appear, how upon an high mind and haughty stomach, he bridled and kept in that grief of heart and spitefull anger of his, Papirius named C. Junius Brutus, commander of the horse. And whiles he proposed an act concerning the regiment and command of his army, before the people assembled by the Curia or wards, there hapned a matter of ominous prelage, which caused that businesse to be put off untill the next day: for that the ward Fancia, which by lot had the prerogative now to give the first voices, was noted already for infamous and unhappy, in regard that two calamities which happened in both years, wherein the same Curia likewise began the suffrages first; namely, the taking of the City of Rome, and the Caudine peace, Macer Licinius making that ward ominous and unlucky, for a third losse and calamity received at Verena. But the next morrow, the Dictator, after he had taken new Aspics, went through with the act, and obtained his commission, and set forward with the legions lately mulctured and enrolled upon the fearful alarm given, that the Roman army was pished, the wood Cyminia, untill he arrived at Longula: where, after he had received of the Consul Martius, the old bands of soldiers, he brought his forces into the field to give battell. The enemies for their part seemed not to refuse fight: howbeit, as they stood armed and arranged, and neither the one side nor the other would begin to charge, the night came upon them, and forced them to retire. Then they abode encamped near together in rest and quiet for certain daies, neither distrustling their own puissance, nor yet disdainning and despising their enemies. In this mean time there was doings and war in Etruria: for both there was a battell fought with the army of the Umbrians: howbeit, the enemies were rather discomfited and put to flight than slain, for that they were not able to hold out and maintain fight long with such courage and animosity as they began: and also near the lake and Meer Vadimon, the Tuicans had levied a new army, according to a sacred law, whereby one man had chosen another (who as sworn brethren were to live and die together) where they fought a field, not only with greater number, but also with more courage than ever at any time before: and with such heat of anger and malice one against the other they encountered, that of neither side they thought of discharging shot and slancing darts, but began at the very first with their swords to go to handstrokes: and the conflict being right fiercely begun, increased still, and waxed hotter in the very skirmishes, and continued for a good while so doubtful, that the Romans thought they dealt not with Tuicans so often by them defeated and vanquished, but with some new nation more warlike than they. No shew of flight on neither side; downgo the foremost, and lay dead before their Standards: and left that the ensignes should be left naked and bare, and without the defendants, the second range and ward of the battailon came in place to supply the first: and so still new succours and fresh were set even as far as from the rearward behind, destined for the last help and utmost refuge. And to that extremity of travel and perill they proceeded, that the Roman horsemen abandoning their horses alighted on foot, and were faine to go to the footmen in the forefront of the vanguard, over armor, and over dead bodies, lying all spread upon the ground: which new troop and battailon risen and sprung (as it were) a fresh, to reinforce and strengthen their distressed fellows, disordered the squadrons and ensignes of the Tuicans. The other legionary soldiers, wearied (as they were) followed hard and seconded their violence and forceable charge, and at length brake through the ranks of their enemies. Then the Tuicans as (like as they stood afore, began to have the worfe, and certain bands gave way and retreated: and when they encountered back, they fell plainly to take their heels and run away. This was the first day, that overthrow and laid along the puissance of the Tuicans, who abounded so long in wealth and fortunate prosperity. Their whole force and strength which they had, was in this battell slain, and at the same time their camp won and ransacked.

With like hazard and glorious successe of the end, was the war managed with the Samnites soon after: who besides all other preparations and ordinary furniture of war, gave order that

A their army should glitter and shine agreeable with a new kind of garnishing their harness and armors. For having divided their forces into two armies, the one he laid their shields with gold, the other with silver. The form and fashion whereof was this, that upper part where with the brekt and shoulders are covered, was broader, and the head of it of even height: but the nether end growing downward to the bottom was more pointed wedge-wise, for to weld it more nimbly. Their breast and stomack was fenced with punges, the left leg armed with a good greave, their morions with high crests made a shew of tall stature. The shoulders afore said with gilded shields wore coats of sundry colours; the other with silvered, white linnen: and these had the leading of the right wing, or point of the battell; but they of the left. The Romans had notice and knowledge already what preparation there was of brave and goodly armor: and their Captains had taught them more, that a souldier ought to be dreadful and terrible, not dight and decked in his damasked gold and silver, but trusting in the sharp edge of iron and steel, and a good heart and courage withall: and as for that other furniture, it was rather a good booty than a mor of proof; fair and refulgent, before men come to the sharp, but foul and uneimely amongst bloody wounds. The true ornament and beauty of a souldier, is valour and hardinelle; as for all those braveries, they went commonly with victory: and to conclude, that a rich enemy would serve well for a good prize to the conqueror, were he never so poor and needy. With these speeches after that Cursor had animated his souldiers, he leadeth them into the field: himself the put in the right wing; the left he committeth to the conduct of the Generall of horse, so soon as they charged one another and buckled together, a great conflict and hardy had they with the enemy, and no lesse emulation there was between the Dictator and him; driving much whether of them twin should becom the victory. But as hap was, first Junius disordered the enemy, and from the left point which he commanded, he charged right lustily the right wing of the enemies: laying ever and anon, that he offered and sacrificed unto the Devill and infernall spirits, those souldiers of theirs, consecrated already unto them after the manner of the Samnites, and decked accordingly in white livery, and bright silvered armour, suting in colour therunto: and withall advanced forward his standards, brake their aries, and made the battell to shrink evidently and give ground. Which when the Dictator perceived, How now, quoth he, shall the victory begin at the left wing, and shall the right, wherein the Dictator fighteth in person, come behind and follow the battell of another, and not carry away with it the greatest part of the victory? Herewith he letteth on his souldiers, yet gave the horsemen no place in manhood to the footmen, or the service of the Lieutenants was intreaty to the Captains themselves and chief commanders: M. Valerius on the right point, P. Decius on the left, both Consular men, put themselves forward, and rode out to the horsemen ranged in the wings, exhorted them to take part with them in honor, and charged a-crosse upon the sides and flanks of the enemies. Whiles this new terror upon the former, had on every side entered the battell of the enemies; and the Roman legions, to terrifie them the more, had redoubled a fresh shout, & charged them with great fury, then began the Samnites to flee again. Now were the fields overpread with the bodies of slain men, and strewd thick with armor, ere while so brave and glorious: and at the first, the Samnites in great affright recovered their tents; but being there, were not able so much as to keep them, for they were won and rifled before night, and fire upon them. The Dictator by a decree of the Senat triumphed: and the laid armor which was taken from the enemy, made the goodliest pageant of all other, in the pomp of triumph: which carried so lately a shew and magnificent, that the gilded shields were divided amongst the warders of the company of Bankers and Goldsmiths, to the beautifying of their Hall and Market place. And hereof began first the custome of the Ædiles, to adorn and let out the common place of the City in their solemn processions, when the sacred images of the gods and holy reliques were carried about for pomp in silver chariots. And the Romans verily for their part put this goodly trim armor of their enemies to this use, namely, to honor their gods withall. But the Campians upon a pride and inveterate hatred that they bare against the Samnites, used to arm their sword players and fencers at the sharp (which was a solemn fight and pastime they had at their great feasts) F with this same attire, and termed them in mockery, by the name of Samnites.

The same year Fabius the Consul fought with the rest of the Tuicans at Perusia (which City Perugia also had broken the covenant of truce) where neither doubtfully nor hardly he obtained victory. And the very town it self he had forced & won (for in the same train of his conquest he approached the walls) but that their Embassadors came forth and yielded the City. When he had placed a good garrison at Perusia and tent before him to Rome unto the Senat, the Embassadors of Etruria, who treated for peace; he being but Consul, made his triumphant entry into the City for a more magnificent victory, then the Dictator. And that for a good part of the honor of subduing the Samnites, was ascribed to the Lieutenants P. Decius, and M. Valerius, therefore at the next Election, the people with general assent declared the one Consul, and the other Pretour. Fabius for vanquishing Etruria so bravely and valiantly, continued Consul still, and had for his Colleague P. Decius Valerius was created Pretor the fourth time. The Consuls parted between them the provinces, Etruria fell to Decius, Samnium to Fabius. Who taking his voiage to Nucerina, laid siege to the City of the Allians, and won it by assault; and notwithstanding they made suit for peace, he rejected and despised them; for that when it was offered, they would not accept it. With the Samnites he fought a battell; but without any great conflict, the enemies were vanquished. Neither had the remembrance of that field been left in record, but that the Marston first took arms and warred with the Romans. After the Marston were revolted, the Pelignians did the fembable, and sped alio. Decius alio the other Consul had good success in his wars. He drove the Tarquinians for fear, to find the army corn, and to sue for a truce of forty years. Certain castles and holds of the Volscinians, he forcibly won: some of them heutterly raised, for that they should not be any receptacle or harbour for the enemies. And with warring round about every where, he became so terrible, that the whole Tuscan nation made sue to the Consul for peace and confederacy. It they could not obtain: but truce for a year was granted. In regard whereof, for that year they satisfied the whole pay for the army, and a double livery for every soldier was exacted and taken of them. This was the pension and fine that their truce cost them.

But now when all was quiet among the Tuscans, the sudden revolting of the Umbrians, a nation free, and saved hitherto from the calamities of war, but only, that the Roman army passing through their territories troubled all anew: for they having raised the strength and flower of their youth and solicited alio a great part of the Tuscans to rebel, levied so great a power that making no account of Decius, whom they left behind them in Heimria, they gave out proud words of themselves, and spake basely of the Romans, vaunting and boasting that they would march right forth to assault Rome. Which designe of theirs, so soon as it was reported to Decius the Cos, he made speed, and by long journeys departed out of Heimria toward the City, and in the County of the Papinians, encamped himself; lifting ever after the enemies, what they meant to do. Neither at Rome was the Umbrians war neglected and set light by: for their very threats and menaces scared them, as who already had seen by experience, by the foil they had at the Gauls hands, how unsure a City they inhabited and not unpreparable. Thereupon messengers were dispatched to the Col, Fabius, that he had any breathing time, and rest from the Samnits war, he should with al speed lead his army into Umbria. The Col, obeyed, and by great journeys went forward to Meruvia, where at that time the forces of the Umbrians lay. This sudden and unexpected coming of the Col, whom they thought very occupied in Samnium far enough off from Umbria, so terrified the Umbrians, that some gave advice to retire back to their walled towns, others to relinquish the war altogether. One Canton or tract of their country (which they themselves call Materia) not only kept the rest in arms, but also set them on to fight immediately, so as they charged upon Fabius, as he was trenching and fortifying. Whom when the Col, saw rushing upon his rampiers in such heaps, he called his men from their work, and as the ground & time would give leave, he marshalled them in order of battel: and after he had encouraged his soldiers with a true report & discourse of many glorious and honourable journeys achieved as well in Thufcia as also in Samnium, he willed them to dispatch this small residue of the Tuscan war, that hung by and remained behind, and to be revenged of that accursed and impious speech, whereby they threatened to assail the City of Rome. These words of his were heard by the soldiers with such alacrity and cheerefulness of heart, that before their Generall had made an end of his speech, they set up a shout of themselves and interrupted him: and thus before commandment and signal given by sound of trumpets and cornets, they ran amain upon the enemies, and charged them as if they had not been men, and thole also armed. For (a wonderful thing to be spoken) at the very first they began to pluck the banners and streamers out of the beastes hands, after that, the ensign-bearers themselves were led to the Consuls, and the soldiers armed as they were, transported out of one battalio into another, and where there was any scuffling, they fought not so much with sword, as buckler: and what with their bosses and iron pikes, and what with jussling, shouldering, and striking the enemies about the wime-pits, they were overthrowen and felled. In which skirmish, more men were taken then slain: and no other cry was heard throughout the field, but down with weapon, down with weapon. So that in the very conflict, the principal authors of the war rendered themselves: and the morrow after, and other daies following, the rest of the people of Umbria likewise yielded. The Ottraculans by lippulation only and pledges given, were received in amity. And Fabius having thus got the victory in that war, which fell to another mans lot and charge, led back his army again into his own province. And in regard of his prosperous and happy exploits, like as the people the year past continued his Consulship alio the Senat against the year following, when Ap. Claudius, and L. Volturnius were Col. Prorogues his martial rule still, maugre the heart of Appius, who was greatly against it. In some Chronicles I find, that Appius, whiles he was Consul, sued to be Consul, and that his Election was crossed and staid by L. Furius, a Tribune of Com. until he had resigned up the Consorship. Being created Cos, and the war with the Salentins (declared new enemies) allotted unto his Colleague, he remained at Rome: that by civil policy, and managing home-affairs, he might augment his own state and authority, since that the honour of war-service rested in the hands and conduct of another. Volturnius had no cause to repent of his charge and province: for many fortunate battels he fought, and some towns of the enemies by force he won. He was a bountiful giver of the spoil away unto his soldiers: and this bounty in it self alone acceptable, he helped much with great courttesie and gentleness, by which vertues and artificial means, he made the soldiers both venturous in perils and hardy in travel.

Q. Fabius on the other part, in quality of pro-Consul, gave battel to the Samnites near the City Alife, where the day was nothing doubtful. The enemies were difcomfited and beaten into their camp: neither had they been able to have kept the field, but that there was but a little

A le day left behind: and yet before night, they were beset round about in their hold; yes, and watched with good guards all night long, that none should make escape. The morrow morning ere it was well day light, they began to yield themselves, and to capitulate; that as many Samnites as there were among them, should be sent forth in their single garments, and they all went under the gallows. As for their confederats and allies, there was no such proviso nor composition made; but they all, to the number of seven thousand, were sold as slaves, and wore a garland. As many as adowned themselves to be Hernicks, were kept apart by themselves to be forth coming. All thole Fabius sent to Rome to the Senat, and until such time as enquiry was made, whether in a publick muster they were pressed soldiers or voluntarily served under the Samnits against the Romans, they were committed to be kept in ward among sundry nations of the Latins: during which time, the new Consuls, Publius Cornelius Arvins, and Quintus Marcius Tremulus (for thole were now created) had in charge to propose that matter anew unto the Senat. The Hernicks took that ill. Whereupon the Anagnins held a Diet or General Council in the round Cirque which they call Maritimus, of all the Cities of that Nation, except the Alatinians, Perentiniats, and the Verulans. Where the whole State of Hernicks proclaimed war against the people of Rome. In Samnium alio, for that Fabius was departed thence, there arose new troubles and rebellions, Calatia and Sora were forced, and the Roman garrisons therein laid, were put to the sword, and upon the bodies of as many as they took alive, they exercised much torture and cruelty: Whereupon Publius Cornelius the Consul was thither sent. And to Marcius were the new enemies appointed (for by this time decreed it was; That war should be made upon the Anagnins and the other Hernicks.) At the first the enemies had so felled all the convenient passes and waies between both the Consuls camps, that there could not readily passe a packeg or carrier between, in so much, as for certain daies both Consuls abode doubtfull how the world went, and uncertain one of the others state. The fear whereof, spread to Rome, so that the younger sort [from seventeen years of age to eleven and forty] were to lerve: and against all sudden occasions, and occurrents whatsoever, two fold and complicit armies were levied and enrolled. But the Hernick war was nothing correspondent either to the present menaces, or to the ancient glory and reputation of that nation: for having done no worthy adventure, and within few daies lost their camp thrice, they covenanted forth to have thirty daies truce: during which time, they might send Embassadors to the Senat of Rome: and in consideration hereof, they D promised to lay down two months pay, and to find corn for the army, and allow every soldier one cost. But from the Senat they were put off and referred to Marcius: unto whom by order from the Senat, a large commission was granted, to dispose of the Hernicks as he thought good: and so he took the whole nation as yielded to his devotion. The other Consul in Samnium being in forces more puissant then the enemy, was not without standing encumbered much with the difficulty of the ground. All the passages had the enemy stopped, and possessed himself of the forests and woods which were thorow faires, that no way victuals might be conveyed unto him. Neither could the Consul, for all that daily he displayed banner in field, train them forth to fight: so as it was well seen, that neither the Samnits could abide present battell, nor the Romans long delay of war. But the arrival of Marcius who upon the subduing of the Hernicks made halt to aid his E Colleague, caused the enemy to defer no longer the trial of the field. For, they, who thought themselves not good enough to match so much as the one army, knew full well that if they suffered two Consuls armies to join together, there had been no hope left. They therefore set upon Marcius as he marched without order of battel. Hereupon in al halt their truffles and fardels were brought together and laid in the middle; and as the time would permit, he set his soldiers in array. At the first encounter, the shout was hard into the camp of the other Consul. Afterwards the dust deflected afar off, gave an alarm, and made a trouble and tumult there. Then the Consul presently commanded to arm: and hastily bringing his soldiers forth into the field, entered upon the battell of the enemies in the flank, whiles they were busied in another skirmish. He cried aloud to his men, that it were exceeding great shame, to suffer the other army to carry away double victory, and not themselves win the honour of that war, which was their proper charge. F Thus, wherefore he charged, he brake in and made entrance, and having pierced and made a great lane through the midle of the enemies battel, he passed on towards their camp; which finding void of defendants, he took and set afire. Which when the soldiers of Marcius saw burning before their faces, and the enemy likewise, as they looked behind: then began the Samnits on all hands to die: but killed they were every where down right: all places full of murder and slaughter: so in no part could they find means to escape and save themselves. Now when there were thirty thousand of the enemies slain, the Consuls founded the retreat, and gathered both their armies together, with great congratulation one to the other: by which time, behold, there were defied a far off, certain new bands of enemies, enrolled for a supply: and they gave occasion G of a new and fresh slaughter. Against whom without commandment of Consul, or any signal received from their leaders, the Romans advanced lustily, crying aloud, that these Samnites were to be welcomed with an ill battell, and this their first training should cost them dear. The Consul left the legions alone in this their furious heat, as who knew well enough, that these new comers seeing the old beaten soldiers, so alighted already and flying away, would soon have enough of it, and not once adventure fight. And they were not deceived in their opinion: for the whole forces of the Samnits as well old and new, fled apace unto the next mountans: and thither the Romans

Romans also make as great speed. But no safe place could those vanquished enemies find for even from the very hill tops which they held, they were beaten down, so that with one voice they all craved peace. Then after the Consuls had imposed upon them corn for three months, and a years pay, and for every souldier a livery besides, they were permitted to send Embassadors to the Senat, and to treat and capitulat thereof. During which time, Cornelius was left in Sannium, and Martius returned into the City, with triumph over the Hernicks. Moreover a decree passed, that his statue riding on horseback should remain in the common place of assemblies, which was erected accordingly even before the Temple of Castor. To three States of the Hernicks, to wit, the Alatunians, the Verulans and Ferentinians, their own laws, and ancient liberties were restored again, because they made choice thereof, rather than to be enfranchised Citizens of Rome: and permitted they were to marry amongst the Romans, which liberty they only of the Hernicks for a good while enjoyed. The Anagnins, and those that had born arms against the Romans were incorporated free denizens of Rome, but without the privilege of giving voices and suffrages: debared they were of holding any Councils and making marriage; with them, yea, and denied at all to, elect any magistracy, but only the function and ministry of divine service and sacrifices.

The same year the Chappell of dame Salus was by C. Junius Bubulcus now Censor, let out at a priores to be built, which he in his Consulship had vowed, in the Sannits war. By his direction and appointment, together with his colleague M. Valerius Maximus, were the great high ways and cauleys made, of all sides of the City, through the fields, at the common charge and expence. The same year also, was the league renewed now the third time with the Carthaginians: and their Embassadors who came for that purpose, were courteously entertained, and rewarded liberally with rich gifts. In that year there was a Dictator P. Cornel. Scipio, with P. Decius General of the horse: and these were Presidents at the Election of Consuls, for to that purpose they were created, because neither of the two Consuls could be spared from the wars. Consuls were created L. Posthumius, and T. Minucius. But Piso sayth, that these Consuls immediately succeeded Q. Fabius and P. Decius: leaving out those two years, wherein he hath written that Claudius with Polemius, and Cornelius with Martius were Consuls. Whether he forgot himself in digesting his Annals and yearly records, or of set purpose overlit two couple of Consuls, thinking that they were not in truth Consuls, I wot not.

The same year the Sannits made rodes into the territories of Stella, within the liberties and appartenances of the Campains, and therefore both Consuls were sent into Sannium: who when they were parted into divers ways, for Posthumius took his journey to Tifernum, and Minucius to Bevianum: first there was battell fought at Tifernum, under the leading of Posthumius. Some make no doubt, but write, that the Sannits were discomfited, and put to the worfe, and thirty thousand of them taken prisoners: or say, that the conflict was equal, and that they departed on even hand: also that Posthumius making semblance of fear, journeyed by night, & closely retired unto the hills adjoining, & the enemies followed after them, two miles, and from thence encamped, and fortified also themselves in strong places of advantage. The Consul, because he would be thought to have fought and chose a safe place, and plentifully stored with all necessaries (as it was no lesse indeed) where he might keep a standing camp: after he had fortified the same, and furnished it with all kind of provision, leaving behind him a strong garrison for defence: at the relief of the third watch, leadeth the neerekt way, his legions not encumbered with carriage, to his colleague, who also himself lay in camp over against another army. There, by the perswasion & advice of Posthumius, Minucius gave battell: and when as the conflict continued doubtfull until it was far on the day, then Posthumius with his fresh legions, on a sudden charged the battallions of the enemies, now already overtoyed: but partly for weariness, and partly for wounds, they being disabled for to flee away, were out of all measure slain every one, and xxi. banners were taken: and so from thence they went forward to the camp of Posthumius. Where these two victorious armies finding the enemy discouraged and amazed at the tidings of this overthrow, set upon them, discomfited, and put them to flight: and wan from them xvi. ensignes: where the General of the Sannits Statius Cilius, with many a man besides, was taken prisoner, and both their camps won. Bevianum also, which the morrow after began to be assaulted, was shortly after forced: and finally with great glory of no noble acts achieved, both Consuls triumphed. Some write that the Consul Minucius, being grievously hurt, was brought back into the camp, and there dyed: and that M. Fulvius was substituted Consul in his room: and that it was he, who being sent unto the army of Minucius, wan Bevianum. The same year Sora, Arpinum, and Corfinia were recovered from the Sannits: and the great image of Hercules was in the Capitol set up and dedicated.

When as P. Sulpicius Aferrius, and P. Sempronius Sophus were Coll. the Sannits desiring either to see an end of war, or else to delay it, sent Embassadors to Rome pretending peace. To whom as they pleaded and intreated most humbly, this answer was given: That if the Sannits had not so often treated for peace, when they intended and prepared war they might after certain entertainments, and conferences passed between, obtain their witt: but since that evermore until that time, their words were but wind: now they would trust to their deeds, and nothing else. P. Sempronius the Consul, shall shortly be in Sannium with an army: who would not be abused, but soon see, whether their minds be inclined to war or peace: and as he found and saw every thing, so would he bring word and make relation: and therefore their Embassadors were to attend upon

Upon the Consul when he departed out of Sannium. The same year after that the Romans army had passed peaceably to and fro, and visited all Sannium, having victuals by the country courteously allowed, the ancient league was granted again to the Sannits. From thence turned the Romans their forces against the Equians, their old enemies: but for many years making semblance of quietness, where as indeed their peace was little to be trusted: for that the Hernick nation was safe and on foot, they with them, had used oftentimes under hand to send aid unto the Sannits; and also after the subduing of the Hernicks, the whole nation in a manner without dissembling, and averring all they did by publick councill and authority, had fallen away unto the enemy: and so that the Romans had made league with the Sannits, and their heralds came to make claim for their goods took from them by way of hostility, they said, it was but a tempting of them, to see, whether upon fear of war they would suffer themselves to become Romans. Which, say they, how greatly it were to be with'd, the Hernicks was able to teach them: for they, as many of them as had liberty to do what they would, chose rather to live under their own laws, then to be enfranchised citizens of Rome: but others, who had not the same scope to choose to their liking, they were constrained to accept of the Burgeoisie of their City, by way of punishment. Upon these speeches and arguments commonly toiled in their assemblies and Councils, the people of Rome decreed war against the Equians: to which both the Consuls went, and encamped four miles from their enemies camp. The Equians (who in their own behalf, and for any quarrell of theirs, had many years sat still and made no war) like as if their army had been levied of a sudden and in haste, without certain Captains appointed, and without any General to command, were afraid. Some thought good to go forth into the field, others to defend themselves, and keep within their camp: most of them were moved to think aforehand upon the waiving of their country afterwards, and consequently the destruction of their cities left but with slender garrisons. Therefore after that, amongst many opinions, this only had audience, namely, to abandon the care of publick weal and every man to regard his own privat state, and at the first watch to depart divers waies one from the other, and quit the camp, and convey away all their bag and baggage, and to defend their Cities within the wals: they all with one accord accepted thereof, and embraced it. Now when the enemies were thus scattered abroad about the country, the Romans by day-light, with banner displayed went forth into the field: and when they saw no man come abroad to meet them, they marched in watlike order space towards the enemies camp. But when they could perceive there neither warders before the gates, nor any man upon the trench & rampiers, nor so much as the usual noise of a leaguer, being moved with this unaccustomed silence, for fear of forelying and treachery, they stood still: but being got over the rampier, and finding the tents void and empty, they set forward to pursue the enemy by his trace. But when they found their foot-tracks, leading to all parts of the Country alike: as being flipt here and there, sundry and divers waies: at the first they wandered out of the way, and misled of them; but afterwards knowing by their epials the purpose and intent of their enemies, they went round about and besieged every City, and in three-score daies wan forty towns all by assault: most part whereof were razed even with the ground, and consumed into ashes, and the nation of the Equians utterly in a manner destroyed. Over the Equians there was triumph: Whose calamity and delolation was so fearfull an example, to the Marrucins, Maris, Pelignis, and Ferentins, that they sent Orators to Rome to treat for peace and amity: and to all those nations at their request, a league was granted. The same year, C. Flavius a Notary or Register by profession, whose father Cneus was no better than a slave made free, a man, thus descended of base and low parentage, howbeit otherwise crafty and eloquent withall, arose to be an Edile Curule. I find in some records, that when he gave attendance in his calling to the Ediles, and saw that his own Tribe were willing to give him their voices and elect him Edile, but his name not accepted of among other competitors, for that he got his living by his pen, he cast aside his books and papers, and swore an oath, that he would no longer be a Notary and use penmanship. But Macer Licinius avoucheth, that a good while before, that he gave over his writing, namely, after he had been Tribune, and born two Triumphs, the one for the night misrules, the other for the placing and transporting of a Colony. But they all agree upon this, that he became very stout, and in great contumacy opposed himself and made head against the Nobles that contemned his base birth. The civil law which before time was laid up in great secret by the Priests, and Prelats in their Arches, he published abroad: and set up a table in the great common place, in manner of a Calendar, wherein all men might know worke-daies from holy-daies: when it was lawful to plead, and when not. Also in delpite, and to the great heart-burning of the Patriis, he dedicated the temple of the goddess Concord upon the Court of Vulcan: and by the general consent of the people, Cornelius Barbanus the high Priest was compelled to endite and pronounce the certain form of words thereto belonging: notwithstanding he confessed and denied, that by the cultomes of their forefathers any could dedicate a Temple, unless he were either Consul or General of an army. And therefore by the authority of the Senat, a law was preferred to the people, That no man might dedicate a Temple or Altar, without permission and consent of the Consul, or the more part of the Tribuns of Commons. I will report in this place a thing, of itself not worthy of remembrance, but only for a proof and example of the liberty of the Commons against the pride and insolencie of the Nobles. This Flavius, coming upon a time to visit his Collegae lying sick, by a complot afore hand of certain young gentle gentleman of the Patricians that sat by his bed side, had no reverence done unto him, nor any one so much as rose up at entrance into the chamber: whereupon, he commanded his ivory chair of State to be brought unto him, and set him self upon it; and so he out faced his adversaries, that were so vexed to the heart with envy of his dignity. This Flavius was nominated & chosen Edile, by the base faction of the commons, banding together in the place of assemblies: who first took by heart the Censorship of Appius Claudius the first that ever detained and polluted the Senat, by bringing in the Sons of Libertins: and when he saw that no man accounted that Election of Senators good and lawful, and perceived withall, that in the Court he had not that backing of Citizens which he sought for: he intermingled in every Tribe certain of the most base persons of the Commons: and so he corrupted both the common place and Alms field alio. In so much as the Election of Flavius was reputed to unworthy an indignity, that moil of the gentlemen of Rome laid away their gold rings and rich trapping of their horses which were the ornaments and ensigns of their calling. And from the time forward the City was divided into two parts. One side was maintained and upheld by the true hearted people, such as favoured and loved good things: the other by the faction of ruffe-raffe and scum of the City: untill the time that Quintus Fabius and P. Decius were created Censors. Fabius to bring the City unto an uniform accord, and to withstand this inconvenience, that the Elections of Magistrates should not be carried away by the strong hand of the vilest and most abject persons, made a separation of all that base rabble, and cast them into four Tribes and called them * Fratria. Which action of his (men say) was accepted with so great contentment and thankfulness, that upon the good temperature of degrees, he purchased the surname of Maximus, which in so many victories he had not acquired and obtained. By him alio (by report) it was ordained and instituted, that on the Ides of July, the horsemen rode, as it were, in a solemn muster, and shewing their great horses to the Centor.

* Tribes of the City such as were born to no lands in the country: all the rest were named Rafric. CR.

The Tenth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the Tenth Book.

Two Colonies were planted in Sora and Alba. The marfians of Carfeola, were reduced under obedience. The fellowship of the Angurs was augmented to the number of nine, whereas before they were wont to be but four. The law or edict as touching the appealing to the people, was now the third time proposed by Valerius the Consul. Two Tribes more were added to the right Anienis and Terentina. War was denounced against the Samnites, and fortunately fought with them. What time as there was a battell given to the Tuscani, Umbrians, Samnites and Gauls, under the conduct of P. Decius, and Quintus Fabius, and the Roman army was in great extremity of danger, P. Decius following the example of his father, devoted and exposed himselfe to die voluntarily, for to save the host: and by his death obtained the victory of that journey, to his countenmen and fellow Citizens, Papirius Cursor put to flight an army of the Samnites, who were bound by a solemn oath not to depart out of the battell without victory, to the end, that with more magnanimity and resolution, they should enter into the field. The Censur was held, and the number taken of the Citizens, with the solemn purging and Lustration of the City. And offered there were 262322 souls.

The Tenth Book of T. Livius.

When L. Gentilius and Ser. Cornelius were Consuls, there was rest in a manner from all wars abroad; in such sort, as they had leisure to place certaine Colonies at Sora and Alba: And for Alba there were enrolled 5000 inhabitants, to assist the Aequians. As for Sora, it had sometimes belonged to the Volscians territory: but the Samnites usurped the possession of it, and thither four thousand were sent to inhabit. The same year, the Arpinates and Trebulans were enfranchised denizens at Rome. The Frustians were fined with the horse of one third part of their lands: for they were evidently detected to have solicited the Hernicks to rebellion: and after that the Consuls Commission from the Senat, had made due inquisition, the principal heads of that conspiracy, were scourged and beheaded, yet because there should not pass a year clean without war, a journey was made (such a one as it was) into Umbria; upon news, that there came to issue forth day by day, certain men in arms out of a cave, and to make rodes into the country about. Into this cave or peak, the Romans entred with their ensignes displayed: where by reason that it was a blind corner, they received many a wound, and specially by throwing of stones stones: untill such time as they found the other mouth of the cave (for it was a thorough-fare.) So they piled a deal of wood together at both ends, and set it on fire: with the smoke and vapour whereof, there were about 2000 armed men driven out of their hole, who rushing at last into the flame, desirous to escape, were smothered and burnt to ashes.

When as M. Lucius Dentor, and C. Aemilius, were Consuls, the Aequians began to war again: for they hardly could abide and endure, that a Colony should be planted upon their borders, as they frontier-fortresses to bridle them, and assailed by all kind of force to win the same: but they were little repelled by the Inhabitants only within the town. Howbeit, such a fear they made at Rome, because it was not thought credible, that the Aequians alone of themselves, so distressed as they were, would be so hardy as to take arms, that in regard of that trouble, a Dictator was named, to wit, C. Junius Bubulcus, with T. Titinius General of the horse. Who at the first conflict subdued the Aequians, and upon the eighth day of his government returned into the City in triumph: and now the Dictator, dedicated the Temple of Salus, which he had vowed being Consul, and had put out workmen for to be builded, while he was Centor.

The same year a fleet of Greeks, under the conduct of Cleonymus a Lacedaemonian, arrived upon the coast of Italy, and won Thuriae, a City of the Salentines. Against this enemy was the Consul Aemilius sent, who in one battell discomfited him, and drove him aboard. Thus Thuriae was rendred again to the former Inhabitants, and the Salentine Country obtained peace and quietness. I find in some Records, that it was Jun. Bubulcus the Dictator who was sent to the Salentines: and that Cleonymus before he was to encounter with the Romans, departed out of Italy. From thence he fetched a compass, and doubled the point of Brundisium, and sailed with a fore-wind through the midle of Venice gulph: for that on the left hand the Havenis and harbourless coasts of Italy, and on the right, the Illyrians, Liburnians, and Illyrians, fierce nations, and for the most part, reputed infamous, for roving and robbing by the sea-side, put him in exceeding fear. So he arrived at length upon the river of Venice, lying far within the shore, and there he landed a few to discover the Coasts: but hearing that the strand that lay out against them was not broad and spacious, and when they were past over it, there were behind them the plaines (as it were) overflowed with the sea-tides, and that not far off might be seen the champion fields near hand, and his beyond; and discovering by this means the mouth of a very deep river, into which he saw, that the ships might be brought about as into a sure harbour (now that rivers name was Meduacus) thither he commanded, that the Armada should put in, and to make fall up against the stream. The heaviest vessels, the chanel of the river would not bear: but the soldiers were transported in lighter barks and small pinaces, and so fell at length with the levell and the plain Country, frequented with much people, by reason that three sea-towns of the Patavins, inhabited that Territory. Being once landed, and having left a slender guard for their ships, they take Towns by assault, burnt houses, plunder and drive away prizes both of men and cattell: and when they had once tasted of the sweetness of booty and pillage, they went far from their ships. The alarm hereof was given at Patavium (now the Patavins were always in arms, because of the Gauls their borderers.) Whereupon they divided their fighting youth into two regiments: the one was led into those quarters whereas the report went, that the Greeks foraged here and there abroad: to the other, because they would not meet with the robbers and rovers, was conducted another way to the harbour, where the ships rid (about fourteen miles from the Town). And after they had slain the warders, they charged upon the small barks. Whereupon the mariners were afraid, and were forced to retire their vessels to the other bank-side. Likewise upon the main they sped as well in fight against the stragling rovers: for when as the Greeks fled back to recover the harbour, the Venetians encountered them afront, and made head against them. So the enemies were environed in the midle, and most of them slain: some that were taken prisoners, bewrayed what their fleet was, and that King Cleonymus was three miles off. There, when they had bestowed the prisoners sure enough in ward within the next village; some man with soldiers for their river-vessels, made fifty and framed with flat bottoms, for to pass over the meers and shallow walshes; others embark armed men in the small gallions taken from the enemies; and made way apace to give an assault upon the main fleet, and beset those ships which rid at anchor, and I durst not weigh and remove, fearing not the enemy, so much as the unknown coasts. Thence, I say, they environed, and charged upon them: and when they made halfe to gain the deep and open sea, without any resistance at all, they were pursued and chased unto the mouth of the river. Thus when they had taken the enemies ships, and fired others, namely, such as for fear and halfe were driven upon the shelves, and run a ground, then they returned with victory. Cleonymus hardly saved the fifth part of his fleet. And thus having had no good luck in attempting to land in any of the Adriatick sea, he departed. The stems of the ships, with their beak-heads, and brazen pikes, together with the spoils of the Lacedaemonians, were set up in the old Temple of Juno, and there be many at this day alive, which have seen them. The memoriall of this sea-fight, is celebrated yearly (upon the very same day that it was fought) at Patavium, with a solemn skirmish and combat of ships represented upon the river, within the midle of the City.

The same year was a League made at Rome with the Vellins, who came to sue for peace and amity. But from that time, there arose many and divers fearful occurrences. For news came, that that Hetruria rebelled, which troubles took their beginning by occasion of the civil dissention and discord of the Aretins: who began to expell by force of arms the house and family of the Lucinii (mighty and puissant above the rest) for very envy and repine of their wealth and riches. Over and besides, the Marfians stood out, and by arms maintained their title to that part of their territory, into which there had been a Colony of Carcoleans brought, to the number of four thousand men, enrolled there to inhabit. Against which stir and tumults, Marcus Valerius Maximus was created Dictator, who made choice of M. Emilius Paulus to be the Commander of the Horse. Which I rather believe to be true, than that Q. Fabius, a man of those years and that worth, after so many honourable dignities, should be under Valerius. But I would not deny, that the error might grow by reason of the surname of Maximus. The Dictator having taken the field with his Army, in one battell discomfited the Marfians: and after he had driven them into their walled and fenced Towns, Milontians, Plesina, and Preftina: within few daies, he won them all over their heads: and having fined the Marfians with the loss of some part of their Territory, he received them into their ancient League again. Then all the forces were employed against the Tuscans: and whiles the Dictator was departed to Rome to take his Auspices anew, the General of Horse, being gone out a foraging, was by a secret ambush entrapped. And having lost certain ensignes, he was forced into the Camp, after a foul slaughter and shameful flight of his men. Which fearfull cowardice is not like to have been in Fabius, not only, because if ever he deserved his surname of Maximus by any commendable parts; it was especially for his prowess in war: but also, for that in remembrance of Papirius his cruelty toward him, he never could have been brought to fight, without the commandment or permission of the Dictator. This discomfiture and loss being reported at Rome, caused a greater terror than there was cause. For no less than if the Army had been utterly defeated, there was published and proclaimed a stay and cessation of all law-matters, wardens bestowed at the gates, order taken for standing watches in every street, and armour and darts carried up to the walls. And after that all the younger sort were sworn and prest to serve the Dictator was sent again to the Army. Where, he found all more quiet than he looked for, through the careful diligence of the General of Horse. The Camp was removed to a place of more strength and safety, the bands and companies which had lost their ensignes, left on the bare earth without the rampiers, destitute of tents and covert: and the army eager and desirous of fight, to do away and raise out the former ignominy and shame. Presently therefore, he raised his Camp, and removed forward into the country of Rasella. Thither followed the enemies all hard at heels: Who albeit, upon their late good speed, they were in right great hope and assistance, to be strong enough even in open fight and plain field; yet they assailed the enemy also by the same sleights and trains which they had already fortunately tried. There returned to be in the country thereabout, not far from the Romans Camp, certain houses half pulled down and ruinate, belonging to a village which was burned when the country was over-run: where, after they had bestowed closely certain men in arms, they drove their beasts and cattel in the very fight of the Roman corps de guard, commanded by C. Fulvius, a Lieutenant: at which bait, when as there stirred no man from the Roman wards, one of the Heardmen advanced even unto the very trench and fortifications of the Romans, and called aloud to the rest (that seemed for fear to drive but slowly from the ruins of the village aforesaid) asking why they staid behind, seeing they might safely march, and pass forward still (as it were) through the middle of the Roman Camp? These words certain Carists interpreted to the Lieutenant Fulvius. Whereat, every band or company of soldiers took great indignation, but durst not stir a foot without a warrant. Then he commanded those that were skillfull in the tongue to mark whether their language sounded nearer to the speech of peasants or to Citizens: Who brought word, that both their voice, and also the habit and fresh hue of their bodies, was more elegant and civil than for country shepherds. Go your waies then (quoth he) unto them and bid them beware and discover their ambush, which in vain they seem to hide: for that the Romans were cunning in all things, and advertised of their designs, and could no more now be overtaken with wiles, than overcome by arms. When these words were once heard and carried to those that lay in wait, presently they start up out of their lurking holes, and brought forth their ensignes all abroad into the open field. The lieutenant supposing they were a greater troop than might be dealt withal and matched by his corps de guard, with all speed sent for aid to the Dictator: and in the mean while himself received and bare off the brunt and forcible charge of his enemies. This message was no sooner brought, but the Dictator commanded the standards to be advanced, and the soldiers to arm and follow: but every thing was done sooner almost than it could be commanded: forthwith they caught up the ensignes, and took weapon in hand: and scarcely could they be held in, but that they would run again. For not only the spitefull anger of the late received loss pricked them on, but also the frowns of their fellows, which they might hear more loud, and to be redoubled thicker according as the skirmish grew hotter and hotter. The greater haste therefore they made, whiles one putteth forward another, and is rich to the port-ensignes to go faster and mend their pace. But the more haste the Dictator seeth them to make, the more earnest was he to keep them back in their march, and to hold them in: willing them to go fair and softly. Contrariwise the Tuscans, who rose up at the beginning of the battell, were there ready with their whole forces to give the charge. Whereupon there came messenger after messenger to the Dictator, bringing word that all the

A legions of the Tuscans were entred into the fight, and that his men already were not able to resist any longer. Nay himself also, from the higher ground, might see in what danger the corps de guard was. But presuming and resting upon this conceit, that the Lieutenant was able yet to maintain fight, considering that he was not far off himself to help and save him out of peril: he was delirious that the enemies might be wearied and tired almost as was possible, and that his own forces fresh and in heart, should set upon them overtoiled. And albeit they went softly forward, yet by this time had the Horsemen but a very small ground to take their run with full career. Forsooth marched the ensignes of his legions, that the enemy should not fear any covert and privy stratagem, but leave good spaces and distances between the files of their footmen, through which the Horse might have room and liberty enough to gallop with ease. Then all the battalion of the Infantry set up a cry and shout when they charged, and withal, the Cavalry, with reins at large entred within the ranks of the enemies, who being not marshalled and set in order against such a blustering storm of Horsemen, were with a sudden fear astonished. Whereupon, the troop of Fulvius who crewhile was in manner environed and compassed about, and had help and rescue almost too late, now all in general breathed themselves at ease, and were put to nothing. For these that came fresh and lusty undertook the whole weight of the conflict: which was neither long nor doubtful. The enemies were put to flight, and in dilaray made halt to recover their camp. And when as the Romans advanced against them with banner displayed, they quit their place and retreated, gathering themselves round into heaps in the farthest part of the camp: and as they could have fled out, they stuck fast in the narrow gaps and passages of the gates: a great part of them leapt upon the bank, to climb the rampier, if haply either from the higher ground they might defend themselves, or get over any where and escape. By chance in one place where the bank was not well rammed, the rampier was surcharged with the weight of so many standing upon it, and so tumbled down into the trench. Whereupon, they set up a cry all together, That the Gods had made them way to escape, and by that means indeed they saved themselves, but more of them unarmed than armed. In this battell, were the forces of the Tuscans once again utterly abated: in so much as, after they had capitulated and promised a years pay, and corn for two months, the Dictator permitted them to send Embassadors to Rome for a treaty of peace. Peace was denied, but truce for two years granted: and the Dictator with triumph returned into the City. I find in some writers: that Hetruria was by the Dictator quiered, without any notable battell, only by composing the variance and debate of the Aretins, and reconciling the family of the Lucinii with the Commons.

M. Valerius upon his Dictatorship became Consul. Some have believed that he was created without his own suit, yea, and while he was absent, and that the said Election was held by the Interregent. But howsoever it was, out of all question, he bare the Consulship with Apuleius Paulus. Whiles M. Valerius and Q. Apuleius were Consuls, all was well quieted abroad: for the Tuscans of one side, partly upon their ill success in war and partly by reason of their truce, were forced to be still and in repose. The Samnites also on the other side, being well tamed with the overthrows so many years together, repented not yet and were not weary of their new league. At Rome likewise the Commons were quiet, and found themselves much eased, and discharged of a great number of base and poor people, which were withdrawn and sent away into Colonies. But because their rest should not be every where entire and perfect, there arose a quarrel between the chief and principal men of the City, as well the Nobles as Commons, and that by the suggestion and instigation of Q. and Cn. Ogulnius, Tribunes of the Com. Who having sought occasion and matter every way to accuse and blame the Nobility unto the Commons, when they saw all means assayed in vain, at length entred into an action, whereby they kindled and set on fire not only the meanest, but even the chief heads of the Commons, such as had been Consuls, and triumphed: who wanted no promotions and honors, but only Sacerdotal dignities and Prelacies, which as yet were not indifferently common to both States. They propoied therefore a Law, That whereas at that time there were but 4. Augurs, and as many Prelates or Bishops, and forasmuch as they thought it good, that the number of Priests should be increased, there might be choisen to the rest, 4. Bishops, and 5. Augurs, all out of the body of the Commons. But how this Colledge or Fellowship of Augurs, was reduced to the number of four, but by the death of two, I can not find: since this is certain, that among the Augurs the number must be odd: namely that the three ancient tribes, Rhamneses, Tities, and Luceres, should have each one their Augur: or if they needed more, they should with equal number increase those Priests: like as they were augmented and multiplied, when as fire being put to four, made up the number of nine: that is to say, for every tribe three. Howbeit, because they were choisen out of the Commons who should supply, and make up the number: the Nobles took it as grievously to the heart, as when they saw the Consulship parted equally in Common: but they made semblance as though this indignity pertained to the Gods more than to them: who would themselves see, that their holy service and sacred mysteries should not be polluted. And as for them, this only they could do, namely, pray and wish, that no calamity thereby should light upon the common-weal. But less earnest were they in opposing themselves and making resistance: for that they were used already in all such broils and contentions to have the worst and they saw besides, that their adversaries shot not at that (which in time past they could scarce hope for) namely, the greatest honours and dignities: but that they had already obtained all, for which they had stived so long in so doubtful terms of hope, to wit, manifold Consuls, and

Censorships, and Triumphs. Howbeit, the contention and dispute in debating and arguing to and fro the law propoſed, was maintained (as men ſay) between Ap. Claudius eſpecially, and P. Decius Mus: and after they had contended and diſcourſed in their Orations pro & contra, the ſame reasons in manner, touching the rights and liberties pretended by the Nobles and Commons, which ſometimes had been alleged, both for, and againſt the law Licinia, at what times as it was ſet on foot for the Commons to be Conſuls: Decius (as it is ſaid) repreſented in open audience, the very reſemblance and ſhew of his father, in ſuch manner, as many of them who were then preſent at the aſſembly, had ſeen him: to wit, girded and apparelled in Gabiner robe, ſtanding over his javelin, in which geſture, habit, and ſaiſhon, he offered himſelf to voluntary death, for to ſave the people and legions of the Romans: "Seemed (quoſe he) P. Decius, that I then was Coſ., as pure and religious in the fight of the immortal Gods, as if T. Manlius his colleague had been likewiſe devoted and offered? and might not the ſame P. Decius have rightly been choſen, to execute the publick divine ſervice and ſacrifices of the people of Rome? or is this all the fear and doubt, that the Gods would give leiſe ear to his prayers, than to Ap. Claudius? or doth Ap. Claudius with more devotion ſerve God privately, and worſhip the Gods more religiously, than himſelf? Who was there ever that repented or miſliked of the vows, which lo many Conſuls and Dictators of the Com., either at their fiſt ſetting forth to their armies, or in time of war and battel, pronounced for the Common-wealth? Reckon and count the chief Captains, year by year, ſince the fiſt time that the Commons began to have the leading and conduct of the wars: number all the triumphs ever ſince: it will appear that the Commons are "no whit abaſhed, and have no cauſe to complain of their own nobility. And this I know for certain, that if any new ſudden war ſhould ariſe, the Senat and people of Rome would reſolve "no more hope and confidence in the ancient Patritii, than in the Com. for to bethe Captains and Commanders. This being ſo, quoſe he, what God or man can think it an indignity, to adorn thoſe perſons alſo with the titles and ornaments of Biſhops and Angurs, whom ye have honoured with chair of Ivory, with the long robe bordered with purple, with the coat of arms embroidered and branched with the palm tree, with the gown or mantle of purple wrought with divers colours, with the chaplets and coronets of triumph, and with the victorious branch and garland of laurel; whole houſes ye have beautified above the reſt, with ſetting up the ſpoils of enemies? Or who can think much, if he be ſeen with a ſacring cup, or holy-water pot, and with a croſſier ſtaff, and his head veiled, either to kill a ſacrifice, or to take Augury by flight of birds from the caſtle hill: who hath been adorned and decked with the enſigns and ornaments of the "great God Jupiter, and hath ridden in a gilded chariot through the City into the Capitol? Or in whole Title, inſcription and ſtile over his image, men ſhall with content read Conſulſhip, Censorſhip and Triumph: will not the ſame abide to ſee and read, that ye have added therunto either Augurſhip, or Pontifical dignity? I verily for my part hope (without the diſpleaſure, and with reverence of the Gods be it ſpoken) that we by the beneficence of the people of Rome are ſuch, as for our quality and worthineſs, may and will yield no leiſe credit and honor to our "Priest-hoods than we ſhall receive thereby: and who deſire, in regard of the honor and ſervice of God, more than for our own ſakes and proper intereſt, to have the means, That whom we ſerve and reverence in private, thoſe we may alſo worſhip and honor publickly. But why have I hitherto pleaded the cauſe, as if the Patritii were entirely alone intitled and inveſted in the prerogative of Sacerdotal Dignities; and as though we were not already poſſeſſed of one right honorable and principal Priest-hood? We ſee that the Decemvirs for celebration of ſacrifices, and for interpretation of Sibylla her Prophecies, and other the fatal declines of this people, the Prelats alſo and Miniſters of Apollis his ſacrifice, and other Holy Ceremonies, are of the Commons. Neither was there any injury done unto the Patritii at that time, when for to gratify the Commons, the number of the Duumvirs was increaſed: thoſe I mean, who ſhould overſee (as ſuperintendents) the offering of ſacrifices. And now at this preſent they have no greater cauſe to complain, if the Tribuns, a ſtout and brave man, hath added five places more of Angurs, and ſo in of Biſhops, unto which commoners may be nominated: not to diſpoſſeſs you of your rooms, or to diſplace you, O Appius; but that men of the commons might aſſiſt you in the function and miniſtry of divine ſervice and Church matters: like as they do their part and perform good ſervice in human and civil affairs. And be not abaſhed, O Appius, to have him for your colleague in the Priest-hood, whom you might beſeem to have in Conſular or Censorſhip, your companion and fellow: unto whom being Dictator you might be Collonel of Horſe; as well as he to you in your Dictatorſhip. Thoſe ancient Nobles in old time (our progenitors) admitted into their number and order a Sabine ſtranger, the very head and top of your nobility, one Ap. Claudius, or Ap. Claudius (choſe you whether.) You muſt not think much then, to accept us into the number of Priests. We bring with us many honorable titles, even all the ſame that make you ſo proud, and "to hear your head aloft. L. Sextus was the fiſt Commoner, created Conſul; and C. Licinius Stolo the fiſt Collonel of Horſe. C. Rutilius was the fiſt Dictator and Censor, and Q. Publilius Philo the fiſt Prator. We have heard this long evermore founding in our ears, That to you alone pertained the taking of Anſipica: that you only are of noble deſcent and gentility: that ye are none "but ye, by right and duty ought to manage the affairs, and the foreign government, both at home and abroad: and yet always hitherto the commons in their places and charges, have done "and ſped as well as the Patritii, and henceforth ever ſhall (I doubt not.) What? heard ye never it ſpoken, that the Patritii were at fiſt made and created, and not defended from Heaven: but ſuch as were able to name their father and grandſire: that is to ſay, even free men juſt, and "no more? What? I my ſelf can nominate already mine own father to have been a Conſul, and ſhortly ſhall my ſon be able to alledge his grandſire. There is nothing elſe, O Q. Publilius, in the matter whereupon we ſtand, but that we may obtain al which hath been denied us. For the Nobles deſire only to maintain a ſide and to contend, and care not greatly what iſſue their contentions come unto. As for me, I do adviſe, and this would I have, That (to the good profit, and happy eſtate of you all, and the well publick) this law may paſs under your affirmative "voce [Urro. Aſſis.] Then preſently the people commended the Tribes to be called to a ſ. ruti- B. ny: and ſoon it appeared, that the law without all doubt be accepted: but that day was loſt, by the oppoſition and negative of ſome Tribuns. Howbeit, the morrow after they were a- fraid to croſs it: and then with ex. ceding content of all hands it paſſed clear. So there were created Prelats or Biſhops; fiſt, P. Decius Mus himſelf (that lo pleaded for the law) with P. Sempronius Sophus, C. Martius Rutilius, and M. Lucius Dentus. Likewiſe, five Angurs of the Commons, to wit, C. Cenninius, P. Aelius Pater, M. Minutius Eſſus, C. Martius, and T. Publilius. So there were eight Prelats in number, and nine Angurs.

The ſame year, M. Valerius the Conſul, procured the law of appealing to the people, more ſurely to be eſtabliſhed and confirmed. This was now the third time after the depoiſition of the Kings, that this one Act was revived; and alwayes by the ſame houſe or family of the Valerii. The cauſe of renewing the ſame lo often, was no other I ſuppoſe, than this: for that the mightineſs of ſome few great men of the Patritii, was more powerful than the liberty and freedom of the Commons. Only the Law Portia, ſeemeth to have been enacted for to ſave the back and ſides of Citizens from whipping, becauſe that it awarded and ſet a grievous puniſhment upon him, that either had beaten or killed a Citizen of Rome. The Law Valeria, which forbade, to ſcourge or behead any man whoſoever, that made his appeal had this annexed alſo, that if any one had trespaſſed and proceeded farther, it ſhould be decreed, Leandly and unſightly done. Such was the modeſty and reverence of men in thoſe dayes, that this one addition [in my conceit verily] was ſuppoſed to be a ſufficient bond to ſtrengthen the Law. But now adayes, would a man ſcarcely threaten his ſervant or ſlave in that manner.

D. The ſame Conſul made war, without any worthy or memorable exploit, againſt the Aequians that rebelled: who (ſetting aſide their ſtout and proud ſtomacks) had nothing left of their ancient fortune and eſtate. The other Coſs. Appuleius, beſieged the Town Nequinum in Umbria. The place was difficult and hard to get up, and on the one ſide ſteep down right (whereas now Handech Narnia) ſo that it was impregnable either by aſſault, or countermarches and ſconces whatſoever. Whereupon, the new Conſuls, M. Fulvius Petrus, and T. Manlius Torquatus, entred upon this enterpriſe, left undone and un finiſhed by the former. Now when all the Centuries nominated with one voyce Q. Fabius for the Conſulſhip of that year, even without his own ſuit and ſeeking; Macer Licinius and Tiberio do write, that he himſelf laboured to have that charge put off, and relieved unto a year of more war: alledging, that for the preſent he would ſerve the Common-wealth in better ſtead, by bearing ſome civil office in the City: and ſo neither diſſembling what he rather deſired, nor yet ſeeking for it, he was made Ædile of the Chair, with L. P. papirius Cuſus. But, to ſet this down for a certain truth I dare not; becauſe that Piſo, a more ancient Writer of Chronicles, ſaith, that the Ædiles Cnule of that year, were C. Domitius, Cn. F. Calpurnius, Sp. Carvilius, and Q. Fabius Maximus. That ſurname, I ſuppoſe verily, gave occaſion of the error in the Ædiles. Whereupon enſued a tale (ſortring to that error) mixed and compounded of the Elections of Ædiles and Conſuls together. The ſame year was held a ſolemn ſurvey and purging of the City by ſacrifice, called Luſtrum, by P. Sempronius Sophus, and P. Sulpitius Aferrius, and two Tribes more were added to the reſt, Anienſis, and Tarentina. And thus much concerning the affairs at Rome.

F. But now to return to Nequinum: after much time ſpent in long and lingering ſiege before the Town two of the inhabitants, whoſe houſes joyned cloſe to the wall undermined the ground, and by a ſecret way came as far as the corpi de guard of the Romans. From whence they were brought before the Conſul, and promiſed him to let in and receive what garriſon and troop of armed men he would, within the City. This offer was thought neither to be neglected and reſuſed, nor yet raſhly to be credited. So with the one of theſe twain (for the other was kept behind as an hoſtage) two other ſpies were ſent by the ſame mine to diſcover the train. By whole relation, when it appeared ſufficiently, that all was ſafe and without danger: by the leading and guiding of the traitor aforeſaid, 300 armed men by night entred the City, & ſeized that gate which was next unto them: at which being broken open, the Conſul and the Roman army without reſiſtance, made entry and ſurpriſed the City. In this fort Nequinum was reduced to the obedience of the people of Rome. A Colony was thither ſent to Frontier againſt the Umbrians, called of the * Rivers name [which runneth under it] * Narnia. And the army with a rich prize was brought again to Rome.

The ſame year the Tuſcans, contrary to the tenure of the truce, made preparation for war. But while they were buſily occupied otherwiſe, it fortune, that a puſſant army of Gauls invaded their marches, and for a while altered their deſignments. Afterwards, by the means of money, whereof they were full and bare themſelves mighty, they fought to make the Gauls, or enemies to become their friends, and ſollicited them to band together, and ſo jointly to maintain war with the Romans. Their society and friendship the barbarous people refused not; only, they stood upon the sum what they should have for their hire. Which being agreed upon and received, and all things else in a readiness for to go into the field; when the Tullians willed them to follow after, they flatly denied, that they had received any consideration for to make war upon the Romans: but whatsoever they had taken, it was because they should not wait the Tullian Land, and by way of hostility and force of arms, do any violence upon the inhabitants: howbeit, if the Tullians were so minded to employ them, they would be willing to serve; but for no other reward and recompence, than to be admitted into part of their territory; that at the length they might have some certain place of abode, to settle themselves in. Many Diets and consultations hereabout were held by the States of Tullian, but nothing resolved and concluded: not so much for that they feared to part with some of their Lands, as because they were in great dread every one and abhorred, to have dwelling by them such neighbours, descended from so savage a race and cruel Nation. Thus were the Gauls let go and dismissed, having away with them a huge mass of money, which they got without any travel or peril of theirs.

The bruit of the Gauls tumult and insurrection, together with the Tullians war, caused no little fear at Rome. Whereupon, more halt was made to conclude a league with the * Picenes people. T. Manlius the Consul had the charge of the Tullian war allotted unto him. Who scarcely was entered into the confines of the enemies, but as he was training and exercising amongst the Horcemen he ran his horse with full career, and suddenly as he turned about, was cast off, and presently lay for dead: and so the Consul, three days after his fall, ended his life. Which the Tullians taking hold of, as a good ominous token and preface, got heart and were very jolly; saying, that the Gods had in favour of them, begun this war. This was heavy news at Rome, both for the loss of so brave a personage, and for the time, wherein so unhappily it fell out: so as, the assembly held (by the advice of the chief Peers) for to substitute a Consul in his place that was deceased, frightened the Senators from choosing a Dictator. All their sentences, and all the centuries gave with M. Valerius to be Consul: who was the man, whom the Senat was about to have picked for Dictator. Then forthwith, they ordained him to go into Tullany to the army. Whose coming unprefixed and kept under the Tullians: so as not a man durst once go out of their trenches and hold. Even their very fear was as good as a siege unto them: for that the new Consul neither by wasting the fields, nor firing their houses in such sort, as every where, not only the small villages, but also the good and well-peopled Towns were seen to smoke and burn again, could draw them forth to fight.

This war continued longer than men thought: but behold, there arose a bruit of another; (which, considering the mutual losses of both sides, was for good causes greatly to be feared) upon intelligence given from the Picenes their new allies, namely, that the Samnites were about to take arms and rebel, and had solicited them also to do the same. The Picenes were highly thanked for this, and a great part of the Senators care was diverted now from Tullany to the Samnites. The death besides of corn and victuals troubled the City: and driven they had been to extremest famine, if Fabius Maximus (as they have written, who are of opinion that he was Ædile that year) by provident purveying and diligent conveying of corn, had not been as careful and industrious, in the dispensing of victual now at home, as many times before in war affairs. The same year there was an Interregnum, but upon what occasion, it is not known. The Interregents were App. Claudius, and after him P. Sulpicius, who held an Election of Consuls, and created L. Cornelius Scipio, and Cn. Fulvius.

In the beginning of this year, there came Orators from the Lucans to these new Consuls, for to make complaint, That the Samnites, who by no conditions and means could induce them for to band and take arms with them, were entered into their confines, and made wast of the country, and by very force provoked them to war, saying, That the Lucans had long ago over-shot and passed themselves that way: but now they were so fully resolute, that they could find in their hearts, sooner to abide and endure all kind of calamity whatsoever, than ever after to offend and displease the Roman name. They brought the Senat therefore, to receive the Lucans into their protection, and al o to keep and defend them from the violence and injury of the Samnites. And for themselves, albeit entering into war already with the Samnites, they were of necessity obliged to befall and true unto the Romans: yet for better security they were ready to put in sufficient hostages. The Senat was not long consulting hereabout: but all with one consent were of opinion, to make league with the Lucans, and to summon the Samnites to make amends and restitution. The Lucans, besides a courteous and gracious answer, were accepted into the league. Then were there Fæcial Heralds dispatched to the Samnites, to give them warning for to depart the territory of the Roman allies, and to withdraw their forces out of the confines of the Lucans. But the Samnites sent out certain messengers to meet them upon the way, and to denounce unto them, that if they presented themselves in any Council within Sannium, they should not depart again with safeguard of their persons. When these news were heard at Rome, both the Senat advised, and the people allowed, to make war upon the Samnites. The Consuls parted their Provinces and charges between themselves. To Scipio fell Hetruria, and the Samnites to Fulvius: and so they take their journey divers ways, each one to the war allotted unto him. Scipio looked for no other, but a lingering war at the enemies hands, and like to the defensive service of the former year: but behold, they with an army well appointed and

A arranged, encountered him and gave him battle near to * Volaterra; where they fought the better part of the day, with much bloodshed on both sides: and whiles they were doubtful which way the victory went; the night came between. But the morning after bewrayed both who were winners, and who were losers. For the Tullians in the still and dead time of the night dislodged. The Roman Consul coming forth into the field, and seeing by the enemies departure, the victory confessed: went forward to the camp: which he found empty of men but full of rich pillage, (for they had fearfully and in great haste abandoned their tents) and was matter thereof. From thence he retired his forces into the territory of the Faliscans: and after he had left at Faleris all his bag and baggage with a meetly garrison there: lightly appointed, he marched forward, and with a B running camp, wasted the marches and territories of his enemies. He put all to fire and sword: I drove away booties from all parts: and left not the ground only, wast and desart, but set fire also upon Cities and borough Towns. Only he forbore to assault the great and strong Cities, into which fear had driven the Tullians for refuge. Cn. Fulvius the Consul on the other part fought a noble battle in Sabinum near * Bovianum, and the victory was no whit doubtful. After which he assailed Boianum, and not long after Aspidena: and both Cities he won by force. The same year there was a Colony brought to * Caraclo within the territory of the Æquiculi. And Fulvius the Consul triumphed over the Samnites. * Volterra, * Boiano, * Arceolo,

When as now the time of the Consuls Election drew near; there was a rumour raised, that the Tullians and Samnites were lying and enrolling of great and mighty forces: that, openly in all their C assemblies and Diets, the Princes of the Tullians were checked and reproved, for that they had not waged the Gauls to war: whatsoever it had cost them: that the Magistrates of the Samnites were blamed, for exposing that army as it were a prey unto the Romans, which had been provided against their enemies the Tullians. For now seeing that the enemies both with their own power, and also with the help of their allies, were come to war: they should not be able to match them, having their forces thus redoubled. Now albeit there were other famous and renowned persons flood to be Consuls, yet this new fear and affright turned all men to be come favourites of Q. Fabius Maximus: who at the first made no suit, and afterwards, seeing the inclination of their affections, refused also to be Consul. Demanding what they meant to trouble and molest him, so aged a man as he was, and one, who as he had gone through all labours and travels of this D world: so he had passed also the rewards, and recompences of his travels: alledging, that neither strength of body, nor vigor of spirit could always continue the same, and last for ever: and besides, he feared fortune her self, lest haply he might be thought of any of the Gods too propitious and favorable unto him, and more permanent than the ordinary train and course of this world would permit. Therefore, like as himself had grown up after the glory of his elders, and succeeded them, so he saw and beheld with joy of heart, others also rising up after him, and to succeed him in the like glory: and as there wanted not at Rome high promotions and advancements for hardy and valiant men, so there failed not brave men of worth for to receive those honors and dignities. But by this refusal of his to molest so just and reasonable he whetted and kindled more and more their earnest affections and favours towards him, which he thinking to E dull and quench, with the reverent regard and awe of the laws, commanded a statute to be read, wherein it was not lawful for one and the same man within ten years to be created Consul twice. But scarcely for the noise that the people made, could this law be heard read: and the Tribuns of the Com. said, that this should be no let: for they would prefer a bill unto the people, that he might be discharged and dispensed withal from the Statutes in that behalf. Howbeit he stood stiffly still in his refusal: demanding of them to what purpose and end were the laws made, if by the very makes thereof, they might be thus deluded and made of no force? For so (qd. he) laws ruled not, but were over-ruled. But nevertheless, the people went to a scrutiny and began to give their voices: and as every Century was called into the rails they named and chose Fabius Consul, without sticking at the matter. Then at last, overcome with this general accord and consent of the F whole City: God say Amen (quoth he) O Quirites, to that you do and are about. But for al- much as you will have your will and dispose of me at your pleasure, do me this favour yet, that I may have the choosing of my Co-league. I beseech you make Consul with me P. Decimus, a man approved unto me already, with whom, I have forced well in the fellowship of another office: a man I say, answerable otherwise to the greatness of his name, and worthy of his fathers virtue, from whom he is descended. This favour which he requested, seemed unto them just and reasonable. So all the Centuries behind, created Q. Fabius and P. Decimus for Consuls.

The same year the Ædiles served process upon very many Citizens: for holding and possessing of more Lands, than by Law was limited: and none in a manner was able to acquit himself hereof. Which was a great bridle and restraint to their unmeasurable avarice. As the G new Consuls, Q. Fabius Maximus the fourth time, and P. Decimus the third time, conferred and laid their heads together about their charges, that the one should take in hand the Samnites, and the other the Tullians: and consulted what forces might serve and be sufficient for this or that Province and exploit: and to whether way either of them were the more meet and sufficient Leader: certain Embassadors, from Sarrum, Nepti, and Faleris, advertised them. That the States of Tullian, were now consulting in their Diets, about a Treaty of peace: which was an occasion, that they turned all their preparations and forces into Sannium. The Consuls being gone forth, to the end they might have the readier provision of grain and Viſuals, and the enemy be more to ſeek, which way they would aſſail them, led their Legions into Saminius; Fabius, through the territory of Sora and Decius by the way of the Sidicini, when they were come into the confines of their enemies, both of them ſpread themſelves all abroad, and ſell to forrage and ſpoil the country: yet ſo, as they ſaw their camp ſituated rather than they waited. Whereupon, they were well aware of their enemies, as they lay in ambush well appointed, within a cloſe and ſecret valley near Tifernum: ſo what way as they thought to take the vantage of the higher ground, and to let upon the Romans ſo ſoon as they were on entered in. Fabius having removed his carriages into a ſure place, and ſet there a competent guard for defence, fore-told his ſoldiers that there was a battle towards: and in a four-square battalion marched directly to the ſorſaid Embacado, where the enemies lurked and lay in wait. The Samnites then, deſpairing and loſt out of all hope to do any great exploit by ſudden tumult, conſidering their troops were diſcovered: and ſeeing they muſt once at the length come to the trial in open field, were themſelves alſo more willing to put all upon a ſet battle. Thereupon they defended into the plain and even ground, and committed themſelves to the fortune of fight, with more courage of heart than hope of victory. But were it, that they had aſſembled together the whole flour and manhood out of all the Nations of the Samnites, or that the hazard of the main chance made them more hardy and take the better heart: ſurely even in plain field, they held the Romans play and put them to great fear. Fabius ſeeing the enemies no way to retreat and give ground, commanded M. Flavius and M. Valerius, two Colonels, with whom he had ſet forward and advanced into the forefront, to go to the Horſemen, and to exhort them; if ever they remembered and called to mind, that the Common-wealth had been helped by the valour of the Gentlemen on horſeback, they ſhould that day endeavour to make invincible and eternal the glory of that degree and order of Cavalry. For ſeeing that the enemies ſtood unmoved againſt the Infantry, there was no other hope but in the force of Horſemen: and here withal he called upon thoſe two young Gentlemen, and plyed both the one and the other with like courteſy, one while praizing them, another while loading them with fair and large promiſes. But when as the aſſay of that force likewiſe, prevailed not, thinking where ſtrength would take no place, there craft was to be tried and practiſed, he cauſed Scipio his Lieutenant, to withdraw out of the conflict, the javeliniers of the firſt legion, and as cloſely as he could to ſeek about with them, toward the next hills: and then, to march up the hill ſome way from the fight of the enemies; and after he had gained the top, all of a ſudden to ſhew himſelf behind, and charge upon the enemies backs, whilſt their faces were turned another way. Now the Horſemen, by the direction of thoſe two Colonels, being ridden of a ſudden before the ſtandards, troubled their own fellows almoſt as much as the enemies. For againſt theſe troops and cornets of Horſe that they violently put forward, the Samnites battle ſtood unmoved, and on no part could either be forced to retreat, or to break their array. The Horſemen when they ſaw this attempt to take no effect, retired themſelves behind the enſigns, and departed out of the battle. Hereupon took the enemies more heart unto them; neither had the vanguard of the Romans been able to abide ſo long a conflict, and the violence of the enemies ſtill encreaſing, upon their own confidence, but that the ſecond ranges in the middle ward, by the Conſul's commandment, came forward into the front of the vanguard. Where they with their freſh ſtrength ſlayed the Samnites, being now ready to enter forcibly upon them, and to gain the ground: and withal, at the time appointed, the enſigns ſhewed themſelves from the hills, and came down unawares to the enemies; and ſetting up a ſhout, not only daunted the hearts of the Samnites, but alſo encouraged the Romans. For both Fabius cried aloud, that his Colleague Decius approached, and every ſoldier for his part, what he might, with joyful and cheerful hearts, iterated, that the other Conſul was come, and the legions were at hand. Which error and miſtaking, as it turned to the good of the Romans, ſo it cauſed the Samnites to ſlie, and to be ſurprized with a fright, fearing and doubting nothing ſo much, as that being now overtoiled and wearied, they ſhould be overcharged alſo with freſh and luſty forces. And for that in their running every way, they were ſcattered aſunder there was leſs ſlaughter than for the preparation of ſo great a victory. For 3400 N only were ſlain, and of priſoners were taken, weſneer three hundred and thirty: and three and twenty banners and enſigns won and carried away. The Apulians had joyed with the Samnites before the battle, but that P. Decius the Conſul encamped againſt them at M. Valentium, and having drawn them forth to fight, diſcomfited them. Where alſo there were more that ſled, than died upon the ſword: for not above 2000 Apulians were ſlain. And Decius making no reckoning of that enemy, conducted his legions into Saminius. Where, two Conſular hoſts, having overrun the country in divers parts within five months ſpace laid all waſt and deſolate. Five and forty places there were in Saminius, where Decius had encamped: and eighty fix, wherein the other Conſul had pitched. In which, they left behind them not only the marks of flaks, rampires, and ditches, but alſo many other more notable ſigns and tokens of the country waſted all about, and utterly ſpoiled by them. Fabius beſides, won the City Cimbrina. Where there were taken priſoners two thouſand and four hundred armed ſoldiers, and ſlain there were in fight upon 430.

From thence he went to Rome againſt the Election of new Conſuls, and made all the haſt he could to diſpatch that buſineſs. And when as all the Centuries firſt called forth to give their ſuffrages, named Q. Fabius for the Conſul; then Appius Claudius a Conſular man, and one of the Competitors, a grim ſir, and ambitious by nature, laboured no more for his own honour and advancement, advancement, than to recover again unto the Patritii, both the rooms of the Conſulſhip, and employed as well his own devoir, as alſo all the means and aſſiſtance of the Patritii and Nobility, to have himſelf choſen Conſul with Q. Fabius. As for Fabius, at the firſt, ſpoke and alledged in his own behalf, the ſame reaſons in manner which he had uſed the former year, and reſuſed to be Conſul. The whole body of the Nobility flood about his ſeat, praizing intantly, and entreating him to pluck the Conſulſhip out of the mire and baſe degree of theſe Commons, and to reſtore the ancient Maſtety both to the Magiſtracy it ſelf, and alſo to the Patritii and their houſes and families. Fabius after ſilence made, framed a middle and moderate kind of ſpeech, whereby he appeaſed and allayed their hot aſſe, promiſing and aſſuring them, that he would willingly accept the names of two of the Nobility, if he might ſee, that they would create any other Conſul but himſelf: for at this preſent Election, he would in no wife admit himſelf, to be eligible and nominated Conſul, and give ſo bad a precedent to prejudice all couſe of law, for the time to come. So L. Volturnus, one of the body of the Commons, was created Conſul with App. Claudius, whoſe ſilence in the former Conſulſhip had been matched Colleagues together. The Nobility uſed to object unto Fabius, and reproached him, that he avoided App. Claudius to be his companion in government, who for eloquence and other civil parts was no doubt a ſingular and excellent man. When the Election was ended, the old Conſuls were commanded to war in Saminius, having their Government continued: and their commiſſion renewed for fix months. And ſo in the year following likewiſe, when L. Volturnus and Appius Claudius were Conſuls, P. Decius, who being Conſul, had been left behind his Colleague in Saminius, cealed not now in quality and name of Proconſul, to wait the country; until at length, when the Samnits would in no place abide battle, they were by him chafed out of their own borders and limits. And thus driven out of the field, and excluded out of their own country, they went into Hetruria. Where, ſuppoſing that with ſo huge a multitude of armed men, they ſhould do that more effectually with increaſed prayers, mingled with threats among, which by ſo many Embaſſies they had ſo oft attempted in vain: they called for a Diet and general Council of the States and Princes of Hetruria. Which being aſſembled, they declared and ſhewed, for how many years ſpace they had maintained war with the Romans in the right of their freedom: that they had aſſayed all means, if haply they might have been able by their own puſſance alone to ſuſtain and ſupport the weight of ſo huge and important a war: that they had beſides made proof of the aids of other neighbouring nations, but to little effect: that they had fought for peace of the people of Rome, when they were not able to wage war any longer: and becauſe peace was more grievous unto them, with that ſubjection, than war with their liberty, they had rebelled and made war again: and now their only hope they had, remained in the Tuſcans: knowing well enough, that for men, munition, and money, they were the mightieſt nation of all Italy: as having to their neighbours the Gauls, a people born and bred up in armor and war: by natural diſpoſition fierce and cruel, but eſpecially in any quarrel againſt the people of Rome: of whom they do (and not untruſtly report) that they were by them vanquiſhed and conſtrained to ransome themſelves for gold. Now, if the Tuſcans were of that heart and courage, as Poſſum ſometimes, and other their noble progenitors were: there were no doubt, but that they might diſſeize the Romans, and diſpoſſeſs them of all the ground on this ſide Tyberis, and make them fight for the defence and preſervation of their lives, and not for the intolerable ſeignory and dominion of Italy. They ſaid moreover, that there was now come unto them an army of Samnites, well appointed and ſuſtained with armour, and ſtored with pay and money, who would ſell them forthwith, even to the aſſault of the City of Rome, if they would lead them.

Whiles they were thus braving, and gloriously boaiſting themſelves, and preparing of war in Tuſcanie, the Romans war at their own dores, lay fore upon them, and ſtung them at the heart. For P. Decius having learned by the epicals, that the Samnites army was gone forth, and had taken their voyage, aſſembled a Council and ſaid, What mean we thus to range over the fields, wandering from village to village? And not rather aſſail the walled Towns and ſtrong Cities? There is no army now, that defendeth Saminius: gone they are out of their confines, and wrought their own exile and baniſhment. When they all had allowed of this motion, he led forth his power to aſſault the ſtrong City Murgantia. And ſo hotly were the ſoldiers ſet, both for the love they bore to their Captain, and alſo for hope of winning a richer plack thereby, than by driving booties out of the country, that in one day by mere force of arms they won the Town. Where two thouſand and one hundred Samnites, fighting men, either fell upon the edge of the ſword, or were taken priſoners, with a great and rich booty beſides. But for fear that it ſhould ſurcharge and encumber the army with heavy carriages, Decius cauſed his ſoldiers to be called together unto an audience, and thus to him he ſaid, "And willeſt thou contented indeed with this victory only, and this prey? Or willeſt thou build your hope ſtill, unſwearable to your promiſes and valour? All the Cities of the Samnites, all the ſubſtance and riches that lieth and remaineth in their Cities are yours for aſmuch as ye have in ſo many batels vanquiſhed their legions and at laſt driven them out of their own country. Sell theſe prizes, and with hope of gain draw after you chapmen and merchants to follow the army. I will from time to time ſell you to your wares and commodities for to ſell. Let us go from hence ſtreight to the City Romula, where your toil ſhall not be to great, but the ſpoil far greater. So when they had made ſale of their plack, and willingly of themſelves called upon and exhorted their Captain to that expedition, to Romula they go. Where likewise, without mure and platform, without warlike engines of battery, so soon as they advanced their engines, and approached the walls, they could by no violence be driven from thence, but set up ladders in all bait, at the next place that every man could find, and so scaled up the walls. Thus the Town was won and ransacked. To the number of 2300 were slain, and 6000 taken prisoners. The souldiers having got an exceeding booty, were forced to sell it, and make all away, as before: and from thence without any rest at all given unto them were they led to Ferentinum, yet they marched thither with exceeding courage and cheerfulness. Howbeit there they found more difficult and perilous service: for the walls were with all forcible means defended, and the place it self was both by mans hand, and natural situation, furly fenced: but yet the souldiers now being fleshed, and enured to As, overcame all difficulties. Three thousand men about the walls were slain: and the sackage fell to the souldiers share. The greatest part of the honor in assaulting and winning of these Cities, is ascribed in some Chronicles to Fabius Maximus. For they write, that Margantia was won by Ferentinum and Romula, by the conduct of Fabius. But some attribute the glory hereof unto the new Consuls. And there are, that give the glory not to both, but to the one of them to wit, P. Volturnius, unto whom be fell the Province of Samnium.

Whiles these affairs thus went in Samnium (by whose leading and managing it skills nor) in the mean time a mighty war was preparing in Hetruria: and that, of many nations banded together: the principal author whereof was Gellius Egnatius a Samnite. The Tuscans, in manner all, had taken arms and levied their forces, and the neerer society, called also the people of Umbria, joyning to take their part: besides, Gauls also were waged for money to aid: all which multitude assembled together, and met in the Samnits camp. The news of which sudden and unexpected tumult, being brought to Rome: for so much as P. Volturnius the Col, with the second and third legions, and with 5000 confederats was gone already into Samnium: it was thought good and determined, that App. Claudius with all speed possible, should go into Hetruria: and alter him, two Roman legions followed, to wit, the first and fourth, with twelve thousand allies: who, so camped not far from the enemy. But more good was done there, in respect that they came thither betimes, (to the end that the fear of the Roman name might keep in awe certain nations in Hetruria, which already intended war) than for any exploit performed either skillfully or luckily, under the conduct of the Consul. Many skirmishes there passed in places of disadvantage, and times inconvenient: in so much, as the enemy took more heart, and conceived greater hope every day more than other: and now it grew well near to this point, that neither souldier could well reckon of the sufficiency of Captain nor Captain trust upon the loyalty of the souldier. In three several Annals I find, that Appius dispatched his letters to his fellow Consul, and sent him out of Samnium: howbeit, I am loth to set this down being so uncertain as it is: seeing that the very Consuls themselves of Rome, who now the second time were coupled together in one government, contended, and openly jarred about this point: whiles Appius denied flatly that he sent any scribe at all, and Volturnius again avowed, that he was sent for by Appius his letters. Volturnius by this time had won three Castles in Samnium, wherein were slain three thousand enemies, and almost half so many taken prisoners: and composed besides the seditions and quarrels of the Lucans, which arose from the Commons and needy persons: and that, with the exceeding good contentment of the chief and principal personages of the country, by the means and mediation of Q. Fabius the Proconsul, who was thither sent with the old army. This done, he left Decius to wait and pill the country of the enemies, and himself with his forces marched toward his Colleague into Hetruria. Who at his first coming, was received generally with all the joy that might be. For mine own part, I suppose verily, that as Appius had good cause to cary angry stomach with him, in case his conscience bare him witness, that he wrote not unto him: for as he had need of his Colleague aid, he shewed an illiberal, unkind, and unthankful nature of his own, in that he would to himself, and not be known thereof. For being come forth to meet him, before they had well greeted and saluted one another. How now, quoth he, O L. Volturnius, is all well? How goes the World in Samnium? What hath moved you to abandon and leave your own charge and province, and to depart? Volturnius made answer, that in Samnium all things went well and chieft prosperously, and that himself was now come, as sent for by his letters: which if they were counterfeit, and that there were no need of him in Hetruria, he would presently turn his engines, and be gone. Mary, quoth he, and good leave have you: you may be gone when you will, and no man holdeth you: it is ill becoming it, that you who peradventure are not able to wield and manage your own affairs of war, should glory thus, and make your boast that you are come hither to help others. Hereat Volturnius should reply again and say, It is well, and God send us good luck: I had rather lose my labour, than ought should have happened, whereby our Consuls army were not sufficient to deal with Hetruria. Now as the Consuls were parting asunder one from the other, the Lieutenants and Colonels of Appius his army, came and stood round about them both: some requested their own General, that the aid of his Colleague which ought to have been accepted by them if it had been required: now that it was offered so willingly, and of his own accord, should not be refused and rejected. But the more part encountered Volturnius, as he was ready to go his way, and earnestly besought him not for any forward contention, and debate with his companion, to betray the common-weal. For if any overthrow or misadventure should happen, the blame would be imputed rather to the foraker than the forsaken: and now things were come to this pass, that the honor or dishonor of the war in Hetruria, proved it well or ill, should fall upon L. Volturnius: for that no man would enquire of the words and language that Appius gave him, but of the fortune and success of the army: and albeit Appius had given him his farewell and passport, the weal publick and the army held him still by the sleeve, and for proof hereof, let him but make trial of the souldiers hearts and affections. Thus with remonitances, persuasions, and hearty prayers to the one Consul and the other, they drew them both, in manner against their wilso: partly in publick audience before the whole army. Where they grew to longer speeches and discourses, but to the same purpose and effect, as before in the hearing and presence of a few. Now when Volturnius (as having the better cause) seemed to reply, and that with good grace & words enough, against that singular eloquence of his Colleague: and that Appius in trumping and taunting manner gave out and said, That they were beholden to him, and might con him thank, that of a dumb and tongue-tied Consul they had one now, that was so ready and eloquent: and who in his former Consulship, and specially in the first months, could not open his mouth, and speak a word, was now of a sudden become an Orator, and able to make plausible and popular Orations: then replied Volturnius and said, "Would God, with all my heart, you rather had learned of me to fight valiantly, then I of you to speak finely: and in conclusion, he said, he would tender him an offer, which should determine and put out of all doubt, whether of them twain, were, not the better Lawyer and Orator (for at this present the Common-weal stood not in need of flourish) but the better warrior and Captain General. Whereas therefore, there are ii. Provinces, Hetruria and Samnium, it shall be in your choice (qd. he) to take one of them, whether you will, and I myself will with my own army, make war in the other. Then began the souldiers to cry aloud unto them, that they would jointly enter both upon the Tuscan war, which content and accord of theirs, when Volturnius had perceived, "Forasmuch (qd. he) as I have once mistaken and misinterpreted the will of my Colleague, I will not in any case stand in doubt and be ignorant of your minds too: Let me know therefore by a shout of yours, whether you would have me tarry or depart? Whereat they set up such a note, that it gave an alarm to the enemies, and raised them out of their camp, and presently they caught their weapons up, and came forth into the field, Volturnius likewise caused the trumpets to sound, and the standards and ensigns to be brought abroad. Then Appius (as it is reported) seeing plainly, that whether he fought or fate still, the victory would be ascribed to his Colleague, stood in a maiming and suspence for a while: but afterwards fearing, lest that his own legions also would follow Volturnius, gave likewise unto his men the signal of batel, which they so instantly called for. But neither they, nor the enemies were well arranged and in good order: for both the leader of the Samnits (Gellius Egnatius) was gone a foraging abroad, with some few cohorts and bands with him: whereupon the souldiers rather of their own head, than by conduct and direction of Captains, began to charge: and also the Roman armies were not both lead forth together, nor yet had time enough to be marshalled accordingly: for Volturnius first gave the charge, before that Appius could come to encounter the enemies: whereupon, the forecouns were not equally marched together: and as if some fortune had exchanged the enemies, that they were wont to fight withal: the Tuscans presented themselves to Volturnius, and the Samnits who stayed a while (for that their General was absent) affronted Appius. It is reported that Appius in the very heat of the skirmish, was seen in the front of the foremost ensigns, to lift up his hands to Heaven, and pray in this wise, "O Lady Bellona, if thou give us victory, and the honor of this day then, be sure, I vow here unto thee at this hour, a fair Temple. When he had thus prayed, as if the goddess had put life unto him, and animated his courage, both himself matched the valour of his Colleague, and his army answered the virtue of their Commander. For he performed the devoir and part (indeed) of a brave General. The souldiers likewise, for fear that the other army should begin the victory, endeavored and streined all that ever they could: Whereby, they disarrayed, discomfited, and put to flight the enemies, who could not easily abide any extraordinary force and violence, more than they were wont to meet withal. And so with pressing hard upon them still that retreated, and chasing them hotly that were scattered in flight, they beat them into their camp. There, by the coming in of Gellius and the Sabellian bands, the batel for the time was freshly renewed. But when they also, within a while were discomfited, then was the camp assaulted by the conquerors. Thus whiles Volturnius for his part entered with banner displayed unto the very gate and Appius ever and anon, reiterated the name of Bellona the victress, and all, to set on fire and inflame the courage of his souldiers: there was neither trench nor rampier that could hold them back. So the camp was won and sacked, and a huge pillage therein found, which was given all to the souldiers. Seven thousand and three hundred enemies were slain, 2120 taken prisoners.

During the time that both Consuls, and the whole pisanie of the Romans, were thus more bent and employed in the war within Tuscany: there were new forces raised in Samnium, to wait the marches of the Roman Dominion: who taking their way through the Veltins, into Campania and the country of Faleris, drave huge prizes and booties away. And as Volturnius by great journeys returned into Samnium (for by this time Fabius and Decius were come to an end of their prorogued government) the bruit that was blown abroad of the Samnits army and their foraging of the territory of Capua, turned him out of his way, to the defence of his allies and confederats. So soon as he was entered into the country Calenum, both he himself saw the fresh marks and tokens of great damage and desolation: and also the Calenians advertised him, that the enemies carried with them already too excessive a prey and booty, that they were scarce able for it to march in good order, and that their Captains began openly to speak and say, that the best course they could take, was presently to retire Sammium, thence to leave their prizes and booties, and so to return afresh to their homes and make new expeditions; and not to commit an army, so laden and lurcharged, to the fortune and hazard of a battle. Which words, albeit they sounded much to a truth, yet he thought it meet to look better into the matter, and to build upon a sure ground, and therefore he sent certain light Horsemen, to intercept some foragers as they straggled and were scattered one from another in the fields. By whom he learned, after much questioning with them, that the enemies encamped by the river Vulturum, and from thence at the third watch, would set forward on their journey directly into Sammium. After he had sufficient intelligences and advertisements concerning these things, he dislodged and put himself upon his way, and encamped so far from the enemies, as his approach by being too near could not be known, and yet he might be able to surprise them as they should issue in disorder out of their camp. So, good while before day, he marched towards the enemy: and sent such as were well seen in the Oscan tongue, to listen and learn what they did. Who being intermingled with the enemies (which was an easy matter in that night garb and confusion) they found that the enemies were set forward, not sufficiently accompanied with armed men for defence; and that the whole pillage with the guard and convoy thereof, was now going forth, and marched carefully like a sort of vile and base lozels, every man thinking of his own particulars and running on his own head, without consent of others, and with little or no direction and government. This was thought the meetest time to set upon them: and now it drew near day. Whereupon he commanded the trumpets to sound the charge, and set upon the march of the enemies. The Samnites, incumbered as they were, and pestered with their booty, and few of them here and there in armour, began, some of them to double their pace, and to march faster away, and drive before them the booty: some stood still, and wist not whether they were better, to go on forward, or retire again into the camp. But while they thus trifled and stayed, they were environed and surprized by the Romans: and by this time they had gotten over their rampier: much killing there was, and confusion in the camp. The Samnites, as they marched, besides that they were troubled with the assault of their enemies, were also disquieted with the sudden escape and revolt of their prisoners: who being some of them loose, loosed also those that were bound: while others of them, caught up their weapons which were fastened to the packs, and being confusedly intermingled in the march, made greater and more fearful garb and havoc, than the very battle of the enemies. And more than that, they performed one memorable and notable Act above the rest. For as Statius Erpinus the General, went about the ranks and files encouraging the soldiers to fight, they set upon him, scattered the Horsemen asunder, that accompanied him, environed him about, and took him as he sat on Horseback, and haled him to the Roman Consul. Upon which tumult and stir, the foremost ensigns of the Samnites were called back, and the battle which in manner was done, now began afresh: yet could not they any long time resist and hold out. Slain there were about six thousand; two thousand and five hundred taken prisoners. Amongst whom were 4 Colonels and 30 Ensigns: and (that, wherein the victors took contentment) of captives, 7000 and 400 hundred were again recovered: with an exceeding great booty which they had got from their allies: whereunto, by proclamation were called, all that could lay any claim, or pretend a right, to seize upon their own goods, and to receive the same by a day appointed. And look what parcels could not be owned or challenged by the true owner, was given away to the soldiers: who were compelled to make sale thereof, to the end, that they should not set their heart upon any thing but war.

This sackage of the territory of Capua, had raised great trouble and stir in Rome. And at the very same time also, it chanced, that there came news out of Heimria, how that upon the withdrawing of Volturnus his forces out of those parts, all that country was up afresh in arms; that Gellius Egnatius the Samnite Captain, and the Umbrians likewise, were moved to revolt; and the Gauls also solicited with great sums of money. At this bruit the Senat being affraid, commanded an abstinence or vacation of term, and that all sorts of men should be mustered: and not only the free born natural citizens, and the flower of the youth were prest and sworn, but certain companies also of the elder sort, yea, and bands of Libertins newly enfranchised, were enrolled by the hundreds. Likewise they laid Council about devising means for defence of the City: and P. Sempronius the Pretor, had the whole government of the State. But the Senat was partly eased and discharged of this care, by the letters of L. Volturnus the Col., which gave intelligence that the foragers of Campain were defeated, slain, and put to flight. Thereupon were decreed in favour of the Consul, for this exploit by him achieved, solemn processions, and the abstinence of term again was remitted, which had continued for eighteen dayes space: and the procession afore said, was right joyfully performed. Then began they to devise about garriſons for defence of the country, thus wasted and overrun by the Samnites. And agreed it was, that two Colonies should be sent about the Vestin and Falern coasts, one to the mouth of the river Liris, which Colony was called Minturne, the other in the Vestin forest and streights, adjoining to the Falern country: where Synope, a Greek Town sometime stood, and afterwards was called by the Romans there inhabiting, Sinuessæ. The Tribuns of the Com. had in charge to ordain by an Act of the common people, that P. Sempronius the Pretor should choose certain Triumvirs, about the sending and translating of inhabitants into those Colonies. But much ado they had to find those that willingly yielded to be enrolled Colonies, supposing indeed, that they were fittest, not to inhabit Land and ground for their best behoof, but to lie in garriſon, and to stand upon their guard in those frontiers, which were continually molested by warlike enemies. From the care of these affairs, the Senat was withdrawn, by occasion of the Tulcan war, whereof the rumour daily encreased: and letters also came thick from Appius, who warned them not to neglect the rising of that country: which letters imported, that four nations had united their forces, and banded themselves together; to wit, Tuscanes, Sammium, Umbria, and the Gauls: that they were already encamped in two places, for that one was not able to receive to great a multitude. Upon these occasions, as also for that the time drew near of Election of Consuls, Lucius Volturnus the Consul was called home to Rome. Who before that he called the Centuries for to give their voyces, having assembled the people to an audience, discoursed before them at large, concerning the greatness of the Tulcan war. "How that afore time, when he himself and his brother Consul warred there together, it was of so great importance, that neither one leader, nor yet one army was sufficient: and by report, the Umbrians, and a mighty power of Gauls were afterward combined unto them. So that they should remember, that they were to choose that day two Consuls, against four Nations. As for himself, but that he was certainly persuaded and assured, that the people of Rome would with a general content declare him Consul, who at that time, without all controversy was counted the principal Captain and best leader of all others, he would forthwith nominate a Dictator. No man doubted, but the Q. Fabius was the man, who by the silent assent of all, was meant and desired to this charge: and him together with Volturnus, both the prerogative tribe, and all those that were called first, every one, nominated to be Consul. Fabius made a speech by way of excuse, in substance, like as he had done before, two years before that: but afterwards seeing he was overcome with the general agreement of the people, he framed it so in the end, that he required P. Decius to be his colleague: "Alleging, that he would be in stead of a good prop and stay to him in his old age: how he had found by experience in one Consulship and two Consulships, born jointly together with him, that there was no injury and decrease of the Common-wealth, to the concord and agreement of those that are companions in government. And to any other new Colleague besides him, hardly could an old mans mind fort and frame. Also that he would and could more easily impart his mind and purpose to one, whose humor, condition, and behavior, he had been already acquainted with. The Consul, himself confirmed his Oration, and accorded thereunto; as well, in regard of the commendable parts and deserts of P. Decius, as also of the good that proceeded and ensued upon the managing of war-affairs, by the concord and unity of the Consuls; and of the hurt which hapned and followed upon their disagreement and dissension: "And therewith he shewed how near they were of late to utter peril and destruction, through quarrels between him and his brother Appius: admonishing Decius and Fabius both to live so, as with one mind and heart they affected and intended the same things. He added moreover and said, they were men of a bold both, born for war and to be soldiers: for martial feats renowned already: but for to maintain contentions of words and quarrels of the tongue, altogether rude and unskillful, and such nature, (said he) were fittest to make Consuls. As for nimble heads and fine wits, deeply seen in points and quicks of law, full of their eloquent terms, such as Ap. Claudius was: those were meet to be made Lord Presidents of the City and chief Justices in the common place, for to sit in judgment of causes, and see the execution of laws. Thus in handling of these matters was that day spent. The morrow after, according to the Consuls appointment, was the Election held, both of new Consuls, and also of Pretors. Q. Fabius and P. Decius were created Consuls, and App. Claudius Pretor, all absent. And L. Volturnus by Act of the Senat, and grant of the Commons, had his government prorogued, and continued in his charge one year longer.

The same year were many strange fights and prodigious monsters seen: for the turning away of the dangers fore signified and menaced thereby, the Senat decreed supplications and Lectanies for two dayes together. Wine and incense for the sacrifices, was allowed at the publick charges of the City, and in procession went both men and women in great number, with much reverence, to visit the Holy shrines, and there to do their devotions. These solemn supplications were more renowned and memorable, by reason of a contention that arose among the dames of the City, in the Chappel of Lady Panditia Paritia, which standeth in the beaſt-market, by the round Church of Hercules. The Noblemens wives would not admit into that Chappel Virginia the daughter of Aulus, who, notwithstanding she was nobly descended from the race of the Paritii, yet had espoused Volturnus the Consul, a Commoner and was married (forsooth) out of the family and rank of the Paritii. Whereupon, there began some short and curted shrewd words to be dealt between: and so (as women commonly are soon angry and set on fire) there grew to heart-burning and hot contention. Whiles Virginia alledged and said, that she being a Gentiewoman and Paritia born, and a chaste and honest Dame, was entered in the Chappel of Paritia Chastity: over and besides, she had not been noted for Bigamy; but was the wife of one only husband, unto whom she was given and brought a pure maid: and as for her husband, and his dignities which he had born, his noble acts that he had achieved, she had no cause to complain, or be ashamed, nay, rather, she gloried therein right greatly. After this, she accumulated these magnificent and glorious words, with a generous and brave deed. For in the long street where she dwelt, she set by and cut off a part of her dwelling house, as much as would serve for an Oratory or petty Chapel, and there erected an Altar. And when she had assembled the wives of the Commons together, and had complained of the injurious dealing of the Patrim damas; "This Altar (quoth she) do I dedicate unto Pudicitia Plebeia: and all you here I exhort, "that with what emulation, the men our husbands, in this City contend about feats of valour "and arms, who may do best: so likewise the Matrons and wives strive and excel in continence "and chastity; and that ye will labour and endeavour, that this altar may have the name to be "frequented, and resorted unto, with more reverence and devotion, yea, and if (it be possible) of "more chaste women, than that other of the Nobility. And so it fell out indeed, that from that time, this altar also had the same rites (in a manner) and ceremonies as the other, which was more ancient: in such sort, as no wife, but of approved honesty and chastity, and wedded unto one husband during her life, might be allowed there to sacrifice and offer oblations. But this religious order and institution, in lapse and process of time was prophaned afterwards and divulged, and the altar frequented by them that were stained and infamous, and not only by matrons of name and quality, but also by women of all sorts and degrees, until at last through disuse it grew to be utterly forgotten, and came to nothing.

The same year the Ediles Curiæ, Cn. and Q. Ogulnius accused certain Usurers, who were convicted, and their goods forfeit and confiscated. And of that which came into the common chest, they caused to be made a brazen portal in the Capitol, and silver vessels forth furnish out three tables in Jupiter his Chapel: also the image of Jupiter himself in the Lantern or frontispiece of the Capitol, sitting in his chariot drawn with four steeds. Moreover, at the Fig-Tre Romulus, they erected and set up the images of the founding babes, the first founders of the City, pendant to the teats of a three-wolf. They paved also with square stone, the cauley and high way from the gate Capena, unto the Temple of Mars. The Ediles likewise Commons, L. Atilius Paullus, and C. Fulvius Curvus, of the forfeited money which they levied of the graziers or farmers of the City pastures, who were condemned and fined, exhibited certain pageants and plays, and set up golden bolles in the Temple of Ceres.

After this, Q. Fabius the fifth time Consul, and P. Decius the fourth, entered their government, who now had been companions together in three Consulats; and in one Censorship, men renowned, not more for the honor of their noble exploits in war, which was right great, than for their loving agreement and concord. Which unity of theirs was not perpetual to the end; by occasion I suppose, of the contention of the States that came between, rather than of any difference betwixt themselves. For the Patritii laboured, that Fabius should have the Province of Tuscan extraordinarily: and the Commons were as earnest with Decius to put the matter to a Lottery. Certain it is, that a great contention there was in the Senat. But afterwards, seeing that Fabius was able there to do more and make a greater side than his Colleague, the matter was brought again before the people. In which assembly, few words passed between the parties themselves, being martial men both, standing more upon deeds than words. Fabius gave out and said: "That it was an indignity, that another should gather fruit under the Tree that he had planted. "Also, that himself was the man, who had opened the way through the wood Ciminia, and had given entrance and passage for the Roman war, through desert and wild forests. What meant they then to trouble him, a man of those years, with this place of charge, in case, they minded "to give the conduct of this war to any other General but himself? No doubt, but by little and little he upbraided them covertly and cast in their teeth, for chusing unto him an adversary, and not a companion in government: yea, and charged Decius, that he repented and envied the "good concord, wherein they had lived together, during the time of three Magistracies already. Finally, he aimed and reached at no farther matter than this, but if so be, they thought him "worthy of the Province, thither to send him. For as he had been at the appointment and pleasure of the Senate, so would he be at the ordering and direction of the people. On the other side, P. Decius complained of the injury offered by the Senat: for that the Nobles had endeavored to their power, and done their best, that no Commons might have access to honourable places and dignities: and after that protests and valour had got the upperhand, and prevailed "so, as even in those kind of men virtue wanted not her due reward and honour: there were means sought, that not only the voices of the people were deluded and made vain: but also the very awards and arbitraments of fortune, were transferred to the wills and pleasures of some few. All Consuls before him had their provinces by lot: and now the Senat by their absolute authority, without casting lots, gave unto Fabius the charge of his province. If it be (saith he) "to honour the man: verily, he hath so well deserved both of my self and of the Commons wealth, that I favour highly and tender the glory of Q. Fabius: provided alwayes, that it get "not a shining lustre, by a foil of my disgrace and dishonour. And who will ever doubt, when there is one difficult and dangerous war, and the same precisely and absolutely charged upon "one Consul, without ordinary and lawful calling: but that the other Consul standeth for a "Cipher, and is reputed either needles, or good for nothing? As for Fabius, like as he gloried in his service and noble Acts achieved in Tuscan; even so would Publius Decius also fall in "do the semblable: and peradventure, he should be able to put out and quench that fire once for all, which Fabius left behind him, so covered and raked up, as that oftentimes it suddenly brake "our again, and yielded forth new flames and blazes. In conclusion, he could be content to yield

"yield the titles of honour and all rewards of venue unto his Colleague, in the reverent regard "of his old age, and majesty of his person: but for any hazard or jeopardy that might be presented unto them, henceforth at this time gave place, nor ever would (with his good will) to "him or any man else whatsoever: and it he got no other good by this contention, yet would he "obtain thus much at the least, that the people should hold their own, and dispose of that absolute authority at their discretion, which was in their power: rather then permit the Nobles to gratify "any one therewith at their pleasure. And herewith he prayed Jup. Op. Max. and all the immortal gods, that even as they vouchsafed to bestow upon him and his Colleague equal valour "and happiness in the conduct of their way, so they would afford them one and the same right "and authority and rule. For, surely it was in nature meet and reason, for example good and profitable, and for the credit and fame of the people of Rome much material, that (such should be the Consuls, as by either of their guidance and conduct, without exceptions, the war with the "Tuscans might be administered as it ought to be. Fabius then, having besought the people might elie, but that before the Tribes were called in to give their suffrages, they would hear the letters of App. Claudius Pretor read, which were brought out of Tuscan, departed out of the assembly. So the Province of Tuscan, without casting lots, was awarded unto Fabius, with no less consent of the people, then of the Senat. Hereupon, all the younger sort (in manner) ran unto the Consul, and offered their service of themselves, and gave their names to be enrolled, so desirous were they to serve under that Captain. Which multitude being thus stocked about him round: Four thousand footmen (quoth he) and six hundred horse, and no more, am I minded to take up and levy. As many therefore, as to day and to morrow, will present themselves and give their names, will I accept of, and take with me: more care have I to bring you all home rich and wealthy, then to have numbers of souldiers to fight my batrels. This went he forth with a competent Army well appointed, and so much more confident, and in hope of good success, by how much less he stood upon the great number: and directed his journey to the Town Abarna, where Appius the Pretor encamped, and from whence the enemy was not far distant. A few miles on this side, the fewellers or wood-purveys, accompanied with a good guard of souldiers for their convoy, met him: who seeing the Sergeants going before, and understanding that it was Fabius the Consul, with joy and cheerful hearts, thanked God and the procuring that it was Fabius the Consul, when they came all about the Consul to salute and welcome him, Fabius demanded whither they went? who answered, To purvey wood and leuel. Say ye so? (quoth he) and have ye not your camp empaled and fortified? Yes, cried they all, and that with a double rampart and ditch, but yet are we in exceeding fear. Then (quoth he) ye have wood and timber enough. Go ye back again, and down with the trench and palisade. Who returned into the camp, and as they were plucking up the rampart, they gave the alarm both to the souldiers that carried behind in the camp, and to Appius himself, and made them afraid. Then every man said to one or other as they came, that it was by the express commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul that they did so. The morrow after they removed the camp; and Appius the Pretor was dismissed and sent away to Rome. After which time, the Romans abode no where in standing camp: for he laid, it was not good and commodious for an army to make abode in any one place; but that it was better and more wholesome both for the agility and health of their bodies, to have a running camp, to be ever marching, and changing the air and the soil. But their journeys were no other, then the winter would permit, which was not yet past.

In the beginning of the Spring, Fabius having left the second legion at Clusium, which in old time was called Camars, and appointed L. Scipio Pro-pretor, to be governor of the camp, he returned himself to Rome for to consult about the war: were it of his own accord and motion, because it appeared evidently in view of eye much greater then it was reputed before; or that he was sent for by order from the Senat for there be writers that affirm both the one and the other. Some would have it thought, that he was called back again by Appius Claudius Pretor, who both at the Council Table in the Senat House, and also before the body of the people (like as he had continually done by letters) enforced the fear and terror of the Tuscan war, saying, that one General and one Army, were not sufficient to make head against four Nations: that it would be dangerous and doubtful, whether they jointly in one body gave battel unto one, or maintained war apart in divers quarters: that one man was not able to perform and manage all at once. As for himself, he had left behind him two Roman Legions and no more, and with Fabius there were come not full five thousand in all, of horse and foot together. His opinion therefore was, that with all speed, P. Decius the Consul, should go to his Colleague unto Tuscan, and L. Volturnus have the charge of Samnium in the meantime. But in case the Consul had rather go into his own Province, then he advised, that Volturnus took his way directly with a full and complete Consular army unto Tuscan, to the Consul. When this discourse of the Pretor had moved a great part of the House, then P. Decius spake (by report) to this effect: That all should be left entire and free to the disposition of Q. Fabius, until such time as either himself in person (if it might stand with the weal-publick) were come to Rome, or sent one of his Lieutenants by whom the Senat might be informed, and truly understand the poeple and importance of the war in Tuscan; what forces were requisite, and how many Leaders and Captains were expedient and needful: Fabius, so soon as he was returned to Rome, both in the Senat House, and also in the audience of the people, held a middle course in all his speech : that he might seem neither to encrease, nor yet to diminish the rumor of the war : and in assuming to himself another Captain, he pretended, that he condescended thereunto, in regard of other mens fear, more then for his own safety, or for any danger that the State was like to incur. Howbeit, if they would allow him a conductor and companion in war, how might he forget P. Decius the Consul of whom he had good proof and experience in many Magistracies, which they had born and admittred together. O! all men in the world he loved none better, and would make choice of no one else : and having P. Decius with him, he would never think his forces too few about him, nor his enemies too many before him. But if perad venture the mind and hear of his Collegue stood otherwise, his request was, that they would give him L. Volturnus to be his assistant. The determination of all was referred over to Fabius, both by the people and Senat, and also by the Consul himself. And when as Decius shewed and testified, that he was ready to take a journey either into Samium or Tuscan there followed such a joy and gratulation of all men, as if they had conceived in their spirit a victory afore-hand, and even now, had decreed for the Consuls, not a doubtful war, but a glorious triumph. I find in some writers, that Fabius and Decius, presently upon the entrance into their Magistracy, went into Tuscan, without any mention of casting lots for their charges and provinces, or of the contention between the two Collegues, which I have set down. There be some again, who having laid abroad their debates, stayed neither, but over and besides have added a surcease of matter, roaching the invectives of Appian before the people, against Fabius in his absence ; as also the obstinate stubbornness of him being Pretor, against the Consul, to his very face : moreover, another contention and variance between the two Consuls : whiles Decius endeavored to bring about, and was instant that each one should keep him to his own Province allotted unto him, and hold it. But all writers agree in the course of the history, from the time that both Consuls went out to war, and so forward.

But before that the Consuls arrived in Tuscanum, certain Gauls called Senones, came with a great power before (Luſum), ready to give assault unto the Roman Legion and the camp. But Scipio, who was left Governor thereof, thinking it necessary to help out the small number of his men, by advantage of the ground, led his army up to the hill between the town and the camp. But (as it fell out in such sudden cases) he had not discovered aforehand the ways and passes all about; but inconsiderately went forward, and engaged himself up to the top and pitch of the hill, which the enemy was master of already, by another side. Thus was the legion assailed on the back and beat down, and thus was it enclosed and environed round, by a multitude of enemies, and put to the sword. Some writers there be who report, that the whole legion perished there. So that not one escaped alive to carry tidings. Also, that the Consuls who now were not far from Clusum, had no news brought them of this overthrow, before the horriem of the Gauls were in fight, who carrying the heads of them that were slain, some hanging before at their horsepoitrels, others sticking aloft upon their lances, braved and triumphed, singing and chanting songs of joy, after their manner. Some write that they were the Umbri and not the Gauls, and that the defeat and massacre was not so great: also that when the foragers for the camp under the leading of L. Manlius Torquatus a Lieutenant, were compassed about by the enemy: then Scipio the Pro-pretor came forth of the camp to succour and rescue them, and that the Umbrians who first had the better, afterwards when the battle was renewed, suffered the foil and were overcome, and that as well their prisoners as their booty was taken from them. But more probable it is, that this overthrow was given by the Gauls, then the Umbrians; for that as divers times afore, so that year especially the City was frighted with the tumults and risings of the Gauls. Upon this defeat, over and besides, that both the Consuls were gone to war with four legions, and a great power of Cavalry of natural Romans, and a thousand horsemen of Cerusa, chosen out of purpose for that war, and sent unto them, with a greater power also of Allies, and of Latins then of Romans: there were two other armies not far from the City of Rome, opposed to frontier and made head against Tuscanum: the one in the Faliscian territory, the other in the Vatican, Cn. Fulvius and L. Posthumius Megellus, both Pro-pretors, were commanded to keep a standing camp in those parts. But the Consuls by this time, having passed over the mountain Apenninus, were come to the enemies within the country of the Sentinates. And there about four miles off, they lay then down and encamped. Then the enemies, after much consultation, resolved in the end upon this point: not to be intermingled all in one camp, nor come into the field and hazard all their forces at once in one battle: But that the Gauls should take the Samnites unto them, and the Umbrians join with the Tuscans. The day of the battle was appointed. The Gauls and Samnites had the charge to maintain the fight: and in the time of battle the Tuscans and Umbrians were commanded to assault the camp of the Romans. But these their designs and purposes were altered by reason of three Clusian fugitive traitors, who by night stole away privily unto the Consul Fabius, and disclosed the intents and enterprise of the enemies: who were sent away with rich rewards, to the end that every hour, upon new plots and devices that should be determined by the enemies, they would give them an inkling and certain intelligence. The Consuls write unto Fulvius and Posthumius, that the one should advance and come forward with his army, out of the Faliscian country: and the other out of the Vatican directly unto Clusum: and that with all their forces, they should overrun and destroy the enemies country. The rumor of these roads & invasions, caused the Tuscans to remove out of the Sentinel territory, to the defence of their own frontiers. Hereupon the Conibls made speed to strike a battel in their absence. And for two dayes space they skirmished continually with the enemy, and challenged him to the field; but for those two days, no worthy deed of importance was achieved. A few on both sides were slain, and hereby were their courages rather provoked, and their stomachs whet to a full red battell than any real or hazard made of the main chance. Upon the third day into plain field they come with all their power. When both armies flood ranged in battel array, there fortuned a Hind to be chaled out of the mountains, and to run away before a Wolf, even through the midit of the plains between both armies: then, parted both these wild beasts asunder, the Hind took her way to the Gauls, and the Wolf his course to the Romans. The Wolf had way given him through all the ranks and files; but the Hind was killed among the Gauls.

Then a Roman souldier, one of the forefront, who was to fight before the Enigms: There will the flight (quoth he) there will the slaughter be, where you see the beast sacred and dedicated to Diana cleare away! but here on this part, the martial Wolf, consecrated to Mars, having with victory gone clear dead by fate and unwounded hath put us in mind of our martial Nation and of our founder, the son of Mars. The Gauls put themselves in the right wing, the Samnites in the left. A gainst the Samnits, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point: and Decius, against the Gauls, Fabius marshalled the first and third Legions, in the right point: and Decius, the fifth and sixth in the left, affront the Gauls. For the second and fourth served in Samnium under L. Volturcius Pro-consul. At the first shock and encounter, the battell was so indifferently fought, and with so equal force, that if the Tuscans and Umbrians had either shewed themselves in the field, or assailed the camp, the loss and overthrow must needs have light in either place, whereas they had bent their forces. Howbeit, although hitherto the conflict of battell went equal and indifferent, and that as yet fortune had not determined, which way the world en-line and give the victory; yet they sought not alike, in the right and left wings. For the Romans under the conduct of Fabius, rather warded the enemy warily, and stood upon their guard, then offered to charge lustily: so as they maintained fight, and drew it at length untiltill was very late in the evening, because the Captain was enforced and periwaded of the Samnits and Gauls both, that being as they were in the first skirmish, very hot and furious, it was sufficient to keep off at length and at last end. As for the Samnits, their courages would abate and fail, by any long conflict: and the bodies of the Gauls, who of all other can least away with travel, & heat especially would turn all at sweat, & melt away: who at the beginning, fight more fiercely then men; but in the end more faintly then women. Against that time therefore, when the enemy used to fail & give over, Fabius had kept his soldiers in breath, & reserved their strength fresh & lusty. But Decius being very eager & hot by reason of his youth and courage of heart, laid on lustily at the first, and spent upon the enemies all the force & vigor he had: and for that the Infantry seemed to fight but coldly, he led the Cavalry awork: and himself personally in the thickest throng and troop of most valiant and hardy Knights, exhorted and bellowed the foremost gallants of those lusty youths, to join with him & to charge upon the enemy saying that they should carry away a double honour if by the means of the men of arms, the victory began at the left wing. Twice they forced the Gauls horsemen to turn side and back: but when as they were engaged farther within, and were now fighting hard pell mell among the squadrons of the horse, some of them armed upon chariot & wagons, with great noise of their steeds, and rumbling of the wheels, ran full upon them & mightily frighted the horses of the Romans which had not been acquainted with such uncouth & strange noises. So the horsemen who had the upper hand before, & were at point of victory, were now with a foul fear discomfited and cattered, as if the hideous furies of hell, & the devil himself had been amongst them. Whereupon they fled suddenly & not looking before them were overthrowen both men & horse. By this occasion the ensigns of footmen were distressed & disordered, and many of those that were ranged in the front before the ensigns, were by force of horse & wagons driven cross'trough the battalions, rodden under foot, and their guts squashed out. Herewithall the battail ions of the Gauls footmen, seeing their enemies thus scared followed on apace, & gave them no time of breathing. Decius cried out aloud to his men, Whether lie ye? Or what hope have ye to save your selves by flight? Decius opposed himself against them that retreated and fled: Decius rallied those that were disbanded and cattered: but seeing that by no force or means he could flay them, thus amazed & affrighted as they were: he called upon his father P. Decius by name and said: Why do I stay any longer the fatal death that is destined to my house & name? It is given to our race & family, to be the first inlien of propitiatory sacrifices for to assuage & save the publick weal from dangers menaced & threatened unto it. Even now therefore, will I offer the legions of the enemies to be sacrificed "with my self to Dame Tellus and other infernal gods. When he had spoken these words, he commanded M. Curius the high Priest (whom as he marched into the field, he straightly had charged not to depart from him) for to pronounce and say that form of words, whereby he should devote, offer, and betake himself to death, together with the legions of the enemies, for to save the army of the Quirits and people of Rome. Which when he had done by the same form of prayer and in the same habit wherein his father P. Decius at the river Volturnus, in the war against the Latins, caused himself to be offered to death: and besides these solemn prayers, added moreover these words: That he drive before him Fight, Flight, Murder, Massacre, Bloodshed, Ire and Wrath of gods in Heaven, & fiends in Hell: and that he would with deadly maledictions and execrable curses imite the enemies weapons, and armors of his enemies; and that one and the same place, should give both himself, and also the Gauls and Samnites together with him, plague, perdition, and destruction. After these cursed, horrible, and execrable speeches against his own perion and his enemies: look where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thither he spurred his horse, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently slain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battle was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans so soon as they had lost their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to finite a terror into them) flayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battle afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troop which rood about the Coſ, his body, fared as though they had been out of their wits, flang their darts from them (I know nothow) to no purpose, and in vain: ſome of them flood still, as it were benumbed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight ſtill. But on the other ſide the high Prieſt Lepidus, with whom Decius had left the ſergeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propretor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Coſ, were acquit and excuſed from all other fatal danger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnites, they were deſtined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal ſpirits. And now Decius (quoſe he) haled after him, and called to follow him, the army that with him was devoted, cursed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of injuries and fearful fright. Then, as these affairs began the skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Cornelius Scipio, and C. Marius with a supply of incoors from the rearward: who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul, were sent to aid and relieve his Colleague. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all hazards in the service of their country and Common-wealth. Therefore, when as the Gauls flood close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deal with them affront, and to cope together at hand strokes, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter: then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay strewn upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavoiſe or tortoise-ſenſe of the enemies targets aboveſaid. And by reason that these javelins and spears light and fluck fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies it hapned that their knot was broken, and the battalion (as huge and close as it was) disbanded, in such sort, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fell down asstoned one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the caſe, and changed all in the left wing of the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is beforeſaid) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when as he perceived, that neither the enemies shouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanked, had the same vigor and force, as before: he commended the Captains of the horsemen to wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnites, that upon a ſignal given, they might charge them overthrow with all the violence they could, whilst his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and diſordered the enemy. When he ſaw once, no reſiſtance made, and that without all doubt, they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his ſubſidiary companies of the rereguard, which he had reſerved until that time and buſineſs, fresh and in heart: and at once, both let forward the Legions, and gave the horsemen also a ſignal to ſet upon the enemies. But the Samnites could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp ſafe by the battalion of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-ſenſe, flood thick and close together under it. Then Fabius adverted of the death of his brother Consul, commanded a wing or Cornet, to the number almost of 500, horsemen of Capua to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to caſt about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he cauſed the Principes of the third Legion to follow: and whereſoever they eſpied the ranks of the enemies by force of horsemen diſordered and broken, there, to ſecond them, and preſs on ſtill, and kill them whilst they were in diſarray, and afraid. Himſelf owed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the ſpoils of his enemies. Which done, he advanced ſtraight forward to the camp of the Samnites. Thither all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and diſarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive ſo great a multitude, crowding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reaſon of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gellius Egnatius, the General of the Samnites was ſtruck down and ſlain: after this, the Samnites beaten within their rampart, were killed every one, and their camp after ſmall reſiſtance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were ſlain of enemies five and twenty thousand, and 8000 taken priſoners. Howbeit, this victory coſt the Romans blood: for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000, and of Fabius, 1200. Fabius then having ſent out to ſeek out the body of his Colleague, gathered up all the ſpoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Conſul his body be ſeen. by reaſon it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his ſouldiers. Then Fabius ſetting all other matters for the time aſide, ſolemnized the burial and funeral obſequies of his fellow Conſul, with due commendation and condigne praifes, and with all honor that could be deviſed.

In Tuſcany alſo about the ſame time, Cn. Fulvius Propretor, had ſome ſucceſs to his hearts deſire: for beſides great damage done to the enemy, by invaſions & rodes into the country, he fought alſo also a notable battel: wherein of Perufins and Clufins were ſlain above 3000, and twenty enſigns won. The Samnites, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enſlaved: and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battel that was fought in the Sentine territory, if a man hold him on 'y to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But ſome have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330, foot, and 40000, horſe ſtrong: alſo, that they had a thouſand chariots or waggon, reckoning and comprizing the Umbrians and Tuſcans withal: who alſo (as they ſay) were at the battel. And to create alſo the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volturnius Propretor, was a Commander, together with the Conſuls, and that his army was joined with the Legions of the Conſuls. But find in moſt Chronicles, that this victory was achieved by the two Conſuls only. Volturnius in the meantime warred in Samnium, and having forced and driven the army of the Samnites, to take the hill Tiferum, nothing alſo for the diſadvantage of the place, diſcomfited them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having left the army of Decius behind him in Tuſcany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tuſcans, and Samnites. His ſouldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military rhymes and ſongs, celebrated no leſs the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the illuſt and event, as well publick as privat, with the praifes of his ſon. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the ſouldiers had given unto them * 82 Aſſes apiece, with a livery cloak, and coats a good reward for a ſouldiers ſervice in thoſe days.

For all these notable victories achieved, yet neither the Samnites nor the Tuſcans were at quiet. For, both the Perufins began to rebel, ſo ſoon as the Conſul had away his army: and alſo the Samnites came down to forrage and ſpoil into the territory of Vulturnum and Formicum, and another way into Eſternium, which lie along the river Vulturnus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, ſent with Decius his army. And Fabius in Tuſcany, which began new war, four thousand and five hundred Perufins, took priſoners 1740, who were ransomed for * 30. Aſſes a piece. The reit of the ſpoil was all beſtowed upon the ſouldiers. The Legions of the Samnites being purſued hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volturnius Proconſul, met all together in the territory of Stellum. Where both the Samnite Legions abode, and alſo Appius and Volturnius joined and encamped together. There was a ſharp and cruel battel fought on both ſides. The Romans were incited with anger and choler againſt thoſe that had ſo often rebelled: the other, upon a deſperate mind were reſolute to hazard the utmoſt. So there were ſlain of the Samnites, 16300; 2700, taken priſoners; and of the Romans there died two thousand ſeven hundred.

This year ſo fortunate in war, was by reaſon of peſtilence much afflicted: and for certain prodigious tokens, full of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the army of Appius Claudius there were many ſtricken & blaſted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were pruned and taught into. The ſame year Q. Fabius Gurgens, the Conſul his ſon, fined and puniſhed by the people, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adultery: of which money ſo raiſed by their fines, he cauſed to be built the Temple of Venus, which ſtandeth near the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnites, whereof we have now continued our hiſtory in theſe four books, for the ſpace of fix and ſixty years, ever ſince that M. Valerius, and An. Cornelius were Conſuls, who were the firſt that warred in Samnium. To let paſs therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrowes given and received between both nations ſo many years one after another, for all which calamities and loſſes their hearts and courages could not be daunted or conquered: the very laſt year, the Samnites, in the Sentine country, in the Pelign territory, at Tiferum, and in the territory of Stellum, were defeated both by themſelves, with their own legions, and alſo mingled with others; and that, by four armies, and four Roman Captains: loſt the bravest and moſt noble General of all their nation: ſaw their confederates and allies in war, the Tuſcans, Umbrians, and Gauls, in the ſame predicament as themſelves, nor able to ſtand and maintain their eſtate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of foreign forces; yet for all this, would they not obtain from war, ſo little weary they were of defending their liberty, although it were unfortunately choſen rather, to be vanquiſhed, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it ſtrife, and tedious, either to write or read this long ſuit and train of wars, which in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, ſucceeded Conſuls L. Poſthumius Megillas and M. Atilius Regulus. To them both, was committed charge of Samnium, for that the bruit went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuſcany, the ſecond to invade and over-run afreſh the territory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Poſthumius by reaſon of ſickneſs remained at Rome, but Atilius went preſently with an army forth, to the end that he might ſurprize the enemies on a ſudden in Samnium, before they had taken the field: for ſo the Senat had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been ſo of purpoſe before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance and ſo far off were they from waſting the lands of the Samnites, that they could not once enter into their

both himself, and also the Gauls and Samnites together with him, plague, perdition, and destruction. After these cursed, horrible, and execrable speeches against his own perion and his enemies: look where he saw the thickest ranks of the Gauls, thither he spurred his horie, and rode in amongst them: where amidst the pikes, javelins, and swords, he was presently slain. Then could it hardly be seen, that the battel was any longer fought by power and help of man. The Romans so soon as they had lost their Captain, (which at all other times is wont to incite a terror into them) flayed their flight, and were willing and contented to renew the battel afresh. The Gauls, and especially that troop which stood about the Col, his body, fared as though they had been out of their wits, flung their darts from them (I know not how) to no purpose, and in vain: some of them stood still, as it were benumbed, forgetting both to run away, and to fight still. But on the other side the high Priest Lipius, with whom Decius had left the sergeants, and whom before his death he nominated and ordained to be Propetor, cried out, as loud as he could, that the Romans had the victory, and by the death of the Col, were acquitted and excused from all other fatal danger: but as for the Gauls and the Samnites, they were destined and forfeited (as it were) to mother Tellus and the infernal spirits. And now Decius (quoth he) hailed after him and called to follow him, the army that with him was dewowed, cursed, and offered: now all the enemies are full of sorries and fearful fright. Then, as these aloft began the skirmish again, behold there came unto them, Corneius Scipio, and C. Marcius with a supply of succours from the rearward: who by commandment of Q. Fabius the Consul, were sent to aid and rescue his Colleague. Where they heard of the worthy end of P. Decius, a noble example to encourage them to adventure all hazards in the service of their country and Common-wealth. Therefore, when as the Gauls stood close and thick together, opposing their targets before them, ranged and joined one over another featherwise, so, as to deal with them asfront, and to cope together at hand strokes, was thought a difficult and dangerous matter: then, by the commandment of those two Lieutenants, the darts and lances which lay strewn upon the ground, between the two armies, were gathered up, and flung against the pavilions or tortoise-fence of the enemies targets aboveaid. And by reason that their javelins and spears light and stuck fast, some in their targets, and some in their very bodies, it hapned that their knot was broken, and the battalion (as huge and close as it was) disbanded in such sort, as many of them, notwithstanding their bodies were untouched and unhurt, fell down astoned one upon another. Lo how fortune altered the case, and changed all in the left wing of the Romans. But in the right, Fabius (as is beforeaid) at the first, lingered and drew on the day: but afterwards, when as he perceived, that neither the enemies shouts, nor their manner of giving charge, nor yet the darts and javelins which they lanked, had the same vigor and force, as before he commanded the Captains of the horsemen to wheel about with their Cornets, and to flank the Samnites, that upon a signal given, they might charge them overthwart with all the violence they could, whilst his own Legionary footmen by little and little advanced forward, and brake the ranks and disordered the enemy. When he saw once, no resistance made, and that without doubt, they were wearied and out of breath: then he gathered together all his subsidiary companies of the rereguard, which he had reserved until that time and business, fresh and in heart: and at once, both let forward the Legions, and gave the horsemen also a signal to set upon the enemies. But the Samnites could not endure this violent charge, but ran as fast as ever they could to recover the camp left by the battalion of the Gauls, leaving their fellows behind them in fight to pay the reckoning. The Gauls having likewise made a target-fence, stood thick and close together under it. Then Fabius advertised of the death of his brother Consul, commanded a wing or Cornet, to the number almost of 500, horsemen of Capua, to withdraw themselves out of the conflict, to cast about and to play upon the backs of the Gauls: after whom, he caused the Principes of the third Legion to follow: and wheresoever they espied the ranks of the enemies by force of horsemen disordered and broken; there, to second them, and press on still, and kill them whilst they were in disarray, and afraid. Himself vowed a Temple to Jupiter Victor, together with the spoils of his enemies. Which done, he advanced straight forward to the camp of the Samnites. Thither all the multitude of them were driven in great fright and disarray. And for that the gates were not able to receive so great a multitude, crowding together, they that were kept out, and could not get in, by reason of the throng of their fellows, began again to fight under the rampart. Where Gaius Egnatius, the General of the Samnites was stricken down and slain: after this, the Samnites beaten within their rampart, were killed every one, and their camp after small resistance won. The Gauls behind their back were environed and cut in pieces. That day were slain of enemies five and twenty thousand, and 8000 taken prisoners. Howbeit, this victory cost the Romans blood: for of P. Decius his army, there died 7000, and of Fabius, 1200. Fabius then having sent out to seek out the body of his Colleague, gathered up all the spoils of the enemies into an heap, and burned them, to the honor of Jupiter Victor. But that day could not the Consul his body be seen, by reason it was covered and hidden under heaps of the Gauls that lay there dead. The morrow after it was found and brought again with many a tear of all his souldiers. Then Fabius setting all other matters for the time aside, solemnized the burial and funeral obsequies of his fellow Consul, with due commendation and condigne praises, and with all honor that could be devised.

In Tuscany also about the same time, Cn. Fulvius Propetor, had fortunate success to his hearts desire: for besides great damage done to the enemy, by invasions & rides into the country, he fought also also a notable battel: wherein of Perusins and Clusins were slain above 3000, and twenty ensigns won. The Samnites, as they fled through the territory of the Pelignians, were by them intercepted and enclosed: and of five thousand, they were left but one thousand. Great is the fame of that day, and of the battel that was fought in the Sentinate territory, if a man hold him on to the truth, and make no more of it than it was. But some have overreached a little, and written, that the enemies were 40330, foot, and 40000, horie strong: also, that they had a thousand chariots or waggons, reckoning and comprising the Umbrians and Tuicans withal: who also (as they say) were at the battel. And to encircle also the power and forces of the Romans, they report, that L. Volturnius Propetor, was a Commander, together with the Consuls, and that his army was joined with the Legions of the Consuls. But I find in most Chronicles, that this victory was achieved by the two Consuls only. Volturnius in the mean time warred in Samnium, and having forced and driven the army of the Samnites, to take the hill Tiferum, nothing afraid for the disadvantage of the place, discomfited them, and put them to flight. Q. Fabius, having led the army of Decius behind him in Tuscany, reduced his own legions into the City, and triumphed over the Gauls, Tuicans, and Samnites. His souldiers followed him in his triumph, who in their rude military times and songs, celebrated no less the brave and noble death of P. Decius, than the worthy victory of Quintus Fabius. And they revived the memorial of his father late deceased, comparing him in equal degree, for the ill and event, as well publick as privat, with the praises of his lion. Of the booty and pillage gained from the enemies, the souldiers had given unto them 82 Asles apiece, with a livery cloak, and coat of good reward for a souldiers service in those days.

For all these notable victories achieved; yet neither the Samnites nor the Tuicans were at quiet. For, both the Perusins began to rebel, so soon as the Consul had away his army: and also the Samnites came down to forrage and spoil into the territory of Perusins and Formianum, and another way into Ejternum, which lie along the river Volturnus. Against them was Appius Claudius the Pretor, sent with Decius his army. And Fabius in Tuscany, which began new war, slew four thousand and five hundred Perusins, took prisoners 1740, who were ransomed for 300 Asles a piece. The rest of the spoil was all bestowed upon the souldiers. The Legions of the Samnites being pursued hard at heels, partly by Appius Claudius Pretor, and partly by L. Volturnius Proconul, met all together in the territory of Stella. Where both the Samnit Legions abode, and also Appius and Volturnius joined and encamped together. There was a sharp and cruel battel fought on both sides. The Romans were incited with anger and choler against those that had so often rebelled: the other, upon a desperate mind were resolute to hazard the utmost. So there were slain of the Samnites, 16300; 2700, taken prisoners, and of the Romans there died two thousand seven hundred.

This year so fortunate in war, was by reason of pestilence much afflicted: and for certain prodigious tokens, full of care and perplexed. For it was reported, that in divers places it rained earth: and that in the army of Appius Claudius there were many lightning & blasted with lightning. In regard hereof, the books of Sibylla were pruned and sought into. The same year Q. Fabius Gurgus, the Consul his son, fined and punished by the people, certain wives who had been convicted and condemned before the people, of Adultery: of which money so raised by their fines, he caused to be built the Temple of Venus, which standeth near the Cirque or Race.

There remain yet behind certain wars of the Samnites, whereof we have now continued our history in these four books, for the space of six and forty years, ever since that M. Valerius, and An. Cornelius were Consuls, who were the first that warred in Samnium. To let pass therefore, and not to trouble the readers, with a prolix narration of the alternative overthrowes given and received between both nations for many years one after another, for all which calamities and losses in their hearts and courages could not be daunted or conquered: the very last year, the Samnites, in the Sentinate country, in the Peligns territory, at Tiferum, and in the territory of Stella, were defeated both by themselves, with their own legions, and also mingled with others; and that, by four armies, and four Roman Captains: lost the bravest and most noble General of all their nations: saw their confederates and allies in war, the Tuicans, Umbrians, and Gauls, in the same predicament as themselves, notable to stand and maintain their estate any longer, either by their own power, or with help of foreign forces; yet for all this, would they not obtain from war, so little weary were they of defending their liberty, although it was unfortunately choosing rather, to be vanquished, than not to attempt the winning of victory. Who is he, that would not think it irksome, and tedious, either to write or read this long list and train of wars, which they in fighting were never wearied?

After Q. Fabius and P. Decius, succeeded Consuls L. Posthumius Megillus, and M. Atilius Regulus. To them both, was committed charge of Samnium, for that the bruit went, that the enemies had prepared three full armies, the one to go again into Tuscany, the second to invade and over-run afresh the territory of Capua, and the third to defend their own frontiers. Posthumius by reason of sickness remained at Rome, but Atilius went presently with an army forth, to the end that he might surprize the enemies on a sudden in Samnium, before they had taken the field: for so the Senat had given direction: and he found the enemy in the way to meet him, as if it had been of purpose before by them determined, ready there to keep him from entrance and so far off were they from waiting the lands of the Samnites, that they could not once enter into their their confines: nay, the Samnites debarred them from departure thence, into the peaceable parts, and territories of their allies. Now when as they were encamped affront one against another: that, which the Romans being so often conquerors, would hardly have adventured, (see how under despair driveth men to rash projects and extremities) the Samnites attempted: even to give assault upon the Romans camp. And albeit this to venturous enterprise sped not well in the final effect, yet was it not altogether in vain attempted. There chanced to be a foggy mist, which continued a good part of the day, to thicken and palpable, as men could not see before them: I say not, so far as without the trench, but not so much as those that came close to speak one to another. The Samnites hereupon taking the advantage fit for an ambushment, before it was full day light, and the same much overcast and dim with the mist, came as far as the Corps de guard of the Romans, who in the gates and entrance of the camp guarded but negligently: being thus taken on a sudden, they had neither courage nor strength enough to resist. At the back-side of the camp, they assaulted the great gate Decumanam, seized the Questors pavilion, and that quarter about it where the Questor or himself (L. Opimius Pansa) was slain, and thereupon the alarm was given. The Co, being with this tumult raised, commanded two bands or cohorts of allies, to wit the one of Lucanians, and the other of Suessians, which haply were next hand, to defend and guard the Pretors pavilion, and that quarter. In the mean while he marched with the legionary bands along the high broad street in the camp, called Principalle, and before they had buckled and fitted their armor about them, they were ranged in battle array; and had knowledge of the enemy, by the ear and oncries, rather then by the sight of the eye: neither could they give an estimate what number they were. At the first, as doubtful of the event, and mistrusting their fortune, they retreated, and received their enemies in, and let them come even into the midst of the camp: but then the Consul cried out, and asked, Whether they meant to be turned out of their own ramparts and holds first, and after have a new piece of work to assail and win them again? So, they set up a shout, and put all their might together, and first made resistance only and kept their ground: but afterwards they set forward, and pressed upon them: and having once beat them back, they drove them afore them: with the same fear, that they themselves began, they, and chased them out of the gate and the trench: but to proceed further, for to pursue the chase, they durst not, for fear of some ambushment, by reason of the misty and troubled weather, concerning themselves with the saving of their camp and no more: and so they retired within their ramparts having slain to the number welnear, of three hundred enemies. Of Romans, as well they that were in the first Corps de guard and Sentinels, who kept the watch, as of those that were surprised about the Questors lodging, were killed 250. This bold adventure of the Samnites proceeding so well, made them take bolder heart: so as they would not permit the Romans to encamp farther into the Country, nor so much, as to go a foraging into their territory: whereupon they were compelled to retire again, and to purvey forage in the quiet and peaceable quarters of their friends about Sora.

The bruit of all these occurrences more troublesome and fearful then truth was, being come to Rome, caused L. Posthumius the Co, before he was well recovered of his sickness, to take the field: but ere he departed the City, he proclaimed the Rendezvous at Sora, for his soldiers there to meet. Himself now dedicated unto the goddess Vittoria, the Temple, which in the time of his Consul's Edification he took order to be built, with the money raised of certain fines taken of persons condemned. Then took he his journey to the army, and so went forward from Sora directly into Samnium, to the camp of his brother Consul. But the Samnites distrustful themselves, as not able to withstand two armies, were dislodged, and departed back: and the Consuls also parted one from another, sundry ways, to waste the country, and assault the towns. Posthumius at this first coming, assayed by meer force to assail the town Milunia, and seeing he could do small good that way, at length by rolling trenches and platforms, he approached close to the walls, and waned it: albeit the town were thus forced, yet there continued a sharp and long fight in all respects and parts thereof, from the fourth hour of the day until the eighth, with doubtful and variable events for a good while: but in the end the Romans became masters of the town. Of Samnites were slain 3200 and 4100, were taken prisoners: besides the gaining of other booty and pillage. From thence, he led forth the legions to Ferentinum, but the inhabitants with their bag and baggage, and all that ever they could drive or carry, had quit the town in the still night season, and departed in great silence at a contrary postern gate, which opened from the camp of the enemy. The Consul so soon as he was come, at the first approached the walls, as well appointed and provided of all things, as if he should have found as much to do, as at Milunia: but afterwards, perceiving all silent and desolate throughout the City, seeing neither munition within the towers and upon the walls: he held back his soldiers, desirous and greedy to enter upon the bare walls, so abandoned and disarmed of defence: and doubting to fall headlong ere he were aware, into the trains of some hidden and privy ambush, he commanded two Coets of the Cavalry of Latine confederates, to ride about the walls about the counter-carp, and well to view and consider all places. The horsemen finding one or two gates near together standing wide open, and in the very same ways that led from thence, the fresh tracks and footing of the enemies, as they fled by night, rode softly nearer and nearer to the gates: and there they might see straight afore them safe entrance, and the City lying open even from one end to the other: whereupon they brought word back to the Consul, that the City was abandoned, and the enemies

A enemies gone: which was very evident and apparent, as well by the very solitude thereof, as the new and fresh marks and traces of their dislodging and departure: as also by the stuff and goods that lay here and there scattered all abroad, whiles they halted fearfully in the dark, to take their flight. The Consul upon this report, with his host drew to that side of the town, which the horsemen were at: and pitching down his ensigns not far from the gate, commanded five other horsemen to enter into the City: giving order, that when they had gone forward a pretty way, three of them should stay behind in the same place, if they saw all safe and out of danger: and the other two, bring him word what they had seen and found. Who being returned, made relation that they were gone so far as they might see about them every way into all parts, & could perceive nothing but silence and vast desolation all about, both far and near: then forthwith, the Consul entered the City, with certain cohorts lightly appointed, and charged the rest in the mean while to fortify the camp. The soldiers being once entered, felt to break open the doors: where they found a few silly old folk, and some feeble and diseased persons, with such moveables as were hard to be conveyed and transported: those they rifled, and ranlack: and by certain captives they understood, that divers other towns thereabout, were all with one accord fled and gone: and as for their own countrymen, they departed at the first watch of the night, and they thought no other verily but that in the rest of the Cities, they should find the like emptiness and solitude. And as the prisoners said, so it proved indeed: and the Consul possessed himself of those forlorn and abandoned towns.

C The other Consul M. Attilius, had so calie war for his part: who as he was marching with his Legions toward Luceria, which he heard was besieged by the Samnites: the enemy encountered and met him in the very entry of the frontiers, and gave him battle: and the anger and indignation on both parts, but the end and issue more heavy and dolorous on the Romans side: both because they were not wiled to be vanquished; and also for that in the very loose and retreat, rather then in combat and skirmish, they found that many more were hurt and slain of their part. Which fearful sight and terror, as it began in the camp, if it had surprized them in the conflict, it would have been an heavy day with them, & no doubt they had received a notable overthrow. And even then, being as it was, they had a careful night, and full of anguish, thinking verily that the Samnites would presently assault their camp, or at leastwise that in the morning betimes they must of necessity fight with the conquerors. But the enemies, as their loss was less, so their heart and courage was never the more: For so soon as the day brake, desirous were they to be gone without any battle. Howbeit there was but one way, & that lay close and near to their enemies: which they were not so soon entered into, but they made shew a far off, as if they marched straight to the assault of the camp. The Consul commanded his men to arm, and to follow after him without the ramparts. To his Lieutenants, Colonels and Captains of the Allies, he gave several charges to do as he thought needful and requisite. They all promised to execute any direction whatsoever; but they said withal, that their soldiers hearts were done, that they had watched and sit up all night, amongst the grievous wounds and uncomfortable groans of them that lay a dying: and no doubt if the enemy had come before day against the camp, so dunned were they, that they would have abandoned their colours: and even now for very shame and nothing else, they forbore indeed to run away, but otherwise their hearts were gone, and they clean spent. The Consul hearing this, thought good to go about himself in person, unto every one of his soldiers, and to speak unto them: and even as he met with any of them, and saw them so backward, and going about so coldly to take arms and weapon in hand: he checked and rebuked them crying aloud, and asking why they far still? why they loitered and made such delay? saying, that the enemies would come to them within the very camp, and cut their throats, unless they made more haste to follow forth: yea, and forced they should be to fight before their tent doors: if they would not give battle without the trench and ramparts. They that are armed (saith he) and will fight manfully, shall obtain undoubted victory: but the unarmed and naked man that attendeth the enemies coming, must either die for it, or endure captivity. As he rated and rebuked them in their tears, they answered flatly against that they had enough of yesterdays work, and were utterly done: and had neither strength nor blood left them in their bodies: and now the enemies (say they) seem more in number then they were the day before. Amid these speeches the army approached and being now but a little way off they might take a full view of them more certainly, and see every thing. Whereupon they said confidently, that they saw the Samnites to bring with them their flasks and pales to call a palliasedo, no doubt, round about their whole camp. At this, the Consul cried out upon them for very shame to suffer so foul a reproach and disgrace of a most dastardly enemy. And shal we be (quoth he) beset and encamped within our own camp, there to die for hunger and famine with shame, rather then by edge of sword (if there be no other remedy) with honor like men? G The gods speed us well (quoth he) and their will be done: and to every man as he thinks best: assist M. Attilius the Consul, he is resolved even himself alone (if no man else will follow) to meet the enemy in the face, and rather be beaten down and die amongst the Samnites ensigns, than see the Roman camp besieged with trench cast, and rampart rifled about it. The Lieutenants Colonels, and all the bands and Coroners of the Cavalry: yea, and the principal Centurions of the foremost companies liked well of this, and accepted the Consul his words. Then the soldiers for stark shame, full faintly take weapon in hand and as slowly. God woe go forth of camp. And thus in long ranks and files: not close united together but broken here and there, with heat vy cheer, and as men half vanquished already, they marched after a sort toward the enemy, who was neither in hope nor in heart better resolved and settled then they. For so soon as the Samnites discovered the Roman Standards, suddenly from the vanguard to the rearward, there was a muttering and bruit from one to another, that the Romans were come forth (the only thing they always feared) to encompass and stop their passage, so as now there was no way for them to fly and escape from them, and save themselves, but must either die in the place, or slay their enemies and make a land even over their bodies. All their packs and fardels, they cast together upon an heap in the midst: and being armed as they were, every man ranged and marshalled themselves in their own arrays. Now was there a very little space between the two armies, and they stood looking one upon another, waiting when their enemies would begin to give the first charge, and set up the first shout. But neither of both had any stomack to fight. And surely on both sides, they had gone sundry ways untouched, and without any blows given or taken, but that they feared both, lest if they had dismarched of one part first, the other would have come upon them. Thus of themselves they began a faint fight, as unwilling and loath thereto, with an uncertain and unequal shout: neither stirred any man one foot. Then the Roman Consul, to begin the skirmish, sent out some few Cornets of horsemen from a side, without the battalions: whereof the most part fell from their horses, and others were disarrayed and put out of order: whereupon both Samnites ran out to kill those that were fallen, and Romans also to rescue their fellows. Then the skirmish began a little to wax hot: but the Samnites advanced forward in greater number far, and bestirred themselves (as it seemed) more lustily: and withal, the Roman horsemen being disordered and in confusion, with their horres affrighted trod under their feet the footmen that came to rescue. Who beginning once to flee, caused the whole Roman army also to turn their backs. And now the Samnites played upon the backs of the Romans, as they fled: whereat the Consul rode before a gallop to the camp gate, where he bestowed a good corps de guard of horsemen, opposite in the way: and made proclamation, that whosoever came toward the camp, were he Samnite or were he Roman, should be taken and used as an enemy. With these and such like threats, he put himself against the soldiers, that marched so fast in heaps to the camp. Whither away strah, (quoth he to every soldier that he met) even here shalt thou find men in arms to fight withal: here shalt thou meet with thine enemy, as well as in the field behind: no entering here into the camp without victory, so long as thy Consul liveth: chuse therefore whether thou hadst rather fight with thy own countrymen or thine enemies. Whiles the Consul entertained them with this welcome, the horsemen also with spear in rest, and bent full against them, came all about, charging the footmen upon their peril to turn again to battel. Thus for the only Consul his virtue and prowess served in good stead, but fortune also went on their side: not the Samnites followed not the chase so hard, but that the Romans had both time and ground enough to turn about their ensignes, and to direct their battalions from their camp against the enemy. Then one encouraged another to go to battel again. The Centurions snatched the banners out of the bearers hands, and advanced them forward: declaring to their soldiers, how few the enemies were in number, and how disorderly and out of all array they came against them. In this while the Consul lift up his hands to heaven, and with a clear and audible voice, vowed a Temple to Jupiter Stator, if so be the Roman army stayed their flight, and by renuing the conflict should kill and vanquish the Samnites Legions. Hereupon encouraged they on all hands, the Captain and soldier, both horsemen and footmen, to reinforce the battel. And even the very gods from heaven seemed to have a special regard of the Romans at that time, so quickly the dice turned, and the enemies were repulsed from the ramparts, and withina small while forced again to the very place where the battel began. Where by reason of their fardels and packs which they had heaped together in the midst, and now lay in their very way, they were stopped in their very passage, and for fear lest their goods should be rifled and spoiled, they cast a ring round about their bag and baggage. Then the Roman Infantry afront, and the Cavalry behind, compassed them, and charged upon them right fiercely: where in the midst between, they were either slain or taken. The prisoners were in number 7300, who were all put naked under the yoke, and sold: the number of them that were slain was about 4800. The Romans for all this had no great list to boast and brag of their victory, for the Consul taking view and account of his loss these two days, found by computation, that he missed 7300.

Whiles these things thus passed in Apulia, the Samnites with another power, stayed to surprize and get again Interamna, a Colony of the Romans: situate upon the Latine high-way: but when they could not be masters of the town, they overran and plundered the territory: and having got a good booty of men, women, and cattle, one with another: whiles they were driving the same before them, together with certain Colonies whom they had taken prisoners, they light upon Consul as he returned with victory from Luceria, where they not only lost their spoil, but were themselves slain as they marched disorderly in long files. The Consul made proclamation, That every man should repair to Interamna, for to own and challenge his own goods, and to receive the same again: and there leaving his army, went to Rome, against the Election of new Magistrates. When he laboured instantly for a triumph, he was denied that honor: both for that he had lost so many thousands, and also because he had put his captives under the gallows, and sold them without farther imposition.

The other Col. Posthumius, wanting subject matter of war to work upon among the Samnites, passed

A passed with his army into Tuscan: and after he had first pillied and spoiled the Volturnians territories, he gave them battel not far from their walls, who issued forth to defend their frontiers: where there were 2200, Tuscan slain: the rest, by reason that the City was so near, escaped and saved themselves. Then led his army into the territory of Rosellum, where he not only laid the fields waste, but won the town also: took prisoners above two thousand, and slew under two thousand before their walls. Howbeit, in that year, the peace obtained in Horatia, was more honorable and renowned then the war had been. For three of the strongest and most puissant States, even the very Capital Cities of Tuscany, to wit, Volsinii, Perusia, and Arretium, desired Accord. And having conditioned with the Consul, and promised, to find his soldiers clothing and corn, so they might have leave to send Orators to Rome to treat for peace. Obtained at length a truce of forty years. And for that present, each City was fined to pay 500000 Askes. For these acts done, the Consul having requested triumph of the Senat, for manner and fashion, rather then upon any hope to speed: and perceiving some of them to deny him that, as pretending, that it was so late ere he departed the City: and other some, for that without order and direction of the Senat, he passed out of Sammium into Tuscany; and that partly his adversaries, & partly the friends of his Collegue, who might take some comfort and contentment, that he also had the repulse with him, were against his triumph: My Masters (quoth he) you that are Senators of Rome, I will not be so far minded of your honor and majesty, as that I will forget my self to be a Consul: and by vertue of the same authority of commission, wherewith I have conducted and managed these wars: for so much as, I have happily brought them to end, and subdued Sammium and Tuscany, achieved victory, and obtained peace: triumph I will, and ask you no leave. And with that he departed out of the Senat. After this, there arose a debate and disension among the Tribunes of the Commons. Some of them said, they would enterpole their negative, that he should not in this manner triumph, and give to it a precedent. Others gave out, that they would assist him in his triumph, maugre the heads of all their Collegues. After much ado, the matter was referred unto the people, and the Consul being thither called, alledged, that L. Horatius, and Mar. Valerius Consuls, also Claudius Marcellus of late days, even the father of him, who then was Censor, triumphed without the authority and approbation of Senat, only by the ordinance of the people. Over and besides, he added and said, that himself also would have moved the people therein, but that he knew that the Tribunes of the Commons, who were become vassals and slaves to the Nobles, would have nipped and crossed the bill. As for himself, he protested, that he did and would account of the will and favour of the people, agreeing together, as well as of all their Acts and Decrees whatsoever. So the morrow after, by the assistance of three Trib. banded against the opposition and negative voices of seven yeas, and against the general resolution of the Senat, he triumphed: and all the people with great joy solemnized and celebrated the honor of that day. But the records do vary much about the acts and affairs of this year also. Claudius writeth, That Posthumius having won certain towns in Sammium, was after in Apulia discomfited and put to flight: and that himself in person being hurt, was with some few besides, driven to take Luceria for refuge: and that it was Attilius, that fought in Tuscany, and triumphed. Fabius contrarily reporteth, That both Consuls were won in Sammium, and at Luceria: and that one of the armies was transported into Tuscany: but which of the Consuls had the conduct thereof, he hath not set down withal: also, that before Luceria, there were on both parts many slain: and how in that battel, there was a Temple vowed to Jupiter Stator, like as Romulus had done before in times past: howbeit, before this time, there was no Temple erected, but only a Favum, [i. a place pronounced, destined, and consecrated before to build a Temple on.] But in this year at last, the City being now twice bound and obliged to perform one and the same vow, made a conscience of it, and moved the Senat to decree and take order, that the house and temple aforesaid should be edified accordingly.

After this year, there succeeded a brave and noble Consul, L. Papyrius Cursor, as well in regard of his fathers glory, as his own reputation. Also a mighty great war, and such a victory as never any General wan the like at the Samnites hands before that day, but L. Papyrius again the Consuls father. And as it fell out, they made the like preparation for war, with the same endeavor and furniture of most costly and brave armor, as before time. Moreover, they used the help and favor of the gods besides, by a strange kind of induction and institution of the soldiers, binding them to take their oath, after an old ceremonial custom, as it they were to take orders in some holy mysteries; yea, and levied musters throughout all Sammium, after a new form of a law and edict: That whosoever of the younger sort and serviceable men, fit to bear arms, shewed not themselves, and gave attendance at the Generals appointment and proclamation, and whosoever departed without his leave and licence, his head should be forfeit unto Jupiter as accursed and damned. Which one, the Renderer, was appointed at Aquilona, for all the forces to assemble. Where there gathered together, to the number of forty thousand fighting men, even the whole flower and manhood of Sammium. There, about the midst of the camp, was a plot of ground set out, well fenced and enclosed all about with hurdles and boards, and the same covered all over with linnen cloths: the place was two hundred foot square, every way. Then there was a solemn sacrifice celebrated, and divine service said, according to an order read out of an old book made of linnen, and the same by a certain Priest, one Ovius Pacinus, a very aged man: who avouched, that he set these sacred and holy ceremonies from the old ancient Religion of the Samnites, according to the manner and custom, which in times past their ancestors had used, at what time as they

complotted secretly and conspired, to surprise Capua out of the Tuscans hands, When the sacrifice was done, the General of the army by his Purfivant at arms, commanded to crie and call forth by name, the noblest persons, either for parentage, or ads achieved: who were brought into the place aforesaid, one by one. Amongst other preparations of this sacred solemnity [which] were able to strike a religious fear and devotion in a mans mind) there were certain altars erected in the midst of this place closely covered in all parts, and sacrifices lying slain all about, and the Centurions standing round with their swords ready drawn. Then the souldier was cauled to approach near the altars (like a sacrifice himself, rather then one that should have his part of the sacrifice) and urged by vertue of an oath, to promise, that he would never utter abroad and reveal, whatsoever he there should see or hear. Afterward he was put to iwear, after an horrible and dreadful form of words, framed and tending expressly to the cursing of his own person, his house and all his race and lineage, in case, he went not into any batel, whereoever the Generals should lead him, and if either himself fled out of the field, or saw any one to run away, and slew him not outright in the place. At the first verily, some there were that refused to take such an oath, and presently were massacred by the Altars side. And lying there along together with the beasts, which had their throats cut for sacrifices, they served for a warning, to teach all the rest how they made refusal. When the chief of the Samnits had taken this abominable and cursed oath, ten of them were elected and nominated by the sovereign Captain, who every one had in charge to chuse himself a fellow, and they likewise successively to take other to them, man by man, until they had made up the number of 16000. And these were called Lanceata Legio [i.e. the linen Legion] taking the name of the covering of that incloure, wherein the Nobility of the Samnits were i sworn. These had given unto them brave and glorious armor, with helmets crested and plumed, because they should seem taller then the rest. Another army there was, consisting of twenty thopland and better, who neither in goodly and tall personage, nor in martial prowels and reputations, nor yet in furniture and setting out, were inferior to the linen Legion aforesaid, Lo, what a number there was of fighting men, even the whole strength and manhood of all Samnium, assembled and encamped in Aquilona.

The Roman Consuls took their journey from the City of Rome, and C. Cæcilius first; unto whom were appointed the old Legions, which M. Attilius the Consul of the former year, had left in the territory of Interamna. And with them he marched into Samnium. And, mean while that the enemies were over much busied and amused about their superstitious ceremonies, and held their secret and mystical counsels, he won by force from the Samnits, the town Asperrimum. Where almost 2800 men were slain, and 4270 taken prisoners. But Papirius, having by direction from the Senat enrolled a new army, for the town Duronia; took fewer prisoners than his Colleague, but in lieu thereof, put many more to the sword. A rich booty there was got, both in the one place and the other. Afterwards the Consuls overran the whole country of Samnium, but they spoiled and wasted especially the lands about Atinum. Cæcilius marched as far as Cominium, and Papirius to Aquilona, where the whole power of the Samnits lay encamped. There, for a good while they neither sat still, and were at large, the idle in the camp, nor yet was there any hot service in the field. They spent the time in provoking them to fight, that gladly would have suten still; or in lying off and giving ground, to those that assailed them: and thus, I say, with threatening, rather then offering batel, they passed the day. For whiles they began even and anon, and gave over as quickly, there was no issue seen of any skirmishes, & the decision even of small matters and occurrents were prolonged and put off from day to day. The other camp of the Romans lay twenty miles off; and albeit the other Consul was absent, yet his hand and counsel was in every enterprise and exploit. For as there lay a greater weight and charge at Aquilona, then at Cominium: so Cæcilius was of more carefull eye that way, then to the place which himself besieged, L. Papirius being now at all points provided to fight, dispatched a messenger to his Colleague, to signify unto him: that he minded the next day, if he were not checked by the Auspices to give the enemy batel; and withal, that it was expedient and needful that he likewise should with all his forces assault Cominium: that the Samnits within, might have neither means nor leisure to send any succour to Aquilona. This post had that one day allowed him to do his message, and attend his dispatch; and by night he made return, and brought word unto the Consul from his Colleague, that he liked well of his purpose and advice. Papirius then immediately dismissed and sent away the courier aforesaid, and assembled his souldiers to an audience, where he discoursed at large concerning war in general. Much he spake also as touching the present preparation and magnificent furniture of the enemies, more brave and goodly for shew and ostentation then effectual and of importance in the end: "For they are not the plumed crests (quoth he) that give the deadly wounds, but the Romans spear and lance it is, that is able to pierce their gilded and damasked shields: yea, and that other glittering army with milk white and diaper coats must be died red in blood, when they come to strokes, and to try it out by dint of sword. The golden and silvered armies of the Samnits, were sometimes by my father put to the sword, and killed to the last man: and they served rather for rich spoils to honour the victorious enemy, then for armor of proof, to defend and save themselves. This is a fatal gift, and destined to our name and family, for to be chosen Generals, and to be opposed against the greatest puissance and attempts of the Samnits, and to bring away with them, those spoils which might be ornaments to beautifie the publick places of the City. And the immortal gods

"no doubt are present to defend and assist us in our quarrel, against those that so oft have fought for peace and alliance, and as often broke the same themselves. And if a man may conjecture and guess of the will and providence of the Gods, they never were to any army more adverse and full of indignity, then to that, which being stained and polluted with the blood of beasts and men, massacred and mingled together in an horrible and execrable kind of sacrifices and devotions, vowed to a double anger of the gods, having in dread and horror of one side, the vengeance of the same gods, witnesses off their breach of covenants with the Romans; and on the other side the detretable and abominable curses, comprised in an oath, taken against all covenant and promise; hath i sworn by constraint and perforce: hateth and detesteth the oath whereby they are perjured, and at one time, is in fear of the gods, of their own selves, and their enemies. Thus having shewed unto his souldiers (who were already of themselves badly and maliciously enough bent against the enemies) that he had certain intelligence of all these things, by the constant report and verified by certain fugitives that were fled from them unto him; they all being now full of assured hope of Gods help and mans, with one uniform cry called for batel: and nothing grieved them more then this, That it was put off until the morrow; hating in their hearts the reit of that day behind, and that one night, for being so long. About mid-night, Papirius having received letters back from his Colleague, gat him up cloley when all were fast asleep, and sent the chick-matter to take token, & observe the presage of the pullets. There was not one throughout the whole camp of what quality or degree soe'er but had a desire to fight. The highest as well as the lowest were earnest and eager: the Captains might behold and see the souldiers affection and courage that way, and the souldier likewise the Captains; in so much that the same ardent desire of batel which was in all the rest, reached also even to those that had the charge of the Auspices. For when as the chickens would not peck, the chick-matter advertised to lye and falsifie the token, and made report to the Consul, that it was a Tripudium fulgurimum. Whereat the Consul first glad and joyous, pronounced that the token was lucky, and that they were to fight under the favour and conduct of the gods: and hereupon he put forth the signal or bloody banner or batel. As he was now marching forth into the field with his army, beheld a fugitive out of the enemies camp, brought word, that twenty cohorts or companies of Samnits, and those were about 400 in a cohort, were gone to Cominium. And because his Colleague Cæcilius should not be ignorant hereof, he presently dispatched a courier in post unto him, and himself commanded the Ensigns and Standards to be advanced and set forward with speed, ordaining the bands in the reward for succours, and disposing them in divers places, with Captains over the same, accordingly. He appointed L. Volturnus to lead the right wing, and L. Scipio the left, and the horsemen he committed to the conduct of two other Lieutenants, C. Cedennus, and Trebonius. As for Sp. Nautius, he charged him in all haste to take off the pack-fiddles from the Mules, and to mount the cohorts of the light armed footmen that serve in the wings, upon their backs, and with them to fetch a compass, and to seize upon any hill there in sight, and in the heat of the conflict, to shew himself from thence, and to raise as great a cloud of dust as possibly he could. While the General was occupied hereabout, there arose some warbling amongst the chicken-masters touching the Auspice or presage of that day: in so much as they were over-heard of the Roman horsemen; who supposing it a matter of good consequence and to be regarded, advertised Sp. Papirius (the Consuls Nephew, or Brothers Son) that there was some doubt and question about the Auspice. The youth born in those days when there were no Atheists, nor Lecturers read of despising God and Religion; enquired farther into the matter, because he would not certify any thing whereof he was not sure: and when he had found out the truth, gave knowledge thereof to the Consul: who said thus unto him, "God blest thee my son, and be not thou dismayed therat, but fight hardly more valiantly, and do thy best endeavour. As for him that has the charge and oversight of the Birds and Auspice, if he have made a wrong report, and given up a contrary presage, or false sign, all the mischief and peril light upon his own head for his lewd life. As for me I was told of a Tripudium, and that the birds fell heartily to their meat: and I hold it for a lucky Auspice and token of good success unto the people of Rome and the army, and for no other. This said, he commanded the Centurions to set those pullets on, in the forefront of the batel. The Samnits also for their part set forward their Ensigns, and their battalions follow after gallantly let out in gorgeous armor and brave apparel, in such fort, as the very sight of the enemies represented a magnificent and stately shew to the beholders. But see what happened: before the first shout given, before the first volley of shot and encounter, the principal Pulletier chanced to be stricken with a javelin, lanced at adventure and at random, and fell down dead even before the Ensigns. Which being reported unto the Consul, "Behold the handy work of God (quoth he) the gods are present in this batel, the guilely person hath his due reward. And as the Consul was speaking these words, lo, before him a Raven let out a wide clear throat, and cried with a loud nois that which was more evident, the God, rejoiced, and avowed, that the gods appeared never in mens affairs more evidently. And herewith he commanded the trumpets to sound, and to set up a lusty shout: then followed a cruel and terrible fight on both sides, but with hearts and courages far unlike. The Romans were ravished and carried on end to the batel, with anger, hope, and heat of conflict greedy of bathing their swords, and embreuing their hands in the enemies bloodshed. But the Samnits many of them by force of necessity, and constraint of a blind and superstitious religion, even against their wills, were forced to make resistance, and defend themselves rather then to fight and offend the enemy. Neither had they sustained and held out the first shout, charge and shock of the Romans (as having now for certain years past been used ever more to go away defeated and vanquished) but that a mightier fear imprinted and settled in their heart roots, held them perform from running away: for they ever had continually repented in their eye, the whole furniture of that secret sacrifice: of those armed sacrificers and Priests with naked swords that hideous butchery of men and of brute beasts, lying slain one with another in their blood intermingled together: of the Altars besprikled and stained with the lawful shedding of the one, and the detestable effusion of the other: of the dreadful and horrible execrations and to conclude, of that frantic, furious, and detestable form of words, composed and devised to the detestation and malediction of their line and race. Being fast bound, I say, with these bonds for fleeing away, they stood to it, and turned not back, fearing their own countrymen more than the enemies. The Romans from both points, and from the middle and main battalion charged boldly, beat them down, killed and cut them in pieces, thus amazed and astonished as they were with dread of gods and awe of man. Small resistance made they, as who only feared to flee and run away: so as by this time, there was execution and havoc made of them almost to the very standards. At which very instant, there appeared overhead from the one side a dust, as if a mighty army had failed it to their march: namely, Sp. Nautius (or as some say, Ollavins Mata) who had the leading of certain Cohorts called Aleria, mounted upon Mules, which upon purpose made a dust greater, then for that number they were. For those varlets and new horsemen, as they sat on their Mules and Sumpter-beasts, drew after them trailing on the ground, boughs of trees full of branches and leaves: and first, there appeared in the fore-front (as it were, through a duskiness and dim light) their armour and guidons: but the dust behind them, rising higher and thicker, made shew of a troop of horsemen flanked an army of footmen: wherever went not only the Samnites but Romans also were deceived. And the Consul himself, to avoid the enemy and bear them down it was so: cried aloud amongst the foremost Ensigns, so as his voice reached unto his enemies, that Cominium was won, and his Brother Consul was come with victory: and therefore, they should endeavour and enforce themselves to get the day, before that another army should win the honour out of their hands. Thus cried he out on horseback galloping among the ranks to and fro. Then he commanded the Colonels and Centurions, to make a way for the men of arms. Himself afore, had willed Trebonius and Cedinius, that when they espied him to bear his spear upright and to shake it, then they should with all the might they had, put forth the Cavalry and charge the enemies. Every thing was done at a beck, according as they were directed and instructed before-hand. The wayes were made wide between the files. The horsemen flung out, and with spear in rest charge upon the middle battalion of the enemies, and brake their arrayes wheresoever they charged. Volumnius and Scipio seconded them with the Infantry: and while they were disarrayed overthrew them, and bare them to the ground. Down went their linen Cohorts now, when God and man fought against them, and were discomfited: and as well those that took the oath, and the other that were unworn, fled aimless and without respect of one thing or other, feared none but their enemies. All the footmen that escaped the battle, were beaten into their camp at Aquilonia. The Gentlemen and the men of arms fled toward Bovianum. The Cavalry of the Romans pursued the horsemen, and the Infantry chased the footmen. The wings took divers ways, the right toward the camp of the Samnites, the left unto the Town. Volumnius was somewhat before, and got the Camp. Scipio found more resistance in the City: not for that vanquished men, as they were, had more courage and resolution, but because that walls are stronger to endure an assault, and better to keep out armed men, then a plain trench and rampart. For, from the Courtine, with stones they beat and repulsed the enemy. Scipio foreseeing well enough that they should be longer about the assault of a strong and fenced town unless he dispatched the matter quickly and went through with it, in their first affright and confusion, before they took heart again: demanded of his souldiers, If they could take it well, and abide to see the camp won by the other point of the battle, and themselves (being likewise Conquerors) to be repelled from the City Gates? When they all cried No: and said they would never endure that disgrace: himself with his target over his head, approached the gate, the others following after under a target-shield, rush into the City, thrust down the Samnites about the Gate, and got to the Walls: but to engage themselves farther into the City, they durst not, being so few as they were. The Consul himself at the first knew nothing of all this, but was occupied about the retreat, and rallying of his men: for now the sun was well near down; and the night coming on apace, caused every thing even to the very victors to seem dangerous and suspicious. But when he was advanced farther, he saw on the right hand the camp taken: and on the left, he heard a confused cry and tumult in the City, compounded of the noise of fighting men, and frighted persons: and even at that instant, it fortuned, that they skirmished at the gate. Then he rode on, neerer and neerer, and saw his own men upon the Walls, howbeit nothing yet fully performed: but through the rash adventure and fool-hardiness of some few, an overture only made, and some advantage got of performing a great piece of service and worthy exploit. Whereupon he commanded the forces that were retired to be called, and with banner displayed to enter the City. So soon as they were in, they took the next quarter to the Gate, and for that the night approached, there they rested, and went no farther. But even in that very night, the enemies abandoned the Town, These

A There were slain that day before Aquilonia 30340 Samnites, and 3870 taken prisoners: and of field ensigns they were away with 90. Moreover, this is reported and recorded of Papirius, that there had not been lightly seen a General in any battle more lightome, cheerful, and merry: and were it of his own natural disposition, or upon assured confidence of victory. Upon which courage and resolution, he could not be revoked from battle, albeit there was some question and dispute about the Aulpsie: and even in the hottest time, and dangerous point of the conflict, at what time as the manner is to vow temples to the immortal gods: he vowed unto Jupiter Victor, If so be that he defeated the Legions of the enemies, to present him with a cup of a sweet and pleasurable mead, before he drank any strong and heady wine of the grape: which vow the gods accepted and liked of, and turned the ill prelude of the Aulpsies to good.

The other Consul had as good speed at Cominium: For at the break of day he approached with all his forces to the wals of the town, and inveiled it round about: and let strong guards at the gates, for fear they should issue or fall forth. And even as he was about to give the signal of assault, there came a messenger post from his fellow Consul, who in great affright brought word of the coming of twenty cohorts to the succour of them within the City: which both kept him short from giving the assault, and caused him to call back again part of his forces, which were arranged and ready under the counterfeits to assail the defendants. Then he gave charge to Decius Brutus Scaeva, one of the Lieutenants, to take the first legion and twenty cohorts of the wings, and other horsemen, to make head against the rescue of the enemies afore said: and wheresoever he met them, there to impeach them, yea, and if occasion served, to give them battle: and in no case to suffer that power to come to Cominium. Himself commanded that ladders should be reared on every side of the town, and under a fence of targets approached the gates. So that in an instant, the gates were burst open, and the wals scaled on every part. The Samnites, as their hearts served them well enough to keep the enemies from entrance, before they saw any armed men upon the wals: so, after they perceived, that they were assailed not aloof with stones and darts, but fast by and with hand-strokes: and how that they, who hardly and with great difficulty from the plain gat up the wals, having now gained and surmounted the place (which they most feared before) could fight at ease from aloft with their enemy, who was not able to match them in the even ground: quit their towers and wals, and gathered all together in the market place, and there for a while tried the utmost hazard of battle. But afterwards throwing down their weapons, 15400 of them yielded themselves to the Consul his mercy. There were slain 4380. Thus went the game at Cominium, and thus at Aquilonia.

In the mid way between the two Cities, where a third battle was looked for, the enemies were not to be found. And when they were seven miles off from Cominium, they had a countermand from their own country-men, and were called away, and so came not to the rescue, neither in the one battle nor the other. In the shutting in of the evening, when it began to be dark, being within the sight of the Camp of one hand, and Aquilonia on the other: they might hear a like noise and cry from both parts, which caused them to pause. But afterwards, when they were over-against the Camp which was fired by the Romans; the flame spreading far abroad declared the defeat of the Samnites more evidently, and staid them there for going farther. In which very place they laid down here and there in their armour (as they were) and passed a restless and unquiet long night, expecting (and yet fearing) the light of the day. At the dawning whereof, and so soon as it began to peep, while they were uncertain and doubtful what way to take, they happened to be discovered by the cavalry of the enemies: and suddenly in a fearful amazement and affright, they took them to their heels and fled in great disorder. Those horsemen having pursued the Samnites, who in the night season escaped out of the town, chanced to spy this forlaid multitude, and perceived they were neither entrenched, nor defended with a good corps de guard. This company was desired also even from the wals of Aquilonia: whereupon by this time the legionary footmen likewise made after them; but they could not overtake them in the chase, so fast they fled: howbeit the horsemen cut off some, and slew two hundred and fourscore in the tail of the rereguard. In this affright they left much armour behind them, and eighteen ensigns, and so the rest of the army fled themselves, and as well as they might in fearful confusion, recovered Bovianum. The joy of these two Romans armies was wonderfully increased, to see one another have so good and fortunate success in their enterprises. Both the Consuls, by each others advice and consent, gave their towns thus won unto the souldiers to be sacked and rifled: and after the goods were out, to set fire on the empty houses: in such wise, that in one and the same day both Aquilonia and Cominium were burnt to ashes: and the Consuls, with mutual congratulation and joy, as well between their Legions as themselves, sealing one another joyned both their Camps in one. Afterwards in the fight of both Armies, Carvilius highly commended and praised his souldiers, every one as he deserved, and rewarded them with gifts accordingly. Papirius also for his part, who had performed many and sundry skirmishes as well in the field and battle, as about the winning of the Camp and forcing the City, bestowed by way of honour upon Sp. Nautius and Sp. Papirius his brother-in-law, as also upon four Centurions and the band of the Libertarii Javelineers, bracelets and coronets of gold: and namely, Nautius for that he bare himself so worthily in that journey and expedition, wherein with his counterfeits troop of horsemen upon Mules, he so terrified the enemy, as if he had conducted a main army of men of arms: and young Papirius for his good service with his cavalry as well in the battle and conflict, first, as also in that night, wherein he forced the Samnites to flee secretly, and quit the City Aquilonia: the Centurions and soldiers, in this regard, that they were the first who seized the gates and walls of that town: as for all the horsemen, in consideration of their manifold travels, and brave exploits shewed in sundry places, he gave them bracelets and little horns of silver. This done, so far as it was time now to withdraw their army from out of Samnium, either both twin, or one of them alone; they sat in Council and consultation thereupon: and thought it was the better course (to the end that the Samnites might be brought lower, and their flame more sensibly decayed) to go forward still, and charge them with greater force and resolution, and to pursue the rest that was behind: that Samnium might be delivered up to the Consuls their successors, utterly tamed and subdued: since that the enemies now had no army abroad in field, like either to give or abide another battle; and there remained but one manner of making war, even to besiege and assault their Cities and strong Towns: by the winning and subversion whereof, they might with the pillage enrich, and make their own soldiers for ever, and withal impoverish their enemies; and make a hand of them quite being now at the last cast forced to fight for Church and Home. Hereupon the Consuls dispatched their letters to the Senat and people of Rome; containing the effect at large of all their exploits; and then divided themselves, and took two several waies: Papirius marched with his legions to the siege of Seppinum; and Carvilius with his to besiege Volturna.

The Consuls' letters were read and heard with exceeding joy, as well in the court of the Council of the City, as in the Common Hall of assemblies; and this publique contentment and rejoicing was solemnized with general processions, for the space of four daies, and with marvellous zeal, affection, and devotion of private persons in particular. And to say a truth, this victory was to the state of Rome not only great and honourable, but also of great consequence, in regard that it fell out in so good and commodious a time. For even then, news came, that Tuscanus was revolted and rebelled, and men began to cast in their minds, and discourse how they should do (in case ought should hap but well in Samnium) to withstand the forces and invasions of the Tuscans: who taking heart, and presuming upon the Samnites, and their cursed and execrable oath, by virtue whereof they were obliged to fight to the utmost extremity, embraced the occasion and opportunity of taking arms again, while both the Consuls and the whole forces of Rome were diverted and withdrawn into Samnium and there employed. The Embassadors of the Tuscans and confederates, were by M. Annius the Prætor brought into the Senat, and had audience given them: where they complained, that their Territories were over-run, burnt, and spoiled, by the Tuscans their next neighbours; and all because they were unwilling to revolt from the people of Rome: humbly beseeching the LL. of the Senate, to defend and protect them against the violence, wrong, and outrage of common enemies. Answer was returned unto the Embassadors: That the Senate would have regard, that their allies should have no cause to repent of their faithful allegiance, and constant loyalty; and that ere many daies went over their heads, the Tuscans should taste of the same cup that the Samnites had begun unto them. Howbeit, they would have been slack and cold enough in dealing with the Tuscans, had not fresh news come, that the Ætulus also, who had for many years continued in amity and friendship with the people of Rome, were combined with the Tuscans, and entered into arms, as well as they. The near neighborhood of this nation, gave edge to the Senators, and what them on, to take care and ordain, that their Ætulus Herolds should be addressed thither to demand restitution and amends for harms done: which being denied, and no goods restored; by the advice and authority of the Senat, together with the grant of the people, war was proclaimed against the Tuscans: and the Consuls were commanded to cast lots, whether of them should pass out of Samnium with his forces, unto Tuscanus.

By this time now Carvilius had won Volturna, Palumbinum, and Herulanum, towns appertaining to the Samnites. Volturna was forced within few daies: Palumbinum, the same day that he came before the walls: but at Herulanum, he fought two several battles, with doubtful and uncertain issue, yea, and with more loss of his own part than of the enemies. But afterwards, he pitched his camp before the town, beleaguering the enemies, and kept them within their walls, gave the assault, and won it in the end. In these three towns there were either taken prisoners or slain in all, to the number of ten thousand: but so, as through fear the greater part by far, suffered themselves to be captives, rather than to dye on the edge of the sword.

The Consuls cast lots for their Provinces: and it fell unto Carvilius to go into Tuscanus, as the soldiers wished and desired, who could no longer away with the rigour of cold weather in Samnium. As for Papirius, he found a greater power of enemies, and more resistance, before Seppinum. Many a time he was fought withal in battell arranged: oft skirmished with in his march: yea, and oftentimes under the very walls, the enemies sallied out against him from the Town, in such sort, as he could not tell what to make of it: for neither was it to be called properly a siege alone, nor yet altogether a battell fight: considering that the enemies were no more protected and covered themselves, by the strength of their walls: than the walls were defended by force of arms, and men of war: howbeit in the end, what with fighting and what with skirmishing, he beloged them within the City, so as they durst come abroad no more, but kept themselves close and were besieged indeed: and after long siege, as well with forcible assaults, as by trenches, battails, and rampiers, he was master of the town: and therefore after he was possessed of it, upon anger and choler

A choler that they had so long stood out and put him to so much trouble, that there was more blood-shed; and seven thousand died by the sword, whereas under three thousand were taken prisoners. The spoil and pillage, which was exceeding great, considering that the Samnites had laid up all their gods in some few Cities, was given to the soldiers. And now lay the snow thick all over upon the ground: neither could men endure abroad in the field without house and harbor: and thereupon the Consul retired his Army out of Samnium. Against his coming to Rome, it was doctored by the general voice of all men, that he should triumph: and so he triumphed while he was in his Magistracy, with great magnificence, and sumptuous pomp, as those daies would afford. For as well his footmen as horsemen marched and passed by in a shew, adorned with their gilt and prizes of honour. Many a civick, wallare and mirale garland, was seen worn that day. Much looking and wondering there was at the spoils also of the Samnites armour and apparel: for with their goodly beauty and glorious hue, were they comparable to the e that his father had won before him, which were commonly seen, and well known in the publick places of the City, adorned and beautified therewith. Moreover, there were led before him in this triumph and pompous entrance of his into the City, certain captives and prisoners of noble blood cut ended, men of great worth, sometime, and name, as well for their own deeds, as their fathers acts. Great store of Brasse Bullion in Ingots, and not coined, was carried in shew, amounting to the weight of 20005 33 pound: which mass of brasse or copper was stiled of the ranisme of prisoners. But the silver which was got in the sacage of the towns came to 1330 pound weight and above. All the brasse and silver was laid up in the common Treasury of the City, and nothing at all of the whole booty given to the soldiers: and the discontentment and heart-burning that grew thereon by it, was so much the greater in the common people, by reason they were charged besides with an exaction and contribution for soldiers pay; whereas if the Consul had not upon a vain-glorious humour brought into the City-Chamber, such sums which he had gained from the enemy there might a good portion thereof have been bellowed freely on amongst the soldiers, & of the surplusage their due wages paid and dispatched. Moreover, while he was Consul, he dedicated the Temple of Quirinus, which his father, being Dictator, had vowed: for, that himself vowed it in the very time of the battell. I find not in any ancient writer; and certainly in so short a space, he could not possibly have built and finished it. He trimmed it besides, and garnished it with the spoils of the enemies, whereof there was such store and abundance, that not only the forelaid Temple and the market-place were therewith set out and bravely decked, but they were distributed abroad to their allies also and Colonies, near inhabitants, for the decoration and beautifying of their Churches and publick places. After the triumph ended, he brought his Army to winter in the Territory of the Vestins, because those quarters were distressed and annoyed by the Samnites.

In this mean while, Carvilius the Consul, having at his first coming given the assault unto Tuscanus, a City in Tuscanus granted licence to 470 of the richest Citizens, to depart from thence and by composition, to pay a great sum of money unto him. The rest of the multitude fell into his hands, after he had won the town by mere force. This done, he forced five Cattles, to take in places of great strength: where were slain of enemies 2400, and not all out 200 taken prisoners. He granted to the Ætuli (who sued for peace) truce for one year, and yet to make present payment of 100000 Asles, and to discharge the soldiers wages for that year. After these exploits achieved, he departed to his triumph: which as it was less honourable and glorious than that of other of his companion in government, in regard of the service performed against the Samnites: so, if we consider withally, the Tuscan war, it was equal and comparable unto it every way. Of brasse money he brought into the common Chest 300050 pound: of the surplusage of the pillage and other spoils, he caused the Chappel of Fortuna to be built, near unto the Temple of the same goddess, dedicated by King Servilius Tullius. To the soldiers that served on foot, he gave of his booty 1000 Asles a piece, and twice as much to every Centurion and horseman. With reward they accepted more thankfully at his hands, by reason of the misgarding and misery of his Collegue before him. And so gracious was this Consul, that he protected and saved L. P. Junius, one of his Lieutenants, against the people: who being arrested and called to his answer by M. Cælius, a Tribune of the Commons, fled for his last help, to his Lieutenantship (as they say) and avoided thereby the danger of their judgement: for that during his absence in that charge his accusation might well be set on foot and followed, but brought to a final end and definitive sentence, it could not be.

After this year expired, the new Tribunes of the Commons entered their office: and for that there was supposed some error in their creation, the fifth day after were other chosen in their stead. The same year there was a Lustrum or solemn survey of the City held by P. Cornelius Arvina and C. Marius Rutilius Censors. In which were numbered and assessed 262322 pols of Roman Citizens. There were in order the six and twentieth Censors from the beginning: and this was reckoned the nineteenth Lustrum after the first institution. In this year, and never before, the spectators of the Roman Games and Plaies, in regard of their happy success in wars, stood adorned with wreaths and garlands of flowers upon their heads: and then came up the fashion at that time, who won the prizes, and were victors in those solemn Games.

The first rising of the Carthaginians, with the beginning of their City, are in this book related: Against whom together with Hiero King of the Syracusians, the Senat of Rome ordained to send aid unto the Mamertines: and after much arguing and debate about this point, whilst some persuaded, & others again dissuaded: the gentlemen of Rome, who served on horseback, when first crossed: I, I, I, and have themselves bravely in many battels and to good purpose against Hiero: who at length craved peace, and had it granted. The Censors held a Lustrum and numbered the people: and enrolled 372224 Citizens of Rome, into the subsidy book. D. Junius Brutus was the first that ever represented himself of sword-fencers at the sharp to the utterance, in the honour of his father late deceased. One Colony was planted at Alernia. This book comprehendeth besides, the good success of the affairs against the Carthaginians and the Volsinians.

Cneus Cornelius the Consul, being surprised and environed with a fleet of Carthaginians, and under colour of a parl, trained forth and called unto them: was villainously taken prisoner and kept still with them. Cn. Duilius the Consul fought with happy success against this their foresaid fleet: and was the first Roman Captain that rode in triumph, for a naval victory at sea. In regard whereof this honour for ever after was done unto him, that when he supped forth in any place of the City: he was carried home to his own house: the Waits should sound, the hautboies all the way, and a man go before him with a burning torch. L. Cornelius the Consul won a field in Sardinia against the Ilanders, together with the Corsicans and Hanno the General of the Carthaginians. Attilius Calatinus the Consul, having unadvisedly engaged his army within a place of great disadvantage, whereas the Carthaginians lay round about in ambush, retired and escaped by the valour and industrious means of M. Calpurnius a Colonel: who with a regiment of 300 foot venturously sallied out, and turned all the forces of the enemies upon himself. One Annibal a Carthaginian Commander, upon the defeat of the Armado, whereby he was Admiral, was by his own soldiers trussed up and crucified. Attilius Regulus the Consul, having in battel at sea vanquished the Carthaginians, sailed over into Affrick.

Attilius Regulus the Consul flew in Affrick a serpent of a mighty and wonderful bigness, but with the exceeding loss of his soldiers. And after many encounters and battels with the Carthaginians, when the Senat by reason of his so happy conduct and management of the wars, sent no other to succeed him, he dispatched his letters unto them and complained thereof: and among other pregnant reasons: he alleged for to have a successor to come unto him, this was one: That the little inheritance and living which he had suffered waste, by the default or lewdness of his bailiffs of husbandry. Meanwhile, as if fortune had been disposed and sought means to shew a notable example in the person of this one man Regulus, as well of adversity as prosperity, he was overthrowen in plain field, and taken prisoner by Xanthippus, a renowned Captain of the Lacedemonians, whom the Carthaginians had waged, and sent for to aid them. After this the sundry shipwracks of the Roman Navy, eclipsed, obscured, and disfigured all the other exploits that the Roman Captains had formerly achieved before, as well by land as sea. T. Coruncanius was the first High Priest or Arch-Prelate, created out of the body of the Common. M. Sempronius Sophus and M. Valerius Maximus the Censors, when they made a review of the Senat, called thirteen, and took their embroidered purple cloaks from them. They held a survey also of the whole City, and entered into their subsidy book 317217 Roman Citizens. Regulus being sent from the Carthaginians to the Senat of Rome, to treat a peaceable accord, or if he could not obtain so much to deal about the exchange of prisoners one for another, bound himself by an oath to return again to Carthage, if he sped not for the exchange as for paid. And being come to Rome, himself dissuaded both the one and the other: howbeit to accomplish and perform his promise by oath given, he made return accordingly, and by the Carthaginians was desirously put to cruel torture, and so died.

Clauius Cecilius Metellus, in consideration of his fortunate conduct of the wars against the Carthaginians, rode in a most stately and magnificent triumph: wherein were shewed and led captive thirteen chief Captains of the enemies, and 120 Elephants. Claudius Pulcher the Consul, who made the adorning prelates of the Aulices, would needs hazard a battel, commanded the sacred Pulcher robe dosed and draped over the head in the water, to see if they would drink, since they refused to eat their meat: and received an overthrow at sea, in a conflict with the Carthaginians. For which he was called home by the Senat, and commanded to nominate a Dictator: whereupon he declared C. Glauca, a base companion, and a person of the meanest degree and quality: who being constrained to resign his Magistracy, yet notwithstanding afterwards beheld the games and plaies in his mantle of estate. Attilius Calatinus was the first Roman Dictator, that led an army out of Italy. An exchange was made of Roman captives for Carthaginians. Two Colonies were transported, namely, to Fregelle, and to Brundisium, in the

A the territory of the Salernitans. Another Lustrum was taken by the Censors: wherein were reckoned of Roman Citizens 251222. Claudia, the sister of that P. Claudius, who in contempt and despite of the Aulices, fought a battel to great loss, forthwith upon a time, when she came from the Greek Nations to be crowned in the thrush and press of people: whereupon she cried out with a loud voice, Would God my brother were alive again, and had the charge of another Armado: for which words she had a good fine set on her head, and paid it. Two Prators were now created, the first that ever were at Rome: Cecilius Metellus the High Priest kept pay for within the City A. Pothumius the Consul, because he was besides the Flaminian unto Mars: and would not suffer him to be Non-resident, and absent himself from his charge. After sundry battels and conflicts that many Roman Captains had against the Carthaginians, Calpurnius the Consul obtained the honour of the final victory, when he had defeated their Fleet: and so made an end of the first Panick war. The Carthaginians therefore sued for peace, and had it granted. At what time as the Temple of Vesta was on a light fire: Cecilius the High Priest recovered and saved out of the flame the holy reliques, Two Tribes were added to the rest, Volina and Quirina. The Falisci rebelled, & within six daies were subdued, and brought under subjection.

A Colony was planted at Spolertum. An army was led against the Ligurians (i.e. Genovaisers) which was the first time that they were warred upon. The Sardinians and the Corsicans, who revolted and took arms were subdued. Tuccia a Vestal virgin and a Potary was condemned and executed for her incest or whoredoms. War was proclaimed against the Illyrians, for that they killed one of the Embassadors which were sent unto them, and being defeated, confessed themselves subject to the Romans. The number of the Prators was increased from two to four. The Gauls inhabiting beyond the Alps (toward France) who came down and entered into Italy, were overthrowen and put to the sword. In which war the Romans had by report of the Latins and other confederats and allies, to the number of 300000 fighting men that served under them. The Roman forces passed then first over the river Padus (i.e. Po), where the French Infubrians (i.e. Lombards) after certain discomfures were slain by cruel reason, and rendered themselves. Mar. Claudius Marcellus the Consul, having slain Viridomarus the General of the Lumbards with his own hand, went away with the honour of the third rich and royal spoils got from the enemy. D. The Illyrians were subdued: so were the Illyrians also, after they had revolted and put themselves in arms: and were so tamed, that they came under obedience. The Censors held a Lustrum, and took account of the number of the Roman Citizens, and found in all 270000. The Libitins (or slaves of the rich) were reduced into four tribes by themselves, to wit, Equulina, Palatina, Suburana, and Collina: whereas before time they had been dispersed indifferently, and mingled among the rest. C. Flaminius the Censor paved the high way called Flaminia, and built the great Cirque or Theater named Flaminius Circus. And two Colonies were established within those Territories that were conquered from the Gauls to wit, Placentia, and Cremona.

The one and twentieth Book

The Breviary of L. Florus upon the one and twentieth Book.

IN this book are rehearsed the acts which passed in Italy, as touching the second Panick war, and how Annibal, the Chief Commander of the Carthaginians, contrary to the accord of alliance, passed over the river Iberus: by whom Saguntum, a City belonging to the allies of the people of Rome, was in the eighth month of the Siege forced by assault. For to complain of those injuries and injuries Embassadors were sent to the Carthaginians. And for that they would not make satisfaction and amends therefore, war was proclaimed against them. Annibal having passed over the mountains Pyrene, and discomfited the Volsinians, who made head against him, and would have encompassed his passage, mounted the Alps, and after he had passed through them with great difficulty and pains, and repulsed also the French mountaineers in sundry skirmishes and battels, he descended into Italy: and near the River Ticinus, discomfited and disarrayed the Romans in a battel of Cavalry. In which conflict, when P. Cornelius Scipio was wounded, his son (the same who afterwards was surnamed Africanus) rescued him, and saved his life. G. Annibal after he had defeated the Roman army a second time, near the river Trebia, passed over the Appennine: where his soldiers were mightily afflicted and distressed, by reason of foul weather and violence of storm and tempest. Cn. Cornelius Scipio sped well in his war against the Carthaginians within Spain, and took prisoner Mago, the General Commander of the enemies.

The one and twentieth book of T. Livius.

The same may I well say, in the Preface and entrance of this one part of my work, which most writers of histories have promised and made profession of, in the beginning of the whole, to wit, That I will write the most famous and memorable war that ever was, even that, which the Carthaginians under the conduct of Annibal fought with the people and State of Rome. For neither any other Cities or Nations are known to have warred together more worthily and puissant than they; nor at any time ever were they themselves so great, so strong in forces, and so mighty in means, as now they were. Moreover, they came not newly now, to wage war, without knowledge of the powers and martial skill, one of another; for trial they had made thereof sufficient already, in the first punick war. Besides, so variable was the fortune of the field, so doubtfully were their battels fought, that neither loss and danger were they, who in the end won the better, and achieved the victory. And to conclude, if a man observe the whole course and proceeding of these their wars, their malice and hatred was greater in a manner than their forces: whiles the Romans took foul scorn and disdain that they, whose hap before was to be vanquished, should unprovoked begin war afresh with the Conquerors; and the Carthaginians were as male-content, and thoroughly offended, as taking themselves (notwithstanding they were overcome) to be abused too much at their hands by their proud, insolent, and covetous rule over them. Over, and besides all this, the report goeth, that Annibal being but nine years old, or thereabout, came fawning and flattering as wanton children do to his father Amilcar, that he would take him with him into Spain; at what time, as after the African war ended, his father was offering sacrifice, ready to pass over thither with an army: where he was brought to the altar side, and induced to lay his hand thereupon, and to touch the sacrifice, and so to swear, that so soon as he were able, he would be a professed and mortal enemy to the people of Rome. Vexed (no doubt) at the heart, was Amilcar himself, a man of high spirit and great courage, for the loss of the Islands Sicily and Sardinia: for not only Sicily was overhastily yielded (as he thought) as despairing too soon of the fate thereof, and doubting how it should be defended; but also Sardinia was by the cunning and fraudulent practice of the Romans (surprized out of the Carthaginians hands, while they were troubled with the commotion and rebellion of Affrick; and a Tribute besides imposed upon them. He being disquieted, I say, and troubled with these griefs and discontents, so based himself for five years space in the Affrick war, which ensued immediately upon the peace concluded with the Romans; and likewise after in Spain, for nine years together, enlarging ever still the dominion of Carthage: that all the world might see, he intended and designed a greater war than that he had in hand; and if God had spared him longer life, it should have been well seen that the Carthaginians under the leading of Amilcar, would have made that war upon Italy, which afterwards they waged by the conduct of Annibal. But the death of Amilcar happening in so good season [for the Romans] and the childhood and tenderness of Annibal together, were the cause that this war was put off and deferred. In the mean time, between the father and the son, Asdrubal bare all the rule of the peace almost of eight years. This Asdrubal had been Amilcar's his minion, grown highly into his grace and favour, at the first (as men say) for the very prime and flower of his youth, but afterwards in regard of the singular cowardness of a brave and haughty mind, which soon appeared in him, and for his forwardness to action, he was preferred to be his son in law, and married his daughter. Now, forasmuch as he was Amilcar's his son in law, he was advanced to the sovereign conduct of the war, with no good liking at all and consent of the Nobility and Peers, but by the means and favour only of the Barchin faction, which bare a great stroke, and might do all in all, among the souldiers and the common people. Who managed all his affairs, more by policy and sage council, than by force and violence: and using the authority and name of the Princes and great Lords of those countries, and by entertaining friendship with the chief Rulers, won daily the hearts of new nations (and, by that means enlarged the power and glory of the Carthaginians in Spain, rather than by any war and force of arms. But for all this peace with foreign States, he was never the more sure of his own life at home. For a certain barbarous fellow, for avenge that his Master and Lord was put to death, flew him in open place: and being laid hold on by them that were attendant about Asdrubal's his person, he kept the same countenance as if he had escaped and gone clear away: yea, and when he was by cruel torments all mangled and maimed, he looked so cheerfully and pleasantly on the matter, as if he had seemed to muse on the joy of heart (surpassed the pains and anguish of his body. With this Asdrubal, for the first time, the singular wit and wonderful dexterity, in soliciting and annexing unto his dominion the Nations already the people of Rome had renewed the League, upon these two capitulations and conditions: first, that the river Theris should limit and determine the feignories of them both: Agona, that the Saguntines, ceased in the midst between the territories of both Nations, should remain free, and enjoy their ancient liberties.

No doubt at all there was now, but when a new Commander should succeed in the room of Asdrubal, the favour of the people would go clear with the prerogative voice and choice of the souldiers: who presently brought young Annibal into the General's his pavilion, and with exceeding ding great acclamation and accord of all, saluted him by the name of Captain General, for this you must understand, that Asdrubal by his letters had been sent for him, being very young, and hardly fourteen years of age; yea, and the matter was debated first in the Council-House at Carthage: where they of the Barchin side laboured and followed the matter earnestly, that Annibal should be trained in warfare, and grow up to succeed his father in equal prowess & greatness. But Hanno the chiefest man of the contrary faction: "It is but meet and reason (quoth he) that Asdrubal doth demand: and yet for mine own part I think it not good, that his request (should be granted. When they moved and marvelled much at this so doubtful speech of his, and wilt not what construction to make of it. "Why then, quoth Hanno, to be plain, That flourish and beauty of youth, which Asdrubal himself yielded and parted withal, sometimes unto Annibal's father, for to live or abuse at his pleasure: the same he thinketh by good right he may challenge and have again, from the son, to make quittance. But it becometh not us for to acquaint our young youths with the Camp that under the colour, and instead of their military instruction and teaching, they abandon and give their bodies to serve the lust and appetite of the Generals. What is this the thing we fear, That the son of Amilcar should tarry too long ere he see the excessive grandeur and sovereignty of his father, and the less that he saw as it were of his royalty? Or doubt we, that we shall not soon enough leave in all dutiful allegiance his natural son, unto whose son in law, all our Armies have been served (as it were) in lawful right of inheritance? Nay, I am of opinion, and this is my judgment, That this youth be kept in awe at home, under obedience of laws, under civil Magistrates, and learn a while to live in equal condition with the rest of the Citizens and subjects: for fear lest at one time or other, this little spark do burn outright, and raise a mighty flame. A few, and those were, in a manner, all of the best fort and soundest judgment, accorded with Hanno. But, as commonly it is seen, the greater number over-weighed the better.

Asdrubal killed.

Thus Annibal was sent into Spain, and immediately at his first coming, drew all the whole army after him: so highly he was regarded and beloved. The old souldiers believed verily that Amilcar was alive again, and come amongst them: they thought they beheld and saw the same vigour and spirit in his countenance & visage, the same quickness and liveliness: in his eyes the same proportion, feature and lineaments of his face. And afterwards, within short time, he had wrought and wound himself into their favour, that the late remembrance of his father was the least matter of all others, that won him grace and love among them. Never was there one and the self-same nature, framed and fitted better, for two things that are in quality most contrary: namely, to rule, and to obey. Whereby, a man could hardly discern and judge, whether he was more dear unto the General for the one, or to the Army for the other. For neither Asdrubal would make choice of any one before him, when there was some valiant service or brave exploit to be executed: nor the souldiers put more confidence in any other Leader, nor go more boldly and resolutely to any enterprise, than under him. Most forward he was and hardy to all hazards and dangerous adventures: right provident and wary again, at the very point of peril and jeopardy. No travail was able to weary and tire his body: no pains-taking could daunt and break his heart. He could away with heat and cold alike. For his diet and feeding, he measured both his meat and drink by his natural appetite, and not by pleasure and delightful taste. For sleeping, for waking, day and night was all one with him. When he had once performed his service, and finished his exploit: if there were any spare time after, therein would he take his rest and repose: and that should not be upon a soft bed neither, nor procured with great curiosity by still silence, and making no noise about him. Full often many a man hath seen him lying on the hard and bare ground, under a good foot driers jacket and homely cassock cast over him, even among the sentinels and corps de guard. For his apparel, it was not more costly nor braver than his fellows and companions: many in his armour and hories he loved ever to be goodly be- seen above all other. Amongst footmen and horsemen both, he would always be a great way foremost. And to conclude in giving a charge upon the enemy, and to begin to battell, he was by his good will ever the first: and when the fight was done, the last man seen to retire out of the field. Of these so noble qualities and many virtues, he had not so many, but there were as great vices and imperfections in him again to counterpoise the same. Cruelly most savage and inhumane, falsehood and treachery more than Punick: no truth, no honesty, no fear of God, no regard of oath, no conscience, nor religion.

Disposed thus as he was, and inclined by nature to virtues, and vices, he served full three years under General Asdrubal. During which time, he omitted and forgot no one thing that was meet either to be executed or enterprised by a man that was himself another day to be a Captain and Chief Commander in the wars. From the very first day that he was chosen and declared Lord General: as if at the same instant, Italy had been the Province assigned unto him, as if, I say, he had received Commission to war with the Romans, he thought good to make no delays. For fear lest haply whiles he lingered and slacked the time, some mischance might prevent his designs and cut him short, like as it had overtaken his father first, and Asdrubal afterwards: but presently determined to make war upon the Saguntines, by assailing whom, the Romans no doubt were touched, and would take arms and enter into the quarrel. But first he led his army into the marches of the Oledades (a nation beyond Iberus, rather siding and taking part with the Carthaginians, than under their jurisdiction) that he might not seem to have shot at the Saguntines and intended intended ought againft them directly: but that by order and contrivance of his affairs, after he had subdued the countries bordering upon them, he had been drawn (as it were) for vicinity and neighbourhood like to that war and to join them also with the rest unto the Empire. And first he won by force, and took Carteia, a rich City, the seat town and chief place of all that nation. Whereupon, other meaner and smaller Cities also, for fear came under his obedience, and yielded to pay tribute. His Army then after these victories, and enriched with spoil and pillage, was brought back to new Carthage, there for to winter. Where he made sure unto him the hearts and affectionate love as well of his own countrymen as of the allies, partly, by bestowing the pillage liberally among them, and partly, by making true payment of soldiers wages for the time past. And then in the very prime of the spring, he went forward to war upon the Vaccet. He fought by assault Hermancia and Arbucula, two Towns of the Carret, Arbucula by the manhood and multitude of the Townsmen held out a long time. But certain fugitives that were fled from Hermancia, having rallied themselves and joined with other exiled persons of the Oledades, a nation the summer before subdued, raised also the Carpetans to take arms: and set upon Annibal, in his return from the Vaccet; and not far from the river Tagus, troubled and disordered his march, heavily charged with spoil and booty. Annibal forbore to fight, and encamped himself upon the bank of the river: and so soon as the enemies were in their first sleep, and all still and hushed, passed over with his Army at the foord: and after he had pitched his Camp far off from thither side, as that his enemies might have room enough to march away besides him, he determined to let upon them as they should pass over the river: To his horsemen he gave commandment to charge upon the Regiment of footmen, so soon as they perceived them to have taken the water: and upon the bank he arranged forty Elephants afront them. There were of the Carpetans, counting the aids and succours of the Oledades and Vaccet, 10,000 strong: an Army invincible, if they had fought on even and indifferent ground. Who being both by nature fierce and courageous, and for multitude confident: presumptuous besides upon their imagination that the enemy was retired for fear; supposed that the only stay of their victory was, because the river ran between: and setting up a shout and out-cry, without direction of any Leader, in all disorder they ran into the river here and there, every man what way was next him. Now from the other side of the bank, a great troop of horsemen were entered into the river, encountered them in the midst of the channel and fought with great advantage. For whereas the footmen unadvisedly and not able to keep fast footing, and hardly trusting the foord, might easily be cast aside and overturned, even by naked horsemen if they did but put forth and prick forward their horses it killed not how the horsemen on the other side having their bodies at liberty and able to wield their weapon, with their horses under them standing sure even in the midst of the stream and whirlpools, might with ease either fight close hand to hand, or assail the enemies aloof. Many of them besides perished in the water-flood by the whirling waves of the river were driven upon the enemies, and by the Elephants trodden under foot, and crushed to death. The hindmost, who might with more safety recover their own bank, after they were rallied together into one from divers places, as fear had scattered them; before they could upon so great a fright, take heart and accompany to themselves, Annibal who with a four-square battalion had entered the river, forced to retire from the bank: and when he had walled the country, within few daies brought the Carpetans also under his obedience.

And now all beyond Iberus was subject to the Carthaginians, the Saguntins only excepted. With whom as yet he would not seem to war: howbeit, to minister some cause and occasion thereof, quarrels were picked, and seeds of diffentions sown between them and their neighbors, namely the Turdetans. Unto whose aid, when he was come, that was himself the sower of all the variance, and had let them together by the ears: and when it appeared plainly that it was not a matter of right to be tried by law, but an occasion rather sought of fight and open war: then the Saguntins sent their Embassadors to Rome, for to crave aid against that war, which doublets was at hand. The Consuls at that time of Rome, were P. Cornelius Scipio, and Titus Sempronius Longus, who having brought the Embassadors into the Consill House, and proposed matters unto the LL. there, concerning the weal publique, and decreed to send their Embassadors into Spain to take survey, and look into the state of their allies: who also if they thought it meet, should give Annibal warning, not to meddle with their confederates, and molest the Saguntins; and withall, to sail over to Carthage into Affrick, and there make relation of the complaints and grievances of the allies of the people of Rome: when, I say, this Embassage was decreed, but yet not sent, news came sooner than all men looked for, that Saguntum was already besieged. This was the matter propounded new again before the Senate. Some were of mind to dispatch the Consuls unto the Provinces of Spain and Affrick, with commission to make war both by sea and land. Others thought better to bend all their forces wholly into Spain against Annibal. There were a gain of opinion, that so great and weighty an enterprise was not hand over head, and rashly to be attempted; but rather that they should attend the return of the Embassadors out of Spain: and this advice that seemed most safe was held for the better and root place. And therefore so much the sooner were these Embassadors P. V. Terentius Fluccus, and Q. Robilius Pomphilius, addressed unto Annibal before Saguntum, with direction, from thence to go forward to Carthage (in case he would not desert and give over war) and for to demand the Captain himself, for amends and satisfaction of breaking the league. But while the Romans were amused about these consultations & decrees, decrees, Saguntum was by this time with all forcible means assaulted. This City of all others most wealthy and rich, stood beyond Iberus, situate almost a mile from the sea. The inhabitants are said to have had their beginning out of the Island Asaphibus: and some among them, were descended from Ardes, a City of the Rutunians: but they grew within short time to this populous and wealth of theirs, partly, by the fruits and revenues of their lands; and partly, by the traffick and gain of their merchandise, and commodities transported by sea, as also by the great affluence and enclose of people, and lastly by their straight rule of discipline, whereby they observed their troth and loyalty with their allies, even to their own ruin and final destruction.

Annibal after he had invaded their confines as an enemy, and by way of hostility, with his Army overrun and walled their country, besieged and assailed the City three waies. There was one canon or angle of the wall shooting out into a more plain and open valley, than any other place all about: against which he meant to raise certain mantlets or tabricks, under which he might approach with the Ram to batter the wall. But as the place far from the wall, was even enough and handsome for such engines of battery to be driven upon: so after that they came to the proof and execution indeed, the succets answered nothing to the enterprise begun. For besides that there was a mighty tower over-looked and commanded them, the wall it self (as in a place doubt and suspected) was more fortified and raised higher there than elsewhere: and also the chofynest and ablest men were bestowed to make more forcible resistance, where there was like to be most trouble and danger. And first with shot of darts and quarrels, and such like, they put the enemy back, and would not suffer the pioneers and labourers in any place to entrench or raise rampiers in safety. In process also, they shot not from the wall only and that tower, and shewed themselves there in arms for defence, but also their hearts served them to fall forth, and to break into the guards of the enemies, yea, and to enter upon their trenches and fabricks. In which skirmishes there died not many more Saguntins than Carthaginians. But so soon as Annibal himself, approaching unadvisedly under the wall, fortune to be wounded grievously in the forefront of his thigh, with a dart or light javelin, and therewith fell to the ground: they all about him fled so fast, and were so scared, that they had like to have given over quite and abandoned their mantlets, and other fabricks afore said. After this, for some few daies, whiles their General was under cure of his hurt, they lay at feiged rather, than followed the assault. In which mean time, as they rested from skirmishing, they ceased not to invent new devices, and to prepare new fabricks. Whereupon the assault began again more hot than before: and in many parts at once they fell to raise rolling mantlets, so many and so thick, that some places would not receive them: and withall to drive the Ram against the walls. Annibal had men good store, for it is thought he was 50,000 in Camp strong. The townsmen with devising means to defend, and see to every place, began to have their hands full: but all would not serve. For now were the walls beaten with the rams, and many parts thereof shaken and battered: and at one place above the rest, by continual battery there was such a breach, as the town lay open and naked to the enemy. After that, three turrets, and all the wall between fell down with a mighty and horribly crash, in such as the Carthaginians thought verily that with that rush the town had been won: by which breach, as if the wall had protected both E parties before, they ran forth together on each side to fight. The battell was not like to a tumultuary skirmish, such as are wont to be about assaults of Cities, by the occasion and advantage of the one part or the other; but a very set and ranged field (as it were) in an open ground between the breaches of the wall, and the houses of the town that stood a pretty way distant within. Of one side they were pricked forward with hope, on the other with despair: whiles Annibal thought verily that he was master of the town already, if he held on but a little longer: and the Saguntins seeing their town bare, and void of walls, opposed their bodies in the breach, not one stepping back a foot, left in the space between he should let in the enemy. The more fiercely therefore, and the thicker and closer that they fought together on both parts, the more were wounded; and there was not a dart could light in vain between their bodies and their armour, but it did mischief. The Saguntins used a weapon called Falarica, in manner of a dart, which they let fly and lanced from them, having a long shaft or steel, round and even every where toward the one end, where it was headed with iron, and bound about with tow, and smeared with pitch. The iron head was three foot long, that it might pierce both harness and body through. But the greatest fear that it did was this, although it stuck fast in the target, and entered not into the body, that being driven and flung, when the middle part was set on fire, by the motion thereof as it flew, it gathered much more fire, forced the soldier to forsake his armour, and exposed him unarmed and naked to the shot following. Well, the fight continued doubtful a long time, by reason that the Saguntins took better heart unto them, because they had rested beyond their hope and expectation: and the Carthaginians took themselves vanquished, for that they had not got the victory and better hand: whereupon the townsmen all at once set up a cry, and beat the enemies back to the very breaches, and ruins of the wall, and from thence thrust them out clean. While they were thus encumbered and affrighted, yea, and at last discomfited them, put them to flight, and chased them as far as their Camp.

In the mean while news came, that there were Embassadors arrived from Rome: unto whom Annibal dispatched certain messengers to meet with them at sea side, and to give them to understand, That neither they might safely with security of their persons come among the broiles of so many barbarous & fierce nations; nor their Master Annibal amidst those dangerous and troublesome belome affairs, had any leisure to attend or give audience unto embassages. He knew full well, that the Embassadors being not received and entertained, would straight to Carthage. Whereupon, he addressed forth his letters and curriers to the chief of the Barchine faction, to frame and prepare the minds of that side; so, as they of the other part might not gratify, or do any thing in favour of the Romans. By which means, besides that they were neither admitted by Annibal, nor audience given them, that embassy also was in vain, and took no effect at Carthage. Only Hannu notwithstanding the whole body of the Senate was against him, spake with great silence and assent of the hearers, by reason of his authority and reputation, and pleaded to the point of the breach of League, in this wise: "I have, quoth he, foretold and warned you in the name of the gods, who are the witnesses and judges of covenants and confederacies; I have, I say, admonished you, that ye should not send Amilcar his son, or any of his breed unto the Camp: for that neither the ghost and spirit, nor the progeny and race of that man can rest, and be quiet: nor the Roman League will ever be assured and established, so long as there remained one alive of the Barchine name and family. But sent ye have, for all my words, unto your armies, a youth boiling in ambition, enflamed with a covetous desire of being a King, and one that seeth no other way thereto, but by raising one war after another, to live guarded with armies and legions about him. In which action of yours, ye have as it were mistified dry fowl, and put oil to the fire: ye have, I say, fed that fire, wherewith ye now all are set a burning. Your armies now besiege Saguntum, from which by covenant and virtue of the League they are debarred. Within a while and shortly will the Roman legions lie in siege before Carthage, under the conduct and guidance, no doubt, of those gods, by whose support and aid in the former war, they were revenged for the breach of the accord and alliance. What? know ye not yet, either your enemy, or your selves, or the fortune of both nations? This good Captain and gentle General, forsooth of your making, would not admit and receive into his Camp Embassadors coming from our allies, and in the behalf also of our allies: wherewith he abolished the law of Nations. Howbeit, they having taken a repulse, from whence even the very Embassadors of enemies, are not wont to be repelled, are come unto you, and by virtue of their League demand amends of trespass and restitution or satisfaction for their damages. And presuppose the State be not touched nor culpable in this Action, they require no more but to have the author himself in person, who is the offender. The more gently they deale, and the longer it is ere they begin, the more obnoxious they will be, and continue with greater rigour (I fear me) if they once begin. Set before your eyes the Islands Ægeæ, and Eryx: and what for these four and twenty years past, ye have endured both by land and sea. Neither was this beardless boy our Captain then, but his father Amilcar himself, even a second Mars, as these his suppoits would have him. But what of that? We could not then according to our league, hold our hands, and let Tarentum in Italy alone: like as now we are doing with Saguntum. Therefore, both God and man took the matter in hand, and vanquished us in the end: and when we were at arguing and debating the case with discourse of words about this point, Whether Nation of the main had broken the league, the event of war, as an indifferent and equal judge, awarded victory where the right was. And Carthage it is, against which, Annibal even now hath reared manlets, towers, and other engines of assault: even now, battereth and shaketh he Carthage walls with the Ram. The ruins of Saguntum (God grant I be a false Prophet) will fall upon our heads, and the war begun with Saguntum, we must maintain against the Romans. How then? (will some man say) shall we yield Annibal unto them? I know well how small my authority is in this point, by reason of the old grudge and enmity between me and his father deceased. Howbeit, as I rejoiced, that Amilcar was dead, for that if he had lived still, we should ere now have warred with the Romans: so this very youth, an impe of his I hate and detest as the very fury and fire-brand of this war: whom I would have by my good will, not only to be rendered unto them, for to purge and expiate the breach of league: but if no man would challenge him for to be punished, I would award that he should be carried and transported as far as there is sea or land, and to be sent away thither from whence we might not once hear of him again, and where he might never trouble the quiet and peaceable state of this City any more. Over and besides, my opinion and resolution is, that some Embassadors be sent presently to Rome, to satisfy the Senate: and others also, with a message to Annibal, that he withdraw his forces from Saguntum, and with commission to render up Annibal himself into the Romans hands, according to the tenour of the League: and a third Embassage likewise to the Saguntins, for to make restitution and amends for their harms and losses already sustained. When Hannu had made an end of his speech, it was altogether needless, that any one man there should make reply, and debate the matter with him by way of Oration: the whole Senate was so possessed already and wrought for Annibal: and with one voice they blamed Hannu, and sounded it out, That he had made a bitter speech, and more favouring of a enemy, than Flaccus Velerius himself the Roman Embassador. After this, the Roman Embassadors had this answer returned. That the war began by the Saguntins, and not by Annibal. Also, that the people of Rome offered them injury, in preferring the Saguntins before the most ancient alliance of the Carthaginians. Whiles the Romans thus spent time in sending Embassages, Annibal having wearied his men, what with skirmishes, and what with trenching and raising mounts and fortifications, gave them rest some few daies and bestowed certain good guards to ward and keep the manlets and other engines of battery. In the mean season he encouraged his souldiers, and set their hearts on fire, partly, by pricking and provoking them to anger against their enemies, and partly, by drawing them on, and alluring them with hope of great rewards. But after he had once in a general assembly made proclamation, That the spoil and pillage should be the souldiers share: they were all so enraptured and enflamed, that if presently he had sounded the signal of battle, it seemed, that no force in the World had been able to resist them. The Saguntins, as they had some rest from skirmish, and continued certain daies, neither afflicting nor allured: so they gave not over labouring night and day, for to make up a new wall and counter-mine, on that side of the Town which lay open by reason of breaches. But after this, grew the assault more hot and furious than before: neither wist they well (the shouts and alarms were so divers and dissonant on every side) whether to come first, or where was most need of help and succour. Annibal himself was present in person to encourage and exhort his souldiers, where as the routing Tower was driven which was so high, that it overlooked all the mures and counter-fortifications of the City, and being on a approach, had near the walls, furnished as it was in every loft and story, with ordinance of quarrel shot, brakes, and other artillery, beat the defendants from off the walls, so as none durst abide upon them. Then Annibal, taking the time, and supposing that he had now a good opportunity presented unto him, sent about 500 Afflictors that were pioneers with pick-axes, mattocks and such like tools: to undermine the wall yea, and to dig into it from the very foundation. And that was no hard matter to do, for that the cement or mortar was not hardened and bound with lime, but tempered with earth and clay, after the old manner of building: and therefore the wall came tumbling down before it was hewn and wrought into: and through the wide breaches, whole troops of armed souldiers entered the Town: and withal, they seized one high place above the rest, wherupon they planted their artillery and ordinance of things and brakes, and cast a wall about it, that they might have within the very City a fort and bulwark of their own, like a Cast or overlook all. The Saguntins likewise raised another mure within along that side where the Town as yet was not taken: So that on both sides they made fortifications, and so a fought with all their might and main. But the Saguntins defending the inner parts, by little and little brought their Town daily into a smaller compass. And by that means, as also by reason of the long siege, as scarcity and want of all things grew more and more, to the expectation of forrain aid and succour was every daies than other: the Romans their only hope, being so far off, and their enemies to neer on every hand. Howbeit, the sudden rode and journey of Annibal against the Oretans and Carpetans, refreshed for a while their troubled and afflicted spirits. These two Nations being risen upon a discontentment of a freight matter and rigorous levy of souldiers, had staid and detained those Master-masters, that had in commission to take up all sufficient and able men for the wars, and so made some few and fear of rebellion: but being prevented in the beginning by the speedy coming of Annibal, were soon quiet, and laid down their arms. But the assault of Saguntum continued nevertheless. For Mababab, Himilco his son, whom Annibal had left behind as Lieutenant, so belittled himself, that neither the Townsmen nor the enemy found the mis or absence of the General. This Mababab had made some fortunate skirmishes, and with three rams shaken a good part of the wall, so as he showed to Annibal at his return, all lying along E and every place full of fresh ruins. Wherupon the army was presently brought against the very Castle of the City, where began a cruel and bloody conflict, with the slaughter of many on both sides, and one part of the said fortrefs was forced and won.

Afterwards there was some treaty of peace and agreement, by means of two persons, Alcon a Saguntine, and Alorcus a Spaniard, and some small hope there was of it. Alcon supposing he could somewhat prevail by way of request and entreating, without knowledge of the Saguntins, departed away by night to Annibal. But after that he saw, that with all his wangling he could do no good, but that heavy and intolerable articles and capitulations of peace were exhibited, as from a wrathful conqueror, of an Orator, proved to be a very traitor, and remained still in the camp with the enemies, laying, that he was sure to die, whosoever should move the Saguntins to peace, under those conditions. For demanded it was of the Saguntins, Impunito, to make restitution to the Turdetans of all harms and losses. Item, to deliver up all their gold and silver. Item, to quit the Town, and depart but with one sure of apparel a piece: and there to dwell, where the Carthaginians would appoint. When Alcon avouched plainly that the Saguntins would never accept of peace with these conditions, Alorcus replied again and said, That seeing all things else now failed them, their hearts also must needs come down, and fall likewise: and therewith promised to deliver unto them the tenor of the said peace, and to be a mediator and desier in the compiling thereof. At that time he served Annibal as a private souldier: howbeit, a publick friend he was, and an host and guest of old to the Saguntins. Who having in sight of all men yielded up his offensive arms, to the warders of the enemies, and passed the rampiers, was brought (for to him self desired) before the Governor and Provost of Saguntum. Thither came running presently, a number of all sort of people: but after the rest of the multitude were commanded to void, Alorcus was called into their Council house, and having audience given, made this or the like speech unto them. "If Alcon your countryman and fellow citizen, as he came from you to Annibal, for to treat about peace, had likewise brought back again unto you from Annibal the conditions and articles of peace, I needed not to have taken this journey: who am come unto you neither as an Orator from Annibal, nor yet as a fugitive. But seeing he hath remained with the enemy, either through your default or his own, I know not whither, if he pretended and fained cauleis of Alorcus a Spaniard, in

Saguntum.

"fear himself is to blame; but if they stand in danger that report a truth unto you, then are ye in great fault. I therefore, to the end ye should not be ignorant, but that there are conditions offered to you of life, of safety, and of peace; in regard of old amity and acquaintance, in regard (I say) of mutual intertainment long time between us, am now come unto you. And that ye may believe, that whatsoever you shall hear delivered from me, I speak it for your good, and for the favour of no man else; this one thing, if no more, may assure you, that neither so long as ye were able to make resistance by your own strength, nor all the while that ye hoped for aid from the Romans, I never made word or mention of peace unto you. But seeing now, that ye have not any hope at all from the Romans, and that your own forces and City walls, are able no longer to defend you: I present unto you a peace, more necessary, I confess, than equal and reasonable. Whereof you may have some hope, in these terms; namely, if as Annibal offereth and presenteth it like a conquerour, so you will hear of it, and accept thereof as conquered: if I say, ye will not make reckoning of that which you forgo as a loss and damage (saying by extremity all is the victors) but that which is left, again and advantage, yea, and freely given unto you. Your Town, whereof a great part is ruined by him, and which he hath taken in manner all, that he mindeth to put you by: your Lands and possessions he leaveth unto you, purposing to let you out a plot of ground, whereupon you may build your selves a new City. Your gold and silver all, as well common treasure as private monies and plate, he commandeth to be brought unto him: the bodies of your wives and children he is content to spare and save undefiled: upon this condition that you will depart without armor, and with a double suit of apparell a peece, and no more. These are the impositions that your enemy (a conquerour) demandeth: Which albeit they be hard and grievous, yet your fortune and fate is such, as you must allow thereof and be content. For mine own part, I am not out of hope, but when you have put all into his hands, he will deal better by you, and remit somewhat of these conditions. But I think ye were better to abide all this, rather than your bodies to be murdered, your wives and children to be ravished, and haled and forced before your faces, as the law and manner of war requireth.

To the hearing of this Oration the people had flocked about and by little and little entangled their own assembly with the Senators: and all of a sudden the chief of them withdrew themselves and departed, before answer was given: and brought all their silver and gold, as well publick as private, into the market place: and when they had cast it into a great fire made halflie for that purpose, most of them threw themselves into it headlong after. Whereupon there being a fear and trouble already throughout the whole City: behold another outcry besides and noise was heard from the C. file. For a certain Tower that had been a long time battered and shaken, fell down; and at the breach thereof, a band of Carthaginians made entry, and gave sign to their General that the City was abandoned of the ordinary Watchmen and corps de guard of the enemies, and altogether lay open and naked. Annibal supposing it was no wisdom to neglect and slack to good an opportunity, with all his forces at once assailed the City, and was in the turning of an hand: and presently gave order that all above fourteen years of age should be put to the sword. A cruel commandment, no doubt, but yet needful, as afterwards it was well seen in the end and upshot of all. For who would have pared and taken pity of those, that either thus themselves with their wives and children into their ditches, and burnt them over their own heads, or in their armor, gave not over fight before they died? Thus was the Town won with exceeding store of pillage within it. And albeit much was spoiled on purpose by the owners, and that in the massacre and execution they had no respect of age in the fury of their anger: and for all this, the prisoners fell to the fouldiers there: yet certain it is, that of the goods fold in port-fale, there arose a good round piece of money: and much rich household stuff and costly apparell was sent to Carthage.

Some there be that write, how Saguntum was won the eight Month after the siege began: and that from thence Annibal departed to winter in new Carthage: as also, that the fifth month after he departed from Carthage, he arrived in Italy. Which being so, it cannot be, that P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius should be the Consuls, unto whom both in beginning of the siege, the Saguntum Embassadors were sent: and who also in their year of government fought with Annibal, the one near the river Ticinus, and both together a good while after, at Trebia. And we must say, that either all these things were achieved in shorter time a good deal, or else that Saguntum in the beginning of that year, wherein P. Cornelius and T. Sempronius were Consuls, began not to be besieged: but finally was forced and won. For the battel at Trebia could not be so long after as to fall in the year wherein Cn. Servilius and C. Flaminius were Consuls. For that Flaminius entered his Consulship at Ariminum, and was created by T. Sempronius, Consul, who after the battel of Trebia came to Rome to elect Consuls, and after the Election was ended, returned again to his army, into the wintering harbours.

About the same time, as well the Embassadors which returned from Carthage, brought word to Rome that there was nothing but war: as also tidings came, of the destruction of Saguntum. And so greatly grieved and sorrowed the Senators, and pitied withal their allies thus unworthily massacred, so alienated in themselves they were, that they had not sent aid in time, so deeply offended and incensed with indignation against the Carthaginians, yea, and so mightily feared the loss of the very main chance at home, as if the enemy had been already at the gates of the City: that in very deed, having their minds possessed at one time, with so many troubles, they rather trembled and quaked for fear, than setled themselves to consultation and counsel. For they considered and saw very well, that neither a more fierce and warlike enemy ever encountered with them: nor the State of Rome was at any time so reddy, so feeble, and so undispole to war. Moreover, it was commonly said, that the Sardinians, Corfians, Hiprians, and Albians had rather challenged the Romans, and made bravados of war, than exercised and toiled them in any hard conflicts: as for the Gauls, they were but tumults, rumors, and alarms which they made, and no wars indeed: but the Carthaginians their enemies, they were old beaten fouldiers, inured and hardened for this 23 years in most difficult service of war, amongst the Spanish Nations, and went away ever with victory: first trained and practised under Amilcar, then under Asdrubal, and now lastly under the conduct of Annibal, a right hardy and valiant Captain. Considering moreover, that now he cometh fresh from the ruin of Saguntum, a most rich City, and passeth straight-ways over Iberus: drawing after him a train of so many nations of the Spaniards, exercised already by him in the wars: and will no doubt raise the Gauls, a people at all times ready to take arms: so as now they were to wage war in Italy, with no more but all the World besides, yea, and under the walls of Rome, for the defence of the City.

Now had the Provinces been nominated and appointed before to the Consuls: but then were they commanded by casting lots, to part them between them. To Cornelius fell Spain: to Sempronius Affrick and Sicily. Likewise decreed it was, that for that year, there should be levied six Legions of Romans: and of allies, as many as they thought good: also that as great a navy as might be, should be rigged and set out. So there were enrolled 24000 Roman footmen, and of horsemen 1800: of allies 44000 foot, and 4000 horse, 220 galleys, with five course of oars on a side, and twenty foists, were set afloat. After this, a bill was preferred unto the people, that it might please them to determine and grant, that war should be proclaimed against the people of Carthage. And in regard of that war, there was also a solemn supplication holden through the City: wherein the people adored and prayed the Gods to prosper and bring to an happy end, this war which the people of Rome had determined. And betwixt the Consuls thus were the forces divided: Sempronius had the conduct of two Legions, consisting of four thousand foot, and three hundred horse a piece: also of allies sixteen thousand foot, one thousand and eight hundred horse, besides 160 galleys, and twelve barks or foists. With this power for Land and Sea service, was Sempronius sent into Sicily, from thence to passe over into Affrick, in case the other Consul were able to impeach the Carthaginians for coming into Italy. Cornelius had the charge of a smaller power: for that L. Manlius the Pretor, was sent in person into France with a sufficient army: but in the number of ships especially, was Cornelius scantied 60 galleys of five banks of oars he had, and no more, (for it was supposed that the enemy would neither come by Sea, nor fight in that kind of service) and two Roman Legions with the full proportion of horsemen, and 14000 footmen of allies, with 1200 men of arms. That Province of France (in those parts where the Carthaginians was expected) had that year two Legions of Roman footmen, 14000 allies, besides 2000 horse from them, and 6000 of the Romans. When all things were thus prepared, to the end that before war began, it might appear they dealt by order of law, and with justice; and that all due complements might be performed, they sent certain grave and ancient personages in Embassies into Affrick, to wit, Q. Fabius, M. Livius, L. Aemilius, C. Licinius, and Q. Bibulus. Fittly to demand and know of the Carthaginians, Whether Annibal by their publick warrant and authority, besieged and assailed Saguntum? then, if they avowed the act, and stood to it (as they were like to do) confessing that it was done by the counsel of the State: to give defiance, and proclaim open war against them. The Romans being arrived at Carthage, had audience given in their Senat-house: where, after Q. Fabius had briefly demanded nothing else, but that one thing which he had in charge and commission, then a principal Senator amongst the Carthaginians stood up and said:

"Your former Embassage, my masters of Rome, was even as vain as this, when ye required and would needs have Annibal to be yielded unto you: as if he had besieged Saguntum of his own head. And as for this, that you come with now, howsoever in words it seem more mild and smooth, in very deed and in truth it is more rude and rigorous: for then, was Annibal only charged and demanded to justice; but now are we both urged to acknowledge a fault, and also forced to make restitution and satisfaction out of hand: as if we had avowed and confessed the action. For mine own part, of this mind am I, that the case ought thus to be laid, and the question brought to this issue, not whether Saguntum was besieged by a private person, or publick Council: but whether by right, or wrongfully. For to enquire and examine whether our citizen and subject have done this by our advice, or of himself, pertaineth to us alone, as also to censure and punish him accordingly: with you we are to debate this point only, Whether it might stand with the league to do it, or no? And therefore since it pleaseth you, that we should dispute and distinguish, between the action of a General, warranted by the publick State, and an enterprise proceeding from his own motive; ye shall understand, that there was indeed a league between you and us, contracted by Lutatius the Consul, wherein there is a clause, comprising the allies of both parties: as concerning the Saguntins (who as then were none of your confederates) there was not one word at all therein: but in that league, (ye will say) that was contracted with Asdrubal, the Saguntins are expressly named and excepted: to which I have nothing to plead, but even that which I have learned of you. For ye your selves denied, that ye were bound to stand

i. 200 to a Legion.

"to that accord which C. Lucullus your Consul first made with us, because it passed neither by consent of the nobles, nor grant of the people. Whereupon, there was another league new drawn out, and by public agreement enacted. If you then, be not tied to observe you leagues, unless they be authorized by the nobles, or ratified by the people no more can the league of Asdrubal oblige us, which he concluded without our privy and knowledge. Forbear therefore to speak either of Saguntum, or Iberus : and what your mind hath so long conceived, let it hatch now at length, and bring it forth. Then Q. Fabius the Roman Ambassador, having made a hollow lap within the plait and fold of his hide gown, Here quoth he, within this lap, we present and offer war and peace unto you, take whether ye will. At which word, they all cried out at once with as great stomach and boldness : Many even which you will yourself. Whereat he let his robe loose again : Why then, there is war, quoth he, take it amongst you, let come say they all again, and welcome be it : and as willingly as we accept thereof, so shall we follow and manage it as thoroughly.

This direct demand, and round denouncing of war, seemed more for the honor of the Romans, than to make much dispute and argument about the right of the cause, and of the covenants : a vain matter before, but now especially, after the winning and destruction of Saguntum. For if the question were to be decided by words and reasoning, that league of Asdrubal which was exchanged for the former of Lucullus, was not the same nor the tenor thereof to be compared : seeing that in the accord of Lucullus, this branch and proviso was expressly added, [That it should stand good, and be ratified, if the people approved thereof :] but in this of Asdrubal, there was no such condition at all : and besides, the covenant for so many years (pace during his life, was so established and confirmed, and no word to the contrary : that when the very maker and author thereof was dead, there was no change and alteration. And yet, put case they should have stood upon the former alliance the Saguntins were therein well enough compelled and provided for : in that the allies of either part were expected and comprehended. For neither was this clause added [They who at that time were allies] nor yet were they excepted again, who afterwards should become, or be admitted allies. And seeing that it was lawful to entertain new confederates, who is it that would judge it reasonable, either that no man should be received into amity for any good desert whatsoever : or being once received into protection, should not be defended accordingly : Provided always, that no allies of the Carthaginians should either be solicited to rebellion, or received again, if of themselves they once revolted.

The Roman Ambassadors as they were commanded at Rome called the seas from Carthage into Spain, for to visit all the Cities, and to see whether they could either draw them to their society, or withdraw them from the Carthaginians. And first they came to the Burgundians, where being courteously entertained (for weary they were of the Carthaginians government) they stirred up many other nations beyond Iberus, to have a desire to change for a new world. From thence they came to the Volicians, whose notable answer reported throughout all Spain turned away all other States from banding with the Romans : for thus in a solemn assembly a sage and ancient father among them framed his answer. With what face can ye (Romans) require us to prefer your friendship and amity before the Carthaginians : seeing that the Saguntins who did the same, have been more cruelly by you their allies betrayed, than by their enemies the Carthaginians destroyed? By my advice go and seek you considerers there where the worst calamity and misery of Saguntum is not known. The lamentable ruin of which City, as it is a doleful example : so it shall be a notable warning to all nations of Spain, that no man ever after repeat truth in the protection and society of the Romans. Whereupon, they were commanded to depart the borders of the Volicians immediately, and in no Diet or Council of Spain, had they afterwards any better entertainment, and more courteous language. Thus having in vain gone through all Spain, they took their way into Gaul : where they saw a strange sight, and a fearful fashion : for all in armour (such was the guise and manner of the country) they came to their public assemblies : and there these Ambassadors after they had set out in goodly words the greatness and glory of the people of Rome, and highly magnified their large empire and dominion, and thereupon made request, that they would not give the Carthaginians leave (who minded to make war upon Italy) for to pass through their Cities and Towns : herat they set up such a laughter, with a certain grumbling and murmuring, that scarcely could the youth be filled and quired by the Magistrates and Elders : so foolish, so foolish, and shameless seemed this demand, in their conceit : that they should once imagine that the Gauls were such Allies, as they would be content (rather than to let the war pass into Italy) to avert and turn it upon themselves, and to suffer ye, and offer their own territories to be spoiled and foraged, for the safety (soforth) of other mens Lands, who were but meer aliens and strangers unto them. The noise and garboil being at length hushed and appeased, this answer was returned to the Ambassadors : That neither the Romans had deserved it well, nor should the Carthaginians so ill at their hands, that they should take arms either for Romans, or against the Carthaginians. But contrary-wile, they were advertised, that some of their nation, whereby the people of Rome driven out of the marches and confines of Italy put to pay tribute, ye, and indured other outrages and indignities. The like demands and answers passed to and fro in other Councils and Assemblies of Gaul : neither could they meet with any friendly entertainment, or have peaceable words given them, before they came to Maffia : where, after diligent inquiry, and faithful search made by their allies, they had true advertisements, that Annibal

Aforehand had wrought the hearts of the Gauls to his own purpose, and was possessed of them : but they understood withal, that they were not like to continue long in good terms of kindness and favor even to him, (so fierce and savage, so untractable are they, and untamed by nature) unless their Princes and Rulers be ever and anon well fed and plied with gold, whereof that nation of all other is most greedy and covetous. The Roman Ambassador, having thus gone their circuit over all the States of Spain and Gaul, returned to Rome : not long after that the Consul, had taken their journey into their Provinces : where they found the whole City possessed with the expectation of war : to rise and currant was the rumor and bruit abroad, that the Carthaginians were already passed over the River Iberus.

B Annibal after the winning of Saguntum, had retired himself to winter in new Carthage : and there having intelligence what had been done and decreed as well at Rome, as at Carthage (in Africa) : and that he was reputed not only the Captain General and Conductor, but also the very author and cause of all this war : so soon as he had divided and sold the rest of the booty and pillage that remained, thought good now to make no longer delays, but assembled the souldiers of the Spanish Nation, and to them he spake in this manner. My truly friends and loyal confederates, I am persuaded, that ye yourselves do see as well as I, now that all the States of Spain are in peace and quietness, that either ye are to make an end of souldiery, and all our forces to be cass'd and discharged from service : or else that ye must remove the war into other Lands. For so shall these Nations prosper and flourish, and not only enjoy the blessings of peace, but also reap the fruits of war, if we will seek to gain riches, and to acquire glory and honor from others. Since therefore we are to war shortly far from home, and doubt it is, when you shall see again your houses, and whatsoever there is dear unto you : if any of you be desirous to visit home, his wife and children, kinsfolk, and friends, I give him licence and free passport. But I command you, that ye withdraw, to show yourselves here again before me, in the beginning of the next spring : that with the help of God, we may in hand with that war, whereby we shall purchase both worship and wealth. There was not one in a manner but well accepted of this liberty so frankly offered by himself, and were desirous to have a sight of house and land, both for that every one sorely longed for their friends and kindred, and forelaw in farther time to come, a greater mile, and cause of more longing after them. This rest all Winter time, between their travellings, and shortlily they were soon alter to endure, refreshed as well their bodies as their minds, and prepared them to abide and endure all new pains whatsoever. So in the very prime of the spring, according to the Edit aforesaid, they all assembled together again. Annibal having taken a muster and survey of the aids that were sent unto him from all those Nations, went to Gades : and there, to Hercules he paid his old vows, and bound himself to new, if the rest of his enterprises should succeed well and have good success. After this, dividing and casting care indifferently, as well for offensive as defensive war, doubting lest whilst he went by Land through Spain and France into Africa, should lie open and naked to the Romans from Sicily : he purposed to fortifie and make that part sure with strong garrisons. In lieu whereof, he sent for fresh supply out of Africa, specially of Archers and Javelotiers, and those lightly armed : to the end, that the Africans might serve in Spain, and the Spaniards in Africa : like (both the one and the other) to prove the better souldiers, far from their own countries, and being bound as it were, with mutual oaths and pledges. So he sent into Africa 13850 footmen, armed with light targets, and 870 slingers of the Islands * Baleares, 1200 Horsemen also out of sundry Nations. Which forces he disposed, partly for the defence of Carthage, and partly to be divided through Africa, for the guard thereof. He sent withal, certain Commissioners into all their Cities to take up souldiers, and enrolled 4000 of his chosen youths, who should be brought to Carthage, there to lie in garrison, and to receive for hostages. And supposing that Spain was not to be neglected, and the rather, because he was not ignorant how the Roman Ambassadors had visited the same round to see how they could sollicite and work the Princes and rulers to their mind, he committed the charge of that Province to his brother Asdrubal, a valiant and hardy man : and furnished him with good forces, especially out of Africa, to wit, 1850 Africans footmen, 300 Ligurians, 300 Baleares Islanders. To this power of footmen, three hundred Horse of the * Libyphoenicians, a Nation mixt of Carthaginians and Africans, of * Numidians and Moors, that coast upon the Ocean, 1900, with a small corner of 200 Horsemen of Bergeres out of Spain. And because he should want no manner of Land help, fourteen Elephants besides. Moreover, there was a fleet allowed him for the defence of the Sea-coasts. For by what forces and service the Romans had before got victory, thereby it was likely, that they would still maintain and continue their war, so Carthage therefore of five barks of oars, he had at Sea, two of four, and five of three. But of the five barked galleys aforesaid, he had no more but two and thirty, fitted and well appointed with rowers and mastmains, and so were the five of three barks.

From Gades, the army of Annibal returned to winter in Carthage : and from thence he passed by the City * Etrusca, and marched forward with his forces to Iberus and the Sea-coasts. Where it is reported, that in his sleep he dreamed, and saw a vision namely a young man of divine shape and semblance, saying That he was sent from Jupiter to guide him in his voyage into Italy, and willed him therefore to follow him, and in no wise to turn his eyes from him one way or other. Also, that at the first he being scared and a little doubtful, durst not look either above or behind him, but followed him still afterwards (as man by nature are curious) when he cast and discouried in his mind, what it might be, that he was forbidden to see behind him, he could not hold and rule his eyes, but must needs look back: and then he beheld behind him, a serpent of huge greatness coming amain, and all the way as it went, to bear down trees, groves, and thickets: and after all that, he perceived a great storm and tempest ensuing, with mighty thunder-claps. Now when he was desirous to know what this great confusion and strange light might signify, he heard a voice, saying, That it betokened the ruins and wasting of Italy: wiling him therefore, to go still forward with his voyage, and search no further into the secrets of the Gods, but leave them to the hidden destinies. Annibal right joyous at this vision, passed over Iberus with his whole power, divided into three parts, having left certain before him with gifts and rewards, into all parts whereas he should march with his army, to gain the hearts of the Gauls; and withal, to seek out and discover the passages of the Alpes. So he crossed the River Iberus with 50000 foot, and 12000 Horse, strong. After this, he subdued the Illyerets, the Bargaulins, Aulians, and Aquitain, which lyeth under the hills Pyrenae. The government of all these Nations, he let over to Hanno, that he might have at his command the freights which joyed France and Spain together. Unto whom he allowed 10000 footmen, and 1000 horse, for to defend and keep in obedience those countries. After that his army was on foot, and began to march through the forest Pyrenaeus, and that there ran amongst the barbarous people a more certain bruit, That they were to make war with the Romans; that they departed not, for fear so much of the war, as the tedious journey and unpassable wayes of the Alpes. Annibal, considering that either to recal them, or to keep them by violence, was a dangerous matter: for fear lest thereby he should provoke the fiercest attacks of the rest; sent home again above 7000 of such, as he perceived to be weary, and to have no mind to the service; and made semblance withal, that the Carpatens were by his leave discharged. And doubting lest long lay and ease there, might tempt his souldiers, and give occasion of mutinies, with the rest of his forces he passed Pyrenaeus, and pitched his camp before the Town Illyopia. The Gauls, albeit they were advertised, that it was Italy, at which Annibal stood: yet became the bruit was blazed, That the Spaniards beyond Iberus, were by force subdued, and strong garisons placed in their Cities: certain Nations of them, for fear of servitude and bondage, stole up in arms, and assembled together at Rosifion. Which being related to Annibal, he fearing here, that they would stay him in his journey, than endanger him in fight; sent certain Orators, Embassadors to their Princes and great Lords, to signify unto them, "That himself in person would gladly parle with them, and that it should be in their choice whether they would come nearer to Illyeria, or himself go forward to Rosifion: where, being near together, they might more easily meet and confer. For as he was willing to receive them into his camp, and would be glad to see them there: so he would not think much of his pains, to repair unto them himself, as one that was thither come, as a friend and guest unto France, and not as an enemy; and would not by his good will draw a sword (if the Gauls would let him alone) before he were entered within Italy. And thus much verily passed by messengers and couriers between. But so soon as the Lords of France, who presently removed their camp to Illyeria, were come willingly enough to Annibal, as being bribed and corrupted with money and presents, they gave his army good leave to pass through their confines along the Town Rosifion.

In Italy, this while, the Embassadors of Marseilles had brought no other word to Rome, but that Annibal was only gone over Iberus: but, by that time, the Boii had stirred up the Insubrians to mutiny, and were revolted themselves, even as if he had passed the Alpes already: which they did not so much upon old rancour and malice to the people of Rome, as for that, they took it ill, and were discontented, that there were Colonies brought lately into the Gauls country, to be planted about Pedun, Placentia, and Cremona. Whereupon they arose suddenly, took arms, and entered by force into those parts, and made foot work and fearful havoc, that not only the country people and villagers, but also the three Roman Commissioners called Triumvirs, to wit, Ca. Lucatius, Ant. Servilius, and Titus Annius, who were come to set out the Lands and territory to the said Colonies, not misting the walls of Placentia, fled to Mutina. That Lucatius was one of them, it is not doubted; but some records have Q. Asinius and C. Herennius. Instead of Ant. Servilius and T. Annius; and others again, nominate P. Cornelius Asinus and C. Papirius Maf. It is uncertain also, whether they work the Embassadors sent to the Boii, to relation of exposing the matter, that had abuse offered them; and were evil treated; or that the Triumvirs above said, were set upon and assailed, as they were mauling over the Lands. But whiles they were thus besieged at Mutina, and these Boians being at siege (a nation so ill at altogether in the fear of assailing Towns, and likewise of all other most cowardly, to attempt any martial exploits) whiles they lay idly about the walls, and never once advanced against them, they began to make shew of a treaty for peace. Whereupon the Roman Embassadors or Commissioners, being by the chief of the Gauls called out to parle, were not only against law, offensions, but with breach also of their faithful promise, and word which they had given them, apprehended: and the Gauls said plainly, they would not let them go, unless their hostages were delivered them again. These being touching the Embassadors being reported and Mutina with the garison in danger: L. Manlius the Pretor, in great anger and indignation, brought his army in more hast than good order, before Mutina. There were in those days great woods about the high way, and most part of the country wilds

A wilds and wafts, not inhabited: where he having engaged himself without his espials, was intrapped within an ambush; so that many of his men, and hardly recovered the open champion country. There he incamped himself strongly: and for that the Gauls had no heart to assault, nor hope to win the camp, his souldiers courages were refreshed: albeit it was well known, that they had received a shrewd foil, and knew their forces to be much impaired. Then began he to march on, in his journey aforesaid. And so long as he led his power through the open country, the enemies were not in sight: but when they were entered the forests again, they let upon the rearward of them: where, besides the great fright and damage of all the rest, 800 Roman souldiers were left dead in the place, and the enemies went away with six ensignes. But afterwards, the Gauls ceased to molest B and trouble, and the Romans gave over to fear, so soon as they were passed, and escaped the rough, umbrous, and unpassable forests. And the Romans being now able in the open and champion country to march with safety, made halt to get to Tanetum, a village near unto the Pa. There within a fort which they made for the time, with the help and provision of victuals by the river, and the aid also of certain Gauls called Brixians, they despatched themselves against the enemies, whose number daily increased. After this sudden tumult was reported at Rome, and that the LL. of the Senat were advertised, that besides the war with the Carthaginians, the Gauls were up in arms: they gave order, that C. Aufidius the Pretor should go (with one Roman Legion, and four thousand allies, who were enrolled by the Consuls in a new levy) to aid Manlius: who without any skirmish (by reason that the enemies were fled for fear) came to Tanetum. Also P. Cornelius having newly levied one Legion in lieu of that which was sent with the Pretor, departed from the City of Rome, and passing with 60 Gauls along the coasts of Tuscan, Liguria, and so forward of the S. Iez, shortly arrived at Assisina, and encamped neer the next mouth of Rho da us, (for the river is divided into many branches, and so discharged it fell into the Sea) being not fully of belief that Annibal as yet had passed over the mountains Pyrenae. But when he understood that he was ready even then to pass Rhodanus also; and doubting in what place to encounter and meet him, his people as yet not well recovered, after their being sea-sick: he sent before, 300 elect men of arms, guided by the Massilians, and certain Gauls that came to aid for to discover all, and to take a full view of the enemies lately without danger.

Annibal having appeared the rest of the country, either for fear or by means of money, was now D come into the country of the Volcans, a puissant people and a valiant. Their inhabitation along both the banks of Rhodanus: and mistrusting that they were not able to defend their Lands against the Carthaginians, on that side of the River which lay to them: because they might have the whole River to serve them for a good defence and rampier, transported over the *Rho*ne all in manner that ever they had, and kept the bank on the other side. The rest of the inhabitants neer to the River, and even those also in whose territories Annibal had set foot already, both he himself with gifts allured to get together from all parts shipping, and to frame new vessels: and they of themselves likewise, were as willing to have his army transported, and their own country eased and delivered (they cared not how soon) of so great a multitude of troublesome guests. Whereupon, there was got together an huge number of lighters, barges, and boats especially, which E were made in hast without great workmanship; in which the people inhabiting thereby nled to transport wares and commodities from one to another. Other new wharries also, the Gauls began first to make of the hollowed trunks of trees; and after them, the souldiers for that they had both store of timber and saw the workmanship but sleight and easy, made in hast certain bottoms, such as they were, like troughs without form or fashion, regarding no handiworkmen at all, so they would but store on the water, and receive burden, in which they might convey over themselves and that which they had.

Now when they had prepared and made all ready for their passage, the enemies on the other side right against them, kept and covered all the bank along with men and Horse, putting them to much trouble and fear. Annibal therefore to withdraw them from that place, commanded Hanno the son of Bomilcar, at the first watch of the night, to go up the stream along the river side, one day's journey, with part of the forces, and those most of them Spaniards: and wheresoever he should espie a convenient place, to cross the river, and to land as secretly as he could: and then to fight about with his men, that when need were, he might charge upon the back of the enemy. Thereupon were appointed certain Gauls for guides: who from thence conducted them some 3 miles above, to a little Island compassed about with the river, which here spread out in breadth by reason that it divided it self, and the by the channel was not so deep: where they shewed him a place of passages. There, in all hast they cut down and hewed timber, and made boats, to set over Horse, and man and other burthen. The Spaniards made no more ado, but fastening their apparel to vessels of leather like bladders, full of wind, and laying their bucklers thereupon, far aloft and tossed over nimble. The rest of the army also, with jynnyng planks and troughs together, was let over. Where having encamped neer the river, as being weary with their night journey, and toilsome work, they settled one day to refresh themselves, whiles their Captain studied and was occupied, to execute his commission and his intended service in good and convenient time. The morrow after, they removed from thence, and gave knowledge by smoke that they were passed over and not far off. Which when Annibal perceived, for that he would not lose the vantage of that time, he gave signal to his men also to get over the water. Now had the footmen already their boats prepared and fitted. And the course and ranks of barges (which to receive and break break the force of the current from above, transported the Horsemen, besides the Horses that swam after) made for the small boats that passed beneath, a gentle and calm water. For a number of Horses swam after the ships, haled by the bridle reins which were tied to the poulps, besides those, which being saddled and bridled, and fitted to serve the men of arms so soon as ever they were landed, were belovew in barges and ferry boats. The Gauls stood upon the bank with loud hooping, hollowing, yelling and hinging after their manner, who shaking their targets over their heads, brandishing and flourishing their swords in their right hands, shewed themselves ready to receive them, albeit to great a number and World of barges and boats full in their eye over against them, together with an hideous roaring of the water, might have scared them: besides loud noises of mariners and ouldiers, who laboured and strived to break the power and force of the water, and who being on the other side of the bank encouraged their fellows that were passing over. And thus frightened enough as they were, with the tumult and noise presented before their faces: behold there arose a more fearful and terrible outcry behind their backs, upon the forcing and winning of their camp by Hanno. And himself in person came soon after: so that they were put in fear on both sides. For not only out of the ships there was a great multitude got to Land, but also a power at their backs unlooked for, came forward and charged them. The Gauls, after they had made some resistance, and saw they were easily put back; brake through, where they espied the way to lie most open, and in great fear they fled divers ways into their Towns and Villages. Annibal then, having conveyed over the rest of his forces by leisure, cared no more now for any French stir and tumults, and so encamped himself. But for the transporting of the Elephants, I suppose there were sundry devices: and certainly, how ever it was, the thing is diversely recorded. Some say, that when the Elephants were gathered together upon the bank, the most courageous and fiercest of them all, was chafed, angered, and railed of purpose by his master or keeper: and when he was pursued of the beast, and to save himself fled from him, and took the River, thereupon the Elephant followed after him as he swam, and so drew after him the whole drove of the rest: and as any one of them (learning the depth) failed to wade, the very force of the River carried him to the other side. But it is more credibly and certainly reported, that they were conveyed over in certain barges: which as it was a safer way and surer course before it was practised, so when it was done and past, it was more easily credited. They could therefore one vessel or barge, 200 foot long, and 50 foot broad, to reach from the strand side and the shore into the River: which because it should not be carried down with the course and stream of the water, they fastned to the bank above with many strong ropes, and like as it had been a bridge, they covered it over with earth, that the beasts might boldly go thereon as upon the firm ground. Now there was another barge full as broad, but of length only 100 foot; fitted and appointed to pass the River, and was tied and coupled thereto: and when as the Elephants (driven after the females going before) upon the steady barge, as it had been upon a cauley, were gone over into the lesser which was fastned unto it: then presently was it loosed from the bonds wherewith it was slightly tyed, and so haled and drawn by certain galley boats, directed with reins through to the other bank. Thus when the first were landed, they went for more still, until they were all set over: and verily, so long as they were driven on still, as it were upon a long bridge, they nothing feared: the foremost only were afraid when the barge was loosened, and they parted from their fellows, and so were carried away into the wide and deep River, where thronging and struggling together, and justling one another, they made some trouble, whilst they that were outmost gave back from the water as much as they could, until such time as very fear (when they saw all about them nothing but water) caused them to be quiet. Some of them also liking beasts as they were, and surely, tell out into the River, but by reason of their heaviness, they stood sure, and casting their Governors, they sought the sounds foot by foot, by little and little, and got safe to Land.

Whiles the Elephants were thus transporting over, Annibal in the mean time had sent 500 Numidian light Horsemen to the Romans camp, as espials to discover the ground, where they were to learn what forces they had, and listen after their designs and purposes. This wing and troop was encountered by three hundred Roman Horsemen, sent as is aforesaid, from the mouth of Rhodanus: where there was a more cruel skirmish than for so small a number, for besides many hurt, there were slain on both sides in a manner alike: but in the end, the fear and flight of the Numidians gave the victory to the Romans, being now already much travelled and wearied: on whose part (being the winners) were slain 160. not all Romans, but some Gauls: and on the Roman side who were overcome, there dyed above 200. This beginning and prognostication as it were of the war, as it portended and presaged an happy end and success of the whole unto the Romans: so it shewed plainly, that the victory would hang long in equal balance, not without much effusion of blood, and danger of their part. The conflict being thus determined, they returned each one to his own Captain. As for Scipio, he could not resolve to take any course himself: but according as he saw the plots and enterprises of the enemy, so to frame his own. And Annibal gaining uncertain whether to go forward with his journey begun, into Italy, or to give battle unto the first army of the Romans that came in his way and met him: was drawn away from all present conflict by occasion of the coming of the Embassadors of the Boii and of a great Lord and Potentate, called Metalus who promising to be his guides unto him in his voyage, and complaining in his perils, thought it good, and gave advice to invade and set upon Italy first of all before any other war, whilst forces were entire in heart, no where put to the hazard, and to give them as it were the first hand. The common multitude of the Carthaginians (for that the former war was not clean forgot and out of remembrance) feared very their enemies, but more their inimitable journey, and the Alps especially, the name whereof to men not experienced, was very fearful and terrible. Whereupon, Annibal being now resolute to march onward in his journey, and to pass into Italy assembled his people to an audience, and by sundry means, as well by way of rebuke, as also by encouragement, windeth and allayeth the minds of his souldiers. "I marvel (quoth he) what sudden fright or new fear hath possessed your hearts that ever before now have been undaunted: who have lived to many years, and always won the victory; who departed not out of Spain, before that all those Nations and Lands, which lie enclosed between two divers Seas, were brought in subjection to the Carthaginians: who taking indignation and great disdain, that the people of Rome should require all thine to be yecced unto justice (as offenders and malefactors) that had besieged Saguntum, have thereupon pified their erum, with this intent even to destroy and extirp the Roman name, and to let free the whole world out of their servitude and bondage: no man thought it long then of his travel from East to West, from the setting of the sun to the rising of the same: now when as ye see the greater part (by far) of our journey done and past, the forest and mountain of Pyrene beyond more fierce and ruclations surrounded, that great river Rhodanus, passed over, manage the hearts of many thousand Gauls that would have impeached your passage yea, and the rest of his ministration over one now Italy, when you are within the gut of the Alps to the other side whereof hitherto hath been so close and faint as it were, and stand still tired at the very gates of the enemies. Why? what other thing take ye the Alps to be but high hills? And imagine they be higher than the Cliffs of Pyrene: what? there is no land (I am sure) that reaches up to heaven, and no place for men unsufferable. But for the Alps, they are inhabited and they are tilled: they breed and feed living creatures and cattle: and are they a terrible and passable for some few, and unpassable for whole armies? These very Embassadors whom you see here, flew not over the Alps with wings, neither were their ancestors time out of mind horn and bred there but came from other parts as strangers and inhabited Italy before yea, and oftentimes have gone over the same Alps hug multitudes together with their wives and children, in manner of travellers and pilgrims that seek new countries to inhabit: what should there be unpassable then or impossible for the armed souldier, crying about him nothing but instruments of war? For the winning of Saguntum, what perils were adventured, what travails were endured and illawarded for eight months space? Should any thing then seem so hard and difficult as to flay them in their enterprise once begun, who aim at no less than to conquer Rome, the head City of the world? And have the Gauls indeed forced and won therein times past, whilst the Carthaginians despair now to come unto? Therefore, either ye must confess your selves inferior in stomach and valor to that nation, which is so oft (the dayes passed) by you have been vanquished: or else make reckoning with assured hope that the goodly fair fields that lie between Tyberis and the walls of Rome are the end of your journey.

When in these terms he had exhorted and encouraged his souldiers, he commanded them to Eke their repast and repole, to cherish and refresh their bodies, and to prepare themselves for the march. The morrow after he departed cross from the banks of Rhodanus, and entered the inland parts of France: not for that it was the more direct way to the Alps, but because he thought the further he went from the Sea side, in so much less danger he should be of meeting the Romans, with whom he was minded to fight, before he was arrived into Italy. After that he had travelled four dayes journey, he came to an Island where the two rivers Arar and Rhodanus issuing out of sundry parts of the Alps and taking a direct course, after they have run through a good part of the country fall at length together and meet in one and the ground lying between is called by the name of the Island. Near there, inhabit the Allobroges, a Nation even in thole dayes nothing inferior, either in wealth and puissance, or in fame and reputation to any people or state. For the Gauls whatsoever, But at that very time there was some discord and variance among them, by occasion of two brethren who were at strife for the crown and Kingdom: the elder (whose name was Brancus, and had before enjoyed the Seignory) was deposed and thrust out by his younger brother, and a lively crew of the youth: who as they had less right on their side, so they were the mightier. The deciding of this variance was referred and put over unto Annibal, in as good and fit a time for his purpose, as he could have wished: and his forthwith was made the umpire and judge, to determine whether of them should be King: who restored the elder to the Kingdom: like as it would have been adjudged by the award of the Senators and Nobles of the country. For which benefit and good turn, he was rewarded with victual, and store of all things abundantly yea and with rayment and apparel, which he was driven to provide aforesaid, for the same that went of the Alps, which for their coldness were in great discredit.

Having thus appeased the debate of the Allobroges, and minding now to set forward to the Alps, he would forgo the direct straight way, but turned on the left hand to the Triacims, and from thence passing by the frontiers of the Vocontins, he marched into the Triacims: and never was he stayed or impeached in his journey, before that he came to the River Durance, which descending also out of the Alps, is of all other Rivers in France most hard to be passed over: for although it carry with it a might force of water, yet will it bear no vessel, beane it is kept and restrained with no banks, but running at once by many divers channells, maketh ever new foords, and caſteth up new ſhelves and whirl-pits; (for which cauſe alſo a footman hath much ado to wade therethrough, and knoweth not the foords) beſides, it rolleth down round ſtones and pibbles, whereby there is no ſure nor ſafe footing for him that would wade through. And it chanced at that time, that it ſwelled and was riſen high by fall of rain, and by land-floods, and caſteth them to have very much to do, that paſſed over it: and over and beſides all other difficulties, they were of themſelves troubled and diſquieted through their own fearfuſneſs and ſundry cries which they made. Publius Cornelius the Conſul, about three dayes after that Annibal diſlodged from the bank of Rhodanus, was arrived with his army (arranged in a fourſquare battell) as far as the place: where the enemy was lately encamped, purpoſing without any ſtay to give him battell. But ſeeing the hold abandoned, and that he was not like to overtake him, being loſt far gone forwards; he returned to his ſhips at Sea, ſuppoſing by that means, with leſſe danger and difficulty, to encounter Annibal as he defended from the Alps. But left that Spain (which was the Province allotted unto him) ſhould be left diſturiſhed of Roman ſuccours, he ſent his brother Cn. Scipio with the greateſt part of his forces againſt Aſdrubal: not ſo much to defend their old allies, and procure new, as to drive Aſdrubal out of Spain. Himſelf with a very ſmall company returned to Genua, with intent to guard Italy, with that army which was about the Po.

Annibal being departed from Druentia, marched for the moſt part through the champion countries, and came in peace and quietly, to the foot of the Alps, for any trouble from the peſants that there inhabited. And albeit he had ſome knowledge of the Alps before by report, (which ſuffice to make things that are uncertain, much more than indeed and truth they are) yet ſeeing now near at hand the height of thoſe Hills, and the ſnows, entermingled along with the ſkies, the rude and miſhapen houſes ſet upon rocks; the cattel, ſheep, oxen, and horſes, ſinged with cold; the people with long ſhaggy hair, and without any trimming, both living and lively creatures, even parched, ſtiff and ſtark with froſt; and all things elſe more ſtrange and illavoured; than can be ſpoken: then began his ſouldiers to fear aſreth. So ſoon as they advanced forward, and began to march upon the firſt cliffs, there appeared over their heads the mountain people, who had ſeized the Hills: who if they had kept the ſecret and hidden vallies, and ſuddenly all at once charged upon them they would have made a ſoul ſlaughter of them, and put them to flight. Then Annibal commandeth the enſigns to ſtand ſtill, and ſet certain Gauls afore, as eſpials; by whom he underſtood, that there was no paſſage that way: whereupon, he pitched his camp among thoſe craggy and ſteep rough places, upon a large plain and valley as he could find. Then by the ſame Gauls (who much differed not in tongue and manners from the other, and had entermingled themſelves in talk with the mountaineers) he underſtood, that they kept the paſſage, but in the day time, and ſlipped away in the night, every one to his own harbour. So at the break of day he mounted thoſe ſteep hills, as if he would openly in the day time march through the ſtreights. Thus having ſpent the day in making ſemblance and ſhew of one thing, and intending another, he encamped himſelf ſtrongly in the place where he had reſted and ſtaid: and ſo ſoon as he perceived, that the mountain people were departed from the ſteep hills, and kept not to ſight watch and ward: after that he had made ſhew of fires, more than for the number of thoſe that remained behind; and left with the Cavalry all the bag and baggage, with the greateſt part of the footmen: himſelf in perſon took unto him the nimbleſt, moſt active, and valiant ſouldiers lightly appointed, and with all ſpeed paſſed through the ſtreights aforeſaid, and encamped on the very hills which the enemies before held and beſet. Then in the morning betime his camp diſlodged: and the army behind, began to march and ſet forward. By which time the mountaineers, at the ordinary ſignal given, came forth out of their Caſtles and Forts, and met at the uſual place of their accuſtomed guards: but then all at once they might ſee ſome of the enemies over their heads, to have gained their own fortreſſes, and others alſo marching in the way. Both which objects at one time preſented to their eyes, made them blank and to ſtand ſtill in a miſe a good while. But afterwards, when they ſaw Annibal his army, diſtreſſed in the ſtreights, and in great trouble and diſorder among themſelves in the march, by reaſon eſpecially the horſes were loſt affrighted: ſuppoſing, that the leaſt fear and terror (beſides) that they could procure, would be enough for their enemies overthrow and confuſion, they croſſed the rocks overthwart, and (as they were accuſtomed and uſed to them) ran to and fro, up and down through the blind and un haunted by ways. But then verily, the Carthaginians were much encumbered, as well by their enemies, as alſo by the diſadvantage of the place, and more ado there was among them (whiles every one ſtrove who ſhould firſt eſcape the danger) than with the enemy. There was nothing that diſordered and troubled the army in the march, ſo much as their own horſes, which (by reaſon of the diſſonant and divers cries, that the echoes between the woods and vallies redoubled) were affrighted: and alſo if any of them chanced to be ſtricken, galled, or wounded; they kept ſuch winſing, and ſinging about them, that they overthrow and made great havock of men, and of all ſorts of carriage. Beſides, the preſs was ſo great, and the ſtreights of both ſides ſo ſteep and craggy, that many a man was thrown down head-long a mighty height: yea, and ſome of them armed: and the ſumpter horſes and beaſts for carriage eſpecially tumbled down again with their load, as if a houſe or Caſtle had come down with a miſchief. Which, although it were terrible to behold, yet Annibal loſt a while ſtill, and kept his own men together, for fear of encreaſing this diſorder and affright. But after that he ſaw his army diſbanded and marching in diſarray, and that it was to no purpoſe

A poſe to lead his army ſafe through the ſtreights, if he loſt the carriages: for fear hereof, he ran down from the higher ground, and albeit, with the violence of his charge, he diſcomited the enemy, yet he encreaſed the trouble and fear of his own people. But that was ſoon appeared in a very moment, after the ways and paſſages were once cleared, by reaſon of the Mountaineers that were ſet: ſo that within a while the whole hoſt paſſed through, not only at eaſe and leiſure, but alſo in a manner without any noiſe at all. This done, he ſeized upon a Caſtle, which was the chief ſtrength of that country, with other villages lying about it: and for three dayes ſpace he viſtalled and maintained his whole army, with the Cattell of his priſoners. And for that he was now neither moleſted with the Mountaineers, who were at the liſt diſcomfited, nor greatly encumbered with the difficulties of the ways, in thoſe three dayes he rid a good deal of ground, and journeyed a great way into the country: until at the length he came to another coaſt well peopled (for ſuch Mountain and Hilly quarters;) where he had like to have been overtaken, not by open force, but even in his own proceſſed winning: firſt, by a ſubtile praſtic, and after by a ſecret ambuſh. Certain ancient men, the Rulers and Governours of the Caſtles, repaired unto Annibal as Orators, ſaying, That they having been taught and made wiſe, by the profitable example of other mens harms, made choice, rather to trye the amity, than prove the force of the Carthaginians; and therefore were willing to do his commandment, and be at his devotion: requeſting him to take at their hand, victuals and guides for their journey, yea, and hoſtages alſo for better aſſurance of promiſes to be performed. Annibal neither overhaſtily believing them, nor yet churiſhly diſtruſting and eſting their offer, let being reſected and caſt off, they might become open and profreſed enemies; gave them good language, and a courteous answer, received the hoſtages whom they gave, accepted victuals, which they had brought with them to maintain his army by the way, and followed their guides, but ſo, as his army was not diſturiſed in their march, as if he had been amongst his friends, and in a peaceable country. Firſt, went in the vanguard the Elephants, and the Horſemen: himſelf marched after with the flower and ſtrength of his footmen, looking all about him with an heedful eye. So ſoon as he was entred a narrow paſſage, which of the one ſide lay under a ſteep Hill that commanded them aſt, the barbarous people role out of their ambuſh from all parts at once, both before and behind, and charged upon him both a far off and neer at hand; yea, and rolled down mighty huge ſtones upon them as they marched. But the greateſt number came behind upon their backs: againſt whom he turned and made head with the power of his footmen, and without all peradventure (if the tail both of his army, had not been ſtrong and well fortified) they muſt needs have received in that lane and ſtreights, an exceeding great overthrow. And even then, as it was, they came to an extremity of danger, and in manner fell into a preſent miſchief. For whiles Annibal made long ſtay, and doubted whether he ſhould engage the Regiment of footmen within the ſtreights, for that he had not leiſe any ſuccours in the rereguard to back the footmen, like as himſelf was a defence to the Horſemen; the mountaineers came overthwart, and flanked them; and breaking through the files of the battell, beſet the way, and croſſed upon him. So that Annibal took up his lodging for one night, without his carriages and Horſemen. The morrow after, when as the barbarous people ran between them more coldly than before, he joyned his forces together, and paſſed the ſtreight not without great damage and loſſe; but with more hurt of the ſumpter Horſes than of men. After this the Mountaineers (fewer in number, and in robbing wiſe rather than in warlike ſort) ran in heaps one while upon the vanguard, other while upon the rereguard, as any one of them could either get the vantage of ground, or by going one while afore, and by ſtaying another while behind, win and catch any occaſion and opportunity. The Elephants as they were driven with great leiſure hereaſt through theſe narrow ſtreights, they were ready ever and anon to run on their noiſes: to what way ſoever they went, they kept the army ſafe and ſure from the enemies; who being not wed unto them, durſt not once come neer. The ninth day he won the very tops of the Alps, through by-lanes and blind cranks: after he had wandred many times out of the way either through the deceitfulneſs of their guides; or for that when they durſt not truſt them, they adventured raſhly themſelves upon the vallies, and gueſſed the way at adventure, and went by aim. Two dayes abode he encamped upon the tops thereof, and the ſouldiers wearied with travel and fight reſted that time: certain alſo of the ſumpter Horſes (which had ſlipped aſide from the rocks) by following the tracks of the army as it marched, came to the camp. When they were thus overtired and wearied with theſe tedious travels, the ſnow that fell (for now the ſtar Vergily, was ſet and gone down out of that horizon) increaſed their fear exceedingly. Now when as at the break of day the enſigns were ſet forward, and the army marched ſlowly, through the thick and deep ſnow; and that there appeared in the countenance of them all, ſtubbornneſs and deſperation: Annibal advanced before the ſtandards, and commanded his ſouldiers to ſtay upon a certain high Hill, (from whence they had a goodly proſpect and might ſee a great way all about them) and there ſtood unto them Italy, and the goodly champion fields about the Po, which lie hard under the foot of the Alpine Mountains: ſaying, That even though they mounted the wals, not only of Italy, but alſo of the City of Rome; as for all beſides (ſith he) will be plain and eaſy to be travelled: and after one or two battels at the moſt, ye ſhall have at your command, the very Caſtle and head City of all Italy. Then began the army to march forward: and as yet the enemies verily themſelves adventured nothing at all, but ſome petty robberies by ſtealth, as opportunity and occaſion ſerved.

How.

Howbeit they had much more difficult travelling down the hill, than in the climbing and getting up; for that most of the passages to the Alps from Italy side, as they be shorter, so they are more upright: for all the way in a manner was steep, narrow, and slippery, so as neither they could hold themselves from sliding, nor if any tripped and stumbled never to little, could they possibly (they staggered) to recover themselves and keep sure footing, but one fell upon another, as well Horle as Man. After this they came to a much narrower rock, with crags and rags so steep downright that hardly a nimble fouldier without his armor and baggage (do what he could to take hold with hands upon the twigs and plants that there about grew forth) was able to creep down. This place being above naturally of itself steep and pendant with a down-fall, now was holed and dammed up with a new fall of earth, which left a bank behind it of a wonderful and monstrous height. There the Bolsen men stood still as if they had been come to their wayes end: and when Anubal marvelled much what the matter might be that stayed them so, as they mar, he did not: word was brought him that the Rock was unaceffible and unpaffable. Whereupon he went himself in person to view the place, and then he saw indeed without all doubt, that although he had fetched a compass about, yet he had gained nothing thereby, but conducted his army, to pass through wilds, and such places as before had never been beaten and troden. And verily that (of all other) was such as it was impossible to pass through. For, whereas there lay old snow untrouched and not trodden on, and over it other new newly fallen, of a small depth: in this soft and tender snow, and the same not very deep, their feet as they went, easily took hold: but that snow being once with the going of lo many people and beasts upon it, fretted and thawed, they were lain to go upon the bare ice underneath, and in the slabbry snow both as it relented and met about their heels. There they had lost and much struggling, for that they could not tread sure upon the slippery ice: and again going as they did (down hill) their feet sooner failed them: and when they had helped themselves one in getting up, either with hands or knees: if they chanced to fall again, when thoir their props and stays decayed them, there were no twigs nor roots about, whereon a man might take hold, and rest or stay himself, either by hand or foot. And therefore all that the poor beasts could do, was to tumble and wallow only, upon the slippery and glasse ice, and the molten slabby snow. Otherwhiles also they perished as they went in the deep snow, whiles it was yet soft and tender: for when they were once sidden and fallen, with flinging on their heels, and bearing with their hoofs more forcibly to take hold, they brake the ice through: so as most of them; as if they had been caught fast and fettered, stuck full in the deep hard frozen, and congealed ice. At last, when as both man and beast were wearied and overtired, and all to no purpose they came upon the top of an hill, having with very much ado closed the place aforehand for that purpose: such a deal of snow there was to be digged, shovelled and thrown out. This done the soldiers were brought to break that rock through which was their only way: and against the time that it was to be hewed through, they felled and overthrew many huge trees that grew there about and made a mighty heap and pile of wood: the wind turned fully for the time to kindle a fire, and then they set all a burning. Now when the rock was on fire and red hot they powred thereon Vinegar for to calcine and dissolve it. When as the rock was thus baked (as it were) with fire, they digged into it, and opened it with pickes axes and made the decent gentle and easy, by means of moderate windings and turnings: so as not only the Horses and other beasts, but even the Elephants also might be able to go down. Four dayes he spent about the levelling of this rock: and the beasts were almost pined and lost for hunger. For the hill tops for the most part are bare of grass, and look what forage there was, the snow overhilled it. The dales and lower ground shew some little banks lying to the sun, and rivers withal, near unto the woods, yea, and places more meet and befitting for men to inhabit. There were the labouring beasts put out to graze and pasture, and the soldiers that were wearied with making the wayes, had three dayes allowed to rest in. From thence they went down into the plain country, where they found both the place more easy and pleasant, and the nature of the inhabitants more tractable.

In this manner and by this means principally, entred the Carthaginians into Italy, five months after they departed from new Carthage (as some write:) and within fifteen dayes overcame and passed the Alps. What power Annibal had, when he was arriv'd in Italy, the historians do not agree. They that speak with the most, write that he was 10000 foot, and 2000 Horse strong: they that make the least of it, say they were 2000 foot, and 6000 Horle. L. Cinctus Alimurus, who hath delivered under his hand, that himself was taken prisoner by Annibal (a writer of great authority) would induce me sufficiently to believe him, but that he fetcheth down the number of his Army, by adding to the rest, the Gauls and Ligurians. He recordeth, that coming thither the Infantry was 80000 and the Cavalry 10000; which was conducted into Italy (but likely it is that from all parts there came more thither than so, and so some Authors do report) and that he heard from Annibal his own month, that after he had passed Rhodanus, he had lost 26000 men, and a great number of Hories and other beasts of burden. when he came down into the Taurins Country, which was the next Nation in Italy, adjoining to the Gauls. Which being a thing agreed upon amongst all, I marvel so much the more, that there is any doubt, on which side he went over the Alps; and that commonly it is believed, that he passed by a place called Penninus, and that thereupon the top of the Alps took the name, and was so called. Cadus saith, he took his way over by the top of Croton: but which passages surely would have brought

And ~~he~~ brought him ~~not~~ into the Taurins country, but through the mountain forest ~~unto~~ into the Gauls ~~and~~ ^{called} Lubini. But neither is it probable, that in those days the same passages were open into Fræce: considering, that the ways which lead to Penninum were environed with nations half Germans. And certainly the Veragians, who inhabit this very top (in case a man may build ought upon this conjecture) never knew that these mountains took the name of any passage of the Carthaginians, that way: but of some one place consecrated in the top of the hill, which the pealans and mountaineers called Penninum.

They happily and fitly it fell out for the enterlife of his first designments, that the Taurins the next nation he came unto, made war upon the Infrubrians. But Annibal being busied in refreshing his army (that now had most feeling of their harms which they had caught before) could not arm the same to the aid and gratifying of either party: for ease after travel, plenty upon scarcity, good keeping and delicate, after loathsome nativities, did by a sudden change greatly alter and temper their lean and pined bodies, well near savage and wild grown. Which was the cause that P. Cornelius the Consul, being arrived and landed at Pise, after he had received of Maximus Attilius an army of new and raw souldiers, fearful for some shameful disgrace and defeat lately received, made haste and bighed him to the Po, for to give battle unto the enemy, before he were well refreshed and in heart again. But by that time that the Consul was come to Placentia, Annibal had dislodged and removed his camp, and won by assault the chief City or Town of the Taurins, because it willingly yielded not to accept of his amity and protection; and truly not by fear only, but also of voluntary good will, he had gained unto him the Gauls that inhabited about the Po, but that the sudden coming of the Consul interrupted and surprized them, as they were casting about to seize some opportunity of rebellion. So Annibal dislodged, and removed out of the Taurins country, with this opinion, that the Gauls especially being doubtful as yet what part to take, would follow him being present in place. Now were the armies in manner one in fight of the other, and the Generals approached nigher together: and as they were not yet well known one unto the other, for they had already both of them a great opinion, and reciprocal admiration of the other. For as Annibal was much renowned, and his name right well known among the Romans, even since before Saguntum was lost: so Scipio was taken of him, and reputed for some singular and excellent man, in that he especially above all other, was chosen General against him. Which mutual conceit and impression they had, they augmented themselves one to the other: for that Scipio, albeit he was left behind in France, yet he met Annibal, and was ready to make head against him, so soon as he was passed the Alps: and Annibal again, because having enterprised to great an adventure, as to pass the Alps, and now brought the same to good effect, but Scipio to prevent Annibal in crossing the Po before him, removed his camp to the river Tiemur: and for to encourage his souldiers, before he brought them forth to battel, he made an Oration unto them, and began in this manner.

“My valiant souldiers and trusty friends, if I were now to lead that army into the field, which I had with me in France, I would have foreborn to make any speech at all unto you; for to what purpose needed I to exhort, either that Cavalry, which so valiantly had vanquished the horsemen of the enemies at the river Rhodanus: or those legions, with whom I followed in chase as if they were, even the very enemies, and whose falling off and refusing battell I take to be a confession of victory? But now for as much as that army, being indeed levied for the province Spain, I desireth with my brother Cn. Scipio, under my name and commission, where it pleareth the Senate and people of Rome, they should be employed, to the end that ye might have a Consul to be your Captain, against Annibal and the Carthaginians, I have willingly offered my self to this war. If being then, your new Captain, and you my new souldiers, meet it is and convenient I should use a few words unto you. And to the end you should not be ignorant, either of the manner of this service, or quality of your enemy: with those men ye are to fight, whom in the former Punick war ye overcame both by land and sea: of whom for these twenty years ye have received tribute; from whom ye have won (as the due wages and reward of the war) Sicily and Sardinia both, and them do hold and occupy. In this battell therefore, both you and they are to carry that mind, and so to be affected, as winners and losers are to befor never think that it is valor and hardihood that provoketh them now to fight, but meer necessity and compulsion enforce them to the field. Unles you will believe that they who when they had an entire army and unfouled, refused battell, should now have greater hope, and take more courage, after they have lost two parts of their horse and foot, in the very passage of the Alps; and of whom, there have more perished in a manner, then remain alive. But will some man say, True it is, few they are in number, but stout in heart, and tall of hand, whose strength & puiissance, no force is hardly able to abide. Images they are nay, to say more truly, the very shadows of men, and no better; with hunger bitten, with cold starved, loth for want of keeping, spoiled with raiments and filthy ordure, bruised and weakened amongst hard rocks and craggy cliffs: over and besides, joints and marrow dried up and burnt, their sinews shrunk, hard, and stiff again with cold and chilling snow, their limbs tinged with bitter frost, their armor crushed, bruised, and their weapons broken; their hories, no other then lame jades and poor hide-bound Tiers. See what horsemen lo, what footmen ye are to fight withal. Believe me, ye shall have the very reliques and last remnants of enemies, not enemies indeed. And I assure you, nothing fear I more than this that before ye shall skirmish with this kind of enemy, it will be thought that the Alps already have

"vanquished and defeated Annibal. But peradventure it was to meet, and reason would, that the gods themselves without man's help, should against that Captain and nation, which had broken league and covenants begin the war first, set it in good forwardness, and bring it to the point of an end: and then we, who next to the gods have been offended and wronged, should finish the same thus begun to our hands, and brought to good end a pass. I fear not that any man here doth think, that I utter these brave and glorious words only for to hear them you, and that my self think otherwise in heart, then I speak with tongue. I might have gone my self well enough into Spain, my proper and peculiar province, (where I had been sometime) and with an army of mine own: I should have had my brother there, both a counsellor to me in my distresses, and a companion with me in my dangers. I found Afrubal rather than Annibal mine enemy, and no doubt, the affairs and charge of the war far less then here. But when I failed by the coast of France, and upon the bruit and news of this enemy was set a land, I sent my Cavalry before, and removed camp as far as to Rhodanus, and in a battel of horsemen (for with that part of my forces it was my hap to encounter and fight) I discovered the enemy: and for that by land I could not overtake his Infantry, to hastily they marched away, like men that fled) I was fain to return to the sea, and embark again into my ships: and with as great expedition and speed as I could make (considering to great a compass about sea and land) at the very foot of the Alps, I was ready to encounter and affront him. Can it be thought then, that whiles I shunned and avoided fight, I fell by chance and at unawares upon this dread and redoubted enemy? or rather, that I followed him hard at heels, and challenged him, to draw him forth unto a battel, thereby to have it decided who should have the victory in the end? I would gladly make trial, whether all of a sudden the earth hath brought forth for these twenty years, Carthaginians, of another mould or new stamp: or whether they be the same that fought near the Islands Egates, and whom ye sent away, and let go from Eryx, valued after the rate of 18. * deniers: a piece, and no more: and fain would I see, whether this Annibal be the concurrent of Hercules, to undertake his journeys and voyages, as he saith himself: or one left by his father, a tributary, a vassal, and a slave of the people of Rome: I who, but that he is tormented in conscience for the outrage and cruelty committed upon Saguntum, would have some respect and regard, if not of his native country (conquered and subdued) yet of his own house, of the peace and covenants written by his father Amilcar, and his own hand: Amilcar (I say) who at the commandment of our Consul, removed his garrison from Eryx: who fuming and storming, received with sorrowful heart the grievous and heavy conditions of peace imposed upon the conquered Carthaginians: who capitulated and covenanted to abandon Sicily, and to pay a tribute to the people of Rome: I would have you therefore (my hardy soldiers) to fight against him not only with the same courage as you do with other enemies, but in a certain heat of choler & indignation, as if you should see your own servants and slaves on a sudden to rise up in arms against you. We might well if we had been so minded, when they were enclosed and shut fast within Eryx, have put them to the utmost extremity of all worldly pain, and famished them. We might have passed over with our victorious Armado into Africa, and within few days forced and razed Carthage, without any battel fought. We pardoned them at their humble request, and took them to mercy: we let them out where they were besieged and beleaguered, and notwithstanding that they were by us subdued, we made peace, and contracted amity with them: and afterward, when they were molested and distressed with the Africans war, we counted them within our protection. In recompence of these good favours and demerits, they come against us, under the leading of an humorous brain-sick and furious young man, to invade and assail our country. And I would it had pleased God, that we had all this war for our honor only and reputation, and not for our safety and our lives. But we are to fight now, not for the holding and possession of Sicily and Sardinia, as in times past: but for our freehold, and the inheritance of Italy: and that which more is, there is no army behind our backs to withstand and make head against the enemy, if we chance to fail of victory: neither are there any more Alps, which while he is getting over, we might have leisure in the mean time to assemble and prepare new forces. Here in this very place, (soldiers) must we stand to it, and make resistance, as if we were fighting under Rome walls. Let every man think that he is not only to defend and ward his own body, but to protect his wife and little children: and let every one regard and take care, not for his privat affairs and domestical charge, but often consider this, That even now the Senat and people of Rome beholdeth and seeth our hardy deeds, and look how our force and valor now speedeth and sheweth it self, such from henceforth will the state and fortune be of that City and Empire of Rome.

These words had the Consul to the Romans. But Annibal, supposing that his men were first to be encouraged by representation of some deeds, & then exhorted with words; having marshalled his army in a round compass (as it were) to behold some spectacle in a Theatre: he set in the midst of them all, the prisoners mountaineers, bound (as they were) hand and foot: and casting down at their feet, the armor and weapons of the Gauls, he demanded of them by a trump-man, or interpreter, Which of them (upon condition to be eased of his bands, and to have armor, and an horse of service, given him for a prize of victory) would enter into combat, and fight at the utterance for his life. And when they all answered with one voice, That they would with no better, and not one of them but called for a sword, & required to fight: and thereupon, he lots were shuffled to be cast, & not there was but wished himself to be the man, whom fortune would chuse for the combat.

Then

A Then every man as his lot fell, in token of cheerfulness and contentment of spirit, leapt for joy among his fellows that rejoiced in his behalf, fell a dancing after their manner, and so (hastily) took arms and weapons: all the while that they were in fight there appeared such affection and disposition of mind, as well in them that were in the same state and condition, as also in those who stood there as spectators in the multitude to look on: that no less happy and fortunate were they accounted, whose chance it was to die in the place, then those who had the upper hand. Upon the sight of some couples that were thus matched in combat, he dismissed them and whies he saw them in this good mind, so well affected and resolute; then he assembled them all together to an audience, and thus by report he spake unto them.

B "My valorous soldiers, if in the consideration of your own fortune, ye will anon but bear that mind, which even now ye shewed in beholding the example of the state of others: the journey is ours, and we have the victory. For that was not a dumb show and bare pageant, but a very mirror and pattern of your own condition: and I wot not, whether fortune hath compassed about with harder bonds and greater necessities, your own selves, or your prisoners. On both hands, as well the right as the left, enclosed ye are, and shut up within two seas: and have not so much as one ship to embark in, nor to escape away, and save your selves. Before you need at hand is the Po a greater river, and more violent then Rhodanus; behind you are the Alps to hem you in; in the Alps, I say, which ye hardly passed when you were in heart and lusty. Here must ye either get victory (irs) or lose your lives, even where ye have first encountered your enemy: and the same fortune, which hath laid upon you necessity of fight, presenteth and profereth unto you (if you go away with victory) such rewards, as men use not to wish for greater and more honorable at the hands of the immortal gods. If by our manhood and valour we should but recover and win again Sicily and Sardinia, which were got from our fathers: those were rewards and prizes sufficient: but now, over and besides, what riches or treasure the Romans in so many triumphs, have gathered, laid up, and held in possession, all that will be ours, ye, and the winners thereof themselves withal. Go to it then a Gods name, and take arms, in assured hope of gaining so rich a booty and reward. Ye have all this while been long enough a courting and chasing the wild beasts in the wide and desart mountains of Luftania and Celtiberia, and have seen no recompence and fruit of your travels and dangers: it is now high time for you to serve in the wars for good pay and rich rewards, and to receive great wages and prizes for your labour and painful service: you that have measured so long a voyage, passed over so many mountains and rivers, and marched through so many armed and warlike nations. Here is the place where fortune hath let down the utmost bound, and pitched the farthest point & limit of your labors; here will she give you a condigne recompence and salary, after you have served and followed the wars the full time, by order and law required. Never think that the victory will be so hardly achieved, as the war in name is counted difficult. For oftentimes an enemy of small or no reckoning and regard, hath given a bloody battel: yea, most noble States, most renowned and glorious Kings, have in the very turning of an hand been overthrowen. For, letting aside this goodly, gay, and glittering name only of the Romans, what is there wherein they are with you to be compared? To say nothing of that continual warfare of yours, for 20 years past, e, with such valour and happy success: even from Hercules pillars, from the Ocean, from the utmost bounds of the earth, through so many nations of Spain, and most fell and cruel Gauls, ye are come thus far with victory. And now shall ye fight with an army of new and untrained soldiers, who no longer ago then this very summer, were beaten, put to the sword, vanquished and besieged by the Gaulish army (to say a truth) not known at all to their own Captain, & as little acquainted with him. And to speak of mine own person, if not born yet at leastwise brought up in the very tent and royal pavilion of my father (a most noble warrior and renowned Captain of his time) who have subdued Spain, conquered Gauls, overcome not only the people of the Alps, but that which is much more, the very Alps themselves. Should I make comparison between my self, and this half-year Captain, who hath abandoned and left his own camp and army? Unto whom, if a man should this day, present the Carthaginians and Romans together, without their ensigns and colours, he could not tell, I dare well say, of whether army he were the leader and Consul. For I make no small account, I tell you of this (my tall fellows) that there is not one of you all, who hath not many a time and often seen and beheld my self in person, performing some warlike and military exploit: and unto whom I (as beholder and eye witness of his valor) cannot recount the time and place of his worthy deed & service. Then ye praised and commended me, then ye rewarded & honored me with divers gifts & presents. And even I (who have been a soldier trained up and taught by you, before I was your General) will march in battel against them, that know not one another, and are unknown likewise unto their Captain. Which way soever I turn and cast mine eyes, me thinks, I see all full of courageous stomack, and a forcible puissance. The footmen, old bearded and practised soldiers, lances and men of arms, with hard horses, and the light horsemen likewise, chosen forth of most hardy and valiant Nations: of one side, most faithful and resolute allies; on the other, doughty Carthaginians, ready to fight, as well in countries defence, as also for most just and due revenge. We come of our selves to make war, and we descend into Italy with banners displayed, resolved to fight with so much more courage, as they commonly who are assailants, have greater stomack and more hope then the defendants. Over and besides, our hearts are kindled, and our minds pricked

"on and provoked with sense of injuries and indignities. First and foremost they required, that your General should be delivered unto them, as a condemned prisoner at the bar: then they would have had all you that were at the assault of Saguntum, yielded up into their hands, to be put to most extrem tortures & execution. A people they are, full of all excessive cruelty, insolence and proud beyond all measure; they would have but all in their power, and at their disposition: they must prescribe, limit, and set down, with whom we should war; with whom we may make peace: restraining and enclosing us within the terms and bounds of hills and rivers; which, forsooth, we must not pass: and they themselves keep not the limits, which they appoint. Pass not (say they) thence in any wise; meddle not at all with the Saguntines; come not near them. Saguntum standeth upon the river Iberus, step not one foot forward, we advise you. It sufficeth not their turn, that they have taken from us our ancient Provinces, Sicily and Sardinia, unless they may have away Spain too. And if I should depart from thence, and quit that Realm also, they would not stay there, but will pass over straight into Africa: nay, they have sent over this year already two Consuls, the one into Africa, the other into Spain: nothing have they left for us, but that which we can win and hold with the sword's point. Well may they be cowards, and play the idle larks, having a place of refuge to retire unto, who in their own country and ground may be received, when they take their heels and run through ways without danger, to save themselves. As for us, it stands us upon to play the men, and to make account of no mean designs between victory and death, but upon certain despair of all hopes: sides, either to obtain victory; or if fortune shall fail and give us the foil, chuse rather to die fighting, than to be killed flying. If this be settled and deeply imprinted in your hearts, if this be your resolution, I will say once again, The day is yours. A more poignant and sharper goad, than this, to provoke men to victory, never gave the immortal gods to any whatsoever.

When by these Orations, the soldiers hearts of both sides were inflamed to fight, the Romans made a bridge over Ticinus: and for defence of the bridge, erected a lance and fort thereupon. But Annibal while the enemies were busied at work, sent Maharbal with a Cornet of Numidians, to the number of 500. light horsemen, to overrun and waste the territories belonging to the allies of the people of Rome: commanding him withal to make as great spare of the Gauls as he could, and to solicit and persuade their Nobles and Lords unto rebellion. After the bridge was finished, the Roman army passed over into the Insularian country, encamped themselves upon certain hills, five miles off from a village where Annibal also lay in camp: who seeing there was a battle toward, sent speedily for Maharbal back again, and the horsemen: and thinking belike, that he could never lay enough to his soldiers, and admonish them sufficiently to do well and animate them to fight, he called them all again together to an audience: where he proposed, and promised unto them openly, certain assured rewards, the hope whereof might incite them to fight manfully. Imprimis, that he would endow them with fair lands, in Italy, Africa, or Spain, where they would themselves, to have, and to enjoy to him and to his heirs for ever, as free hold in frank tenure, without service: if any one would chuse to have money rather than land, him he would content with silver. Item, of the allies, as many as hereafter were desirous to be enfranchised Citizens of Carthage, they should have their free burgeoisie: & those that had a mind rather to return home again, he would endeavor and bring about that he should live so well, as not one of them would wish for to exchange his state with any of his neighbors and countreymen whatsoever. Last of all, look what bond servants attended and followed their masters, to them he promised freedom; and in lieu of them, he would deliver again unto their masters, two for one, of the slaves taken captives in war. And that they might be assured, that he would perform all the promises, he held with his left hand a Lamb, and in the right a flint stone, and prayed solemnly, That if he failed herein, Jupiter and the rest of the gods, would kill him, as he slew that Lamb: and presently after his prayer done, he smote the Lamb on the head, and dashed out the brains. Whereat they all every one, conceived and embraced assured hope unto themselves, that the gods said Amen, and were on their side: and supposing that the only way of enjoying their hopes, and obtaining their rewards, was, because they had not fought already; with one heart and voice they called for battle.

The Romans for their part, were nothing so lusty; for besides other things, they were affrighted with new prodigies and fearful sights. For it happened that a Wolf entered their camp, & after he had worried and torn those that came in his way, escaped unhurt. Also a swarm of Bees flew upon a tree that grew over the General's pavilion, which strange tokens being purged and cleared by an expiatory sacrifice, Scipio with his Cavalry and darts lightly appointed, went toward the camp of the enemy to view their forces, and to observe how many and of what condition and quality they were: and there he encountered Annibal, who also was gone forth with his horsemen to discover the country about. At the first they saw not one another, but afterwards, by reason of the thick dust that rose upon the march of so many men and horses, they knew that enemies approached near. On both sides the battalions made a stand, and every man buckled himself to the skirmish. Scipio placed his Archers and horsemen of the Gauls in the forefront: the Romans and strength of Allies, he bestowed behind for succours in the rereguard. Annibal set in this battle, his great barbed horses with his lances and men of arms, and strengthened the wings with Numidian horsemen. The very first charge and shout was scarce done, when the Archers foresaid retired among the rereguard in the second battailon: by occasion whereof, the horsemen alone fought a good while in

A qual battel: yea, and afterwards, because the footmen that were intermingled among troubled and disordered the horses, many either fell or else alighted from their horses, so to gather where they saw their fellows to be envired and overcharged. The conflict became very doubtful in many places until such time as the Numidians (who were in the wings) wheeling about by little and little, shewed themselves behind the backs of the Romans: this fearful sight troubled them greatly, and the fear was increased by reason of the Consul his hurt: the extreme danger whereof, was put by and avoided by the rescue of the son (then a very tripling as yet, and scarce had any hair upon his face) this youth is he, who had the honor of happily ending this war, surnamed afterwards (upon the noble victory and memorable conquest over Annibal and the Carthaginians) Africanus. But the Archers were they that fled fastest away, even those whom the Numidians let upon first. The rest that were horsemen, keeping thick and close together, recovered their Consul within their files into the midst of them: and protecting him not only with their weapons, but also with their bodies, brought him back safe unto the camp: retiring all the way neither disorderly, nor like fearful men over hastily. The honor of saving the Consul, Calpurnius attributed unto a bond slave of Liguria. But I verily would rather believe it of the son: which also the greater number of authors do affirm, but the common lame goeth of the said bond slave. This was the first battel with Annibal: wherein it easily appeared, that the Carthaginians were better in Cavalry, and therefore the open plain field such as were between the Po and the Alps, were not so good for the Romans to fight in. The night following therefore, Scipio commanded his souldiers secretly without any noise to truss up bag and baggage, and to dislodge: and removed from Ticinus, and made haste to Po: that whiles his boats were not yet unloosed one from the other, in which (as upon a bridge) he had brought over his army, he might without any trouble and pursuit of the enemy, conduct the same back again. And they came to Placentia before that Annibal knew they were departed from Ticinus: howbeit, he took some of them that made stay on the higher side of the bank as they were too slow about disjoining and loosening the foresaid bridge of boats: upon which he could not pass over, by reason that when both ends were let loose, the planks and all went down the water with the stream. Calpurnius writeth, that Mago with his horses, and Spanish footmen, presently swam over the river; and that Annibal himself led over his army at the upper foords of Po: for which purpose, he set the Elephants along on a row to break and bear off the violence and stream of the current. A thing surely that they were hardly able to do, who were skilful and by long experience knew the nature of the River very well. For it soundeth not like a skull, that horsemen with their armor and horses safe, could overcome to great a rage of the river, although we should grant that all the Spaniards gat over upon blown bladders or leather vessels, and besides, they had needed many days to fetch a compass for to find the foords of Po, over which, the army (laden with cartage) might be conveyed. But those authors carry more credit and authority with me, who write that scarcely in two days they found a place to make a bridge (of planks joined together) over the river, and that Mago and the Spanish light horsemen were sent that way over before.

Whiles Annibal on this side of the River, staid in giving audience to the embassages of the Gauls, he conducted over the regiments of footmen more heavily armed: in the mean while, Mago and the horsemen, after they had passed the river, marched one day's journey apace toward the enemies at Placentia. And Annibal (few days after) encamped himself strongly six miles from Placentia: and the morrow after in the sight of the enemies he put his men in array, and made them offer of battle. The night following there was a petty massacre committed in the Romans camp by the Gauls that came to aid: but greater was the garbail and tumult, then the harm indeed. For about 2000 footmen, and 200 horsemen, having slain the warders at the gates, fled away to Annibal: whom he spake courteously unto, and when he had drawn them on, in hope of great gifts and rewards, he dismissed every one into his own City and Country, to solicit and persuade their countreymen to side with him. Scipio taking that massacre as a foretoken and overture to the Gauls revolt in general; and supposing, that now being once guilty and tainted with this offence, they would in a madnels run all to take arms and rise. Although still he were fore of his late wound, yet the night following at the relief of the fourth watch, he marched thilly, and removed his camp near the river Trebia, into the higher countries, and hills, that were more troublesome for men of arms. But he wrought not so closely and without the knowledge of the enemy, as he did at Ticinus. For Annibal having sent out, first, the Numidian light horse, and then all his Cavalry: without question had disordered and endamaged the rereguard, but that the Numidians for greediness of prey and booty, diverted aside, and turned into the tents, abandoned and forsaken of the Romans. Where, whiles they spent time in ransacking and rifling every corner of the camp (and when all was done, could find no pillage worth the stay) the enemy escaped their hands. And when as they had eluded that the Romans were newly got over Trebia, and pitched out a plot for a camp, they intercepted a few of them that lingered about the river, and slew them. Scipio not able now to abide any longer the grief and pain of his wound, by reason of the shaking and shogging of his body as he travelled, and thinking it good to expect the coming of the other Consul his Colleague, (whom he heard already to be sent for out of Sicily) chose out a place near the river which seemed most safe for to encamp in, and it he fortified. Annibal also lay not far off in camp; who as he was proud upon the late battel of horsemen, so was he perplexed for want of victuals, which scarcity increased upon him every day more and more.

as he travelled through the enemies country, finding in no place provision aforehand. Whereupon, he went to Cl. fidum, a town wherein the Romans had bestowed and laid up great store of grain: where, as he prepared with violence to force the town, there appeared some hope of treason, by corrupting of P. Brundisium, the captain of the garrison there, and that with no great sum of money; for in consideration only of 400. peeces of gold given unto him, Cl. fidum was betrayed unto Annibal: the very storehouse and garner of corn that the Carthaginians had, all the while they were in leaguer near Trebia. Upon those prisoners that were taken when the garrison and fort was betrayed, he exercised no cruelty, because that in the beginning of his affairs, he would win himself a name and opinion of clemency.

Whiles the war by land continued thus at Trebia, there had been some warlike exploits achieved both by sea and land about Sicily, and the Islands that lie against Italy near unto it, both by Sempronius the Consul, and also before his coming. Twenty galleys with five ranks of Oars, and a thousand armed men, were sent from the Carthaginians to invade and waste the coasts of Sicily. Nine of them arrived at Lipara: eight fell with the Island of Vulcano, and three were driven by tempest into the straits of Sicily. Against them being decyred within kenning, there were twelve ships let out from Messana, by Hiero King of the Saracians, who happened at that time to be in Messana, attending the Roman Consul his coming; and without any resistance made he boarded those three ships, and brought them away into the Haven of Messana. By those that were taken prisoners, it was known, that besides the twenty ships aforesaid, sent against Italy (of which Fleet they were) 35 galleys of five course of Oars, made sail for Sicily, to solicit and persuade the old allies there to revolt. Item, that the especial point and design that they shoud attempt to seize upon Lilybaeum: but they thought verily that by the lame gull or tempest wherewith they were scattered, that other Fleet also was cast upon the Island Aegrotus. And according to this intelligence, the King from Messana writeth to Emilius the Roman Pretor or Governor of Sicily, advising him to keep a strong garrison in Lilybaeum: whereupon the Lieutenants and Colonels about the Pretor, were sent from him with all speed to all the Cities about, to give order, that their people might be in readinesse, to keep good ward, and above all, to hold Lilybaeum safe. And for preparation of war, there went forth a proclamation, that the sailors and mariners shoud bring into the ships ten days provision of victuals and meat ready dressed: to the end that upon the signal given at an hours warning, without all delay, they shoud a shipboard: Also that all that dwelt along the coast, shoud from their sentinels, watch-towers, and beacons, spy when the enemies fleet approached. Now (albeit the Carthaginians of purpose stayed the course of their ships, that they might come just before day to Lilybaeum) they were discovered, both for that the Moon shone all night, and also because they came under sail which they had hoisted up. So soon therefore as the signal was given out of the Sentinels and watch-towers, & alarm tried in the town, the mariners were soon imbarcked the soldiers also were bestowed some to man and guard the walls and guard the gates, others to crie in the ships. But the Carthaginians perceiving they were to deal with them that were provided for them, (as being advertised of their coming) forbore to enter the haven until day, and employed the time in striking sails, in uncracking their ships, and preparing them for battle. When it was broad day light, they retired into the deep, to have free room enough to fight: and that the enemies ships might have free egress out of the haven. The Romans for their part retired not battle, comforting themselves with the remembrance of the valiant exploits performed in that very place, and trusting also upon the number and valour of their soldiers. They were not so soon lanched into the open sea, but the Romans were desirous to grapple, and to come close to hand fight: but contrariwise the Carthaginians held aloof, willing to proceed byunning and policy more than by strength and meer force, and to make trial rather of the nimbleness and agility of their ships, than either of the prowess of men, or goodness of armour: for as their Fleet was sufficiently furnished, and to the full with a multitude of mariners, so was it provided of soldiers: and wheresoever they grappled together, and came to hand-fight, they were not an equal number of men armed to hold play with the enemies: which being once perceived, the Romans gathered heart, and redoubled their courage, by reason of their number: the other side again were discouraged and out of heart, for their default of soldiers. Incometh a leaven Carthaginian galleys were soon swelled round and boarded the rest dead. Of soldiers and mariners together, 1700. were in them taken: amongst whom, there were a three great Gentlemen of Carthage. The Roman fleet tillent and whole, save one vessel only that was boughed and pierced (yet albeit he brought back) returned into the haven.

Direfully did this battle, and before that they of Messana had knowledge thereof, T. Sempronius the Consul arrived at Messana: and as he entered within the bound King Hiero met him, with a fleet well furnished, and richly decked and coming forth of his royal City, to the Admirall of the Consul he welcomed him and rejoiced for the safe return of his men and ships, and prayed God, that his voyage into Sicily might prove happy and fortunate. Then showed he unto him the present estate, and the affairs of the Island, opened the deliverments of the Carthaginians: and promised withal, that with as good a mind and sound heart, as in the former war against the Carthaginians when he was a young man, he had aided the people of Rome: so now he should be won to assist them, and for proof thereof, he would shew him a true order of firmish boats, and their placements, and also the mariners with their weapons. Among other matters he shewed him how Lilybaeum, and other Cities on the sea coast were in great danger, by reason of

* Lipara, one of the Islands Aegrotus.

* Vulcano, another of the same Islands, * Messana.

* Messana a City in Sicily, and a Cape there, called the Eye of Sicily.

A some among them that desired a change and alteration. Whereupon the Consul thought good to make no delay, but to set sail with all speed to Lilybaeum, whom the King and his royal fleet accompanied: and as they were sailing, tidings came of the foretold battle before Lilybaeum, and how the enemies ships were either scattered and put to flight, or boarded and taken.

The Consul having bid King Hiero adieu, with his fleet set sail from Lilybaeum, leaving behind him the Pretor to defend the coast of Sicily, and crossed the sea himself to the Island Melita, which was held by the Carthaginians. At whole coming, Amilcar the son of Gisco, Captain of the garrison there, rendered himself, and 2000. soldiers within a very few, together with the Town and the Island. From whence, within few days he returned to Lilybaeum: where the prisoners (excepting certain noble persons of high parentage) were by the Consul and the Pretor both sold openly in port-fair. When the Consul thought Sicily on that coast sure enough, he set sail from thence towards the Islands of Vulcano, for that the bruit went that a fleet of Carthaginians there lay at road: but there were no enemies to be found about those Islands: for it chanced they were already passed over to wale along the river and coast of Italy; and having foraged the territory of Vibo, they put the City also in great fear. As the Consul returned back again to Sicily, tidings came that the enemy had made rodes into the country of Vibona: and he received letters also from the Senat, concerning the coming of Annibal into Italy, and therefore that he shoud with all speed possible aid and succour his Colleague. The Consul being at once troubled with many cares, presently imbarcked his army, and by the Adriatick sea, sent them away to Ariminum. To Sextus, Pomponius his Lieutenant, he gave the charge of 25 Gallies for the defence of the territory of Vibo and the sea-coast of Italy. With M. Emilius the Pretor, he left a fleet augmented to the number of fifty sail: which done, and all things set in order in Sicily, himself with ten ships coasted along Italy, and arrived at Ariminum, from whence he put himself in his journey, and marched with one army to the river Trebia, where he joined with his fellow Consul. Now were both Cornelius, and the whole puissance and force of the Romans opposed against Annibal, so as it appeared plainly, that either with that power the Empire of Rome might be defended, or else all their hope was gone. Howbeit, one of the Consuls being weakened and discouraged with the defeat of his horsemen in one battle, and dismayed besides with the hurt he had received in his body, desired to have the fight deferred: but the other coming fresh and lusty, and thereby more hardy, would abide no delay.

Tell out to at that time, that the Gauls inhabited all the Country between the two rivers Trebia and Po: who whilst these two most puissant nations were at strife and warred held off as neutrals, and favoured neither side, making full account of the good will and grace of that part which should have the better. The Romans became they would now make no truce, and have no more truce in the fire, took the matter well enough: but Annibal was very much thereby offended, giving out very often, that he was sent for by the Gauls for their deliverance and liberty. Upon this indignation and displeasure, and for that also he would feed his men with booties, he commanded 2000 footmen, and a thousand horsemen, most of them Numidians, and some Gauls among, to overrun and spoil all the country forward, even to the banks of Po. The Gauls standing in need of help, and having until that time kept themselves in doubtful terms, were forced to turn from those that offered them wrong, and to encline and cleave unto the Romans: that should revenge their injuries and protect them. Whereupon they sent Embassadors to the Consuls, requesting the Romans help for their land, which by reason of the exceeding fidelity, and too much loyalty of the inhabitants toward them, was now endangered. Cornelius liked neither the cause, nor yet the time to deal in such affairs: he had the nation besides in suspicion and jealousy, as well for many treacherous parts, as also (in case he would or could forget all other lewd pranks of their) for the lame disloyalty and unfaithfulness of the Boians. Sempronius contrariwise thought it the best bond to keep their allies in faith and allegiance, to defend those that came first to band and side with him. But notwithstanding his Colleague cast doubts and held off, yet he sent his own Cavalry, and a thousand well neer off footmen darters amongst them, to guard the country of Gaul beyond Trebia: who coming suddenly upon the enemies, and charging them at unawares, as they came scattered abroad, and out of order, yea, and most of them laden with spoil, mightily affrighted them, and made a foul slaughter and pursued them in flight, as far as to their standing camp, and corps de guard. From whence (nevertheless) they were beaten back by the multitude that followed forth: but by new success from their own companies, they renewed the fight again. The fight afterward was doubtful and variable: and although they made a saving bargain on both parts yet the common voice gave the honor of victory (such as it was) to the Romans rather than the enemies. But no man made a greater matter of it, and reckoned it more to the ill, than the Consul himself. He joined, he made his boast, that he had got the better with the help of the famous Gauls: which moved the conduct of the other Consul, came by the worse. And now (saith he) the soldiers are comforted and refreshed well enough and none there is but my brother Consul that would have the battle deferred: who no doubt is more heart-hearted than hardly hurt: and for the remembrance and smart of a little green wound quaker to hear of the field, & of all things cannot away with edge-tools. But we must not thurst it still here, and was aged for the pleasure of one trait and sickly person for what reason is it, that we shoud drive off longer, and spend more time in vain? What other Consul expect we to make up the third? or what army besides shoud we look for? The Carthaginians lie encamped in Italy, and well near within the view and sight

"of the City of Rome; and it is neither Sicily nor Sardinia taken from them by conquest, nor Spain on this side Iberus, which they shoot at, to win again: but that the Romans should be thrust out of their native soil and country wherein they were born, that is their drit and designation. Oh how deeply (quoth he) would our Fathers sigh, how heartily would they groan, they who were wont to manage war about the walls of Carthage, if they should see us their off-spring and children, two Consuls with Consular and royal armies in the midst of Italy, frightened thus and panting for fear within our camp? And that Annibal hath subdued and brought under his subjection all the country between the Alps and Apenninum? These and such like speeches uttered he to his Collegue, as he sat by his beds side, where he lay sick: thus spake he, as in an open audience, in the Coss, pavilion and all that quarter, to the souldiers. The time also of the Election of magistrates at Rome, being so near at hand, set him forward; for fear, lest the war should be deferred unto the new Coss, and the opportunity wishal, of winning all the honor to himself whilst his Collegue continued sick, pricked him on. Whereupon, for all the contradiction of Cornelius, which he nothing weighed and regarded, commandment he gave to his souldiers to be ready, to give battel anon unto the enemy. Annibal as one that knew and saw well enough what was best and safest for his enemy, could hardly imagine or conceive any hope to himself, that the Consuls would enterprize any thing rashly, or without aduilement; but when he understood by hear-say, that which afterwards by good proof and experience he found true, namely, that the one of them by nature was hot, haity, proud, and furious: and supposing, that he was the prouder and more furious for the late good hand he had of his forragers: made no doubt and distrust of the happy success and issue of a battel, whensoever it should come. Marry, careful he was, that no good time and opportunity presented unto him, should be overslip: but to try the hazard and fortune of the field, whilst the enemies souldiers were raw and untrained, and the better and wiser man of the two Generals, was unmeet for service by reason of his wound as yet uncured: and the courages of the Gauls lusty and forward: for well he wist, that a mighty number of them would the more unwillingly follow, the further they were drawn from their own home. Annibal, I say, hoping that by these and such like occasions, a battel would be soon offered: desired also himself to bid battel, if the enemy staid long: and being advertised besides by the Gauls, his eipials (whom he employed to hearken out and learn what he desired to know, and thought them more sure, because they served in both camps) that the Romans were ready for the field: then began he (rasy Carthaginian as he was) to seek out a convenient place for an ambush. Now there was in the mid way between, a river running within the borders, having very high banks of either side, and therefore lying close hidden, and all about overpied with mossy weeds, with briars, brambles, and brush-wood, as for the most part, such sort of places are overgrown withal. Which when Annibal in person had ridden about, and well viewed, perceiving that it would afford lurking holes handsom enough even for horsemen there to be hidden, This shall be the place (quoth he, to his brother Mago) which you shall keep. Chuse therefore out of all the horse and foot a hundred lusty fellows of each: and see you repair with them to meet the first watch, for now is it time to take repast, and to refresh your bodies. And with that he sent out to the camp the Criers, to call the souldiers to supper. And long it was not, but Mago came with his chosen men, I see (quoth Annibal) ye are goodly men of person, and sufficient. And that ye may be as able in number, as hardy in courage, elect ye also out of the Cornets of horse and squadrons of foot, nine a piece such as your selves to fort withal. Mago shall show you the ground where ye must lie in ambush; you shall find the enemy as blind as beetles, altogether unacquainted with these feats and cunning devices.

Thus Annibal, having committed unto Mago a thousand horsemen and as many footmen himself: etimes in the morning, willed the Numidian Cavalry, when they were past over the river Trebia, to ride braving before the gates of the enemies, and by darning and shooting into their guards, to provoke and draw them forth to fight: with this direction moreover, when the skirmish was begun, to fall off, and seem to retire by little and little, and so to train them on this side the river. This charge had the Numidians, but the other Captains, as well off set as horse, were commanded to let their Companies all to their breakfast: which done, to arm themselves, and with their horses ready saddled, to attend the signal of battel. Sempronius upon the alarm and hubbub of the Numidians, as being forward and desirous of fight, first brought forth all his horsemen, and bare himself bold and confident in that service; after that six thousand footmen a and at last, all his whole forces; and led them to a place which before he had designed and appointed in his mind. It fell out to be in Winter, after the midst of December, and a snowy day it was in those parts lying between the Alps and Apenninum. Now by reason of the rivers and moors so near, both horse and men were exceeding cold: also for that they were hastily on a sudden, called forth fasting, and unprovided of all means against the cold, they had never a whiff of hear left in them: and the nearer they came to the air and vapour of the river, the sharper cold pinched and pierced them through. But when as once they followed upon the Numidians that gave back, and were entered into the water (which by reason of the rain that fell by night was risen brief-high) they were not so soon gotten out again of the river, but all their bodies began to chill, and be stiff again for cold, that scarcely they could hold their weapons: and withal, as the day went further on, for very hunger they fainted. But Annibal his souldiers, who in the mean time had made fires, before their tents, and had oyl sent them to every company, for to supple and soften their joints, and

A and limbs, and taken their repast, and eated at leisure: when they heard say, that the enemies were passed the river, with hearts courageous and bodies fresh and lusty, take them to their weapons, and come forth to fight in ordinance of battel. The Baleares, and light armed men, to the number almost of 8000, he ranged before the standards in the front: after them he placed the footmen, better appointed and armed to the proof, even the very strength and manhood of all his forces: about the wings he set 10000 horsemen, and behind those wings, he divided and appointed his Elephants both on the one side and the other.

The Consul Sempronius seeing his horsemen following the chase on the spur, and out of order: and how at unawares they were charged again by the Numidians, who upon a sudden turned and made head upon them, founded the retreat: and when they were rallied about him, he compassed his footmen with them. The Romans were in number 18000, of Allies and Latines 26000, besides the aids of the Cenomani: which Nation of the Gauls only, continued faithful and true to the Romans. With these forces came they into the field, and began the battel. The first charge of the skirmish was given by the Islanders of Baleares, upon whom, when the legions made head with greater violence, their light armed men were quickly brought into the wings: which was a cause that the Roman horsemen presently were uncharged and distressed. For whereas of themselves they were but 4000, horse, and hardly able to withstand the shock of ten thousand horsemen of the other, the Romans also were wearied, but most of the Carthaginians fresh and untainted: over and besides, they were overwhelmed with a cloud (as it were) of darts, sling and shot by the Baleares Islanders: Moreover the Elephants which appeared aloft from the hindmost ends of the wings frightened the horses especially, and not only with the strange fright, but also with the uncount a scent and favor, made them flee every way. The battel of the Infantry was equally as uncount a scent and favor, made them flee every way: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little advantage of heart, rather then in strength of body: which the Carthaginians, (as having a little advantage taken repast) brought fresh with them into the field: but contrariwise the Romans were fasting and weary, and for cold even stark and benumbed. Howbeit their stomachs would have served to have held out and withstood to the end, if they might have fought with footmen only. But both the Baleares, having disordered the horsemen, flanked them with their shot, and also the Elephants by this time were entered into the middle battalion of footmen: and withal, Mago and the Numidian light horse (so soon as this battalion was unawares gone past their aim, and bothment and lurking holes) start up and arose from behind, and put them in exceeding trouble and fright. Yet for all these inconveniences and disadvantages (so many on every side) the main battel a good while stood unmoved and stirred not, but kept the array, and especially (beyond the expectation of all men) against the Elephants. For certain footmen placed for the purpose (by flinging of darts forced them to turn head: and when they were once turned forward, they followed hard upon them, pricking and galling them under the tails. In which place by reason of the tender skin they are soon wounded. Whom when Annibal saw thus feared and ready to turn upon their own part, from the main battel to the flanks and outflanks, he commanded them to be driven unto the left wing upon the Gauls that came to aid, and presently enforced them to run away. The Romans seeing their auxiliary Gauls put to flight, were driven unto a new fear. Whereupon fighting now as it were in a ring and round on both sides, there were among them, to the number also of 10000, who seeing no way else to escape, brake through the middle battalion of the Africans, which was strengthened with the aid of the Gauls, and that with a great slaughter of their enemies: and seeing they neither could return into their camp (the river being between) for the rain well discern how to succour their fellows, they took the way straight to Placentia. After this, there brake forth in all parts. They that took the river either perished in the streams and whirl-pools: or such as made stay to enter, were by the enemy overtaken and slain. But as many as here and there fled scattering through the fields, following the footing and tricks of the battalion that retired back, came to Placentia. Some for fear of the enemy adventured boldly to take the river, and being once over, recovered the camp. The rain and snow together, and the intolerable cold killed many, as well men as beasts in manner all the Elephants. The Carthaginians followed the enemies in chase as far as Trebia, and there gave over: and returned into the camp to clumie and frozen, as scarcely they felt the joy of their victory. By reason whereof the night following, when as the guard of the Roman camp, and the remnant of that great company of souldiers passed Trebia with float-boats and flat barges, the Carthaginians either perceived nor indeed for the noise the tempestuous rain made, or for weariness and sore wounds were they not able to stir, and therefore made semblance, as though they knew not of it. And so whilst the Carthaginians were at rest, the army was by Scipio the Consul brought (in a still march) to Placentia: and from thence having crossed the Po, came to Cremona, because one Colony alone should not be charged with the wintering of two armies at one time.

G Upon this defeat and overthrow, there arrived such fearful tidings at Rome, that they believed verily and looked for no other but that the enemy would come with banner displayed straight to the very City: and that there was no hope nor help left behind to defend their gates and walls from assault and violence. For seeing that the one Consul was vanquished at Ticinus and the other also, who was called unto him out of Sicily: since both Consuls, and two consular armies were thus defeated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be sent for, to aid? As they thus debated, what other Captains, what Legions remained now to be sent for, to aid? As they were in this agony and fear, Sempronius the Consul came home: who with very great danger had passed through the enemies Cavalry, which was spread here and there all about, to fetch in booties: and and more by venturesome hardihoods than good advice and hope, either to mis them unprovided, or to resist if he had hapned upon them, he got away. And after he had held the assembly for election of the Consuls (the only thing above all other for that present most desired) he returned into his standing camp to winter in. Now there were created Consuls, Cn. Servilius, and C. Flaminius the second time.

Howbeit the Romans were not in quiet within their wintering camp; for the Numidian horsemen ranged about, and made excursions into every quarter, and (those who troubled and encompassed them, more then they) the Celtiberians and Portugals. Whereby all convoy of victuals from every part was stopped, but only that which came by the Po, in Keels and such like vessels. Neer to Placentia there was a merchants town, both fortified strongly, and also well furnished with a good garrison: upon hope to force that castle or town, Annibal went with his horse and foot, lightly armed: and supposing that to carry the matter covertly, would avail much to the effecting of his purposed enterprise, he came upon them in the night: howbeit he was not so close and secret, but he was defied by the watch: who suddenly set up such an alarm, that it was heard as far as Placentia. Whereby the Consul somewhat before day was there with his Cavalry, having commanded the Infantry to march on after, ranged in a square battailon. In the mean while the horsemen skirmished, wherein Annibal was hurt, and departed out of the skirmish, by which means the enemies were frightened, and the Castle and hold manfully defended. After few days that he had taken his ease, before he was well cured of his wound, he went forward to assault Vicumvici. That was a town also of merchandize (or mart town) and had been fortified by the Romans in the Gauls war. Whereupon, the people bordering there about on every side, fled thither to make repair, and much frequented the same: and even then for fear of rodes and excursions many of the Peasants and rural people retired themselves thither for refuge. This multitude (such as they were) upon the report of the valiant holding and defence of the fort by Placentia, were encouraged, and took arms, and went forth to encounter Annibal. And in the midway they chanced to affront him and skirmish, in no battel array, but as they marched disorderly: whereas they were on the one side, none but a rude and confused sort; and on the other side, both a Captain that might trust his souldiers, and souldiers also that might reckon upon their Captain, there were to the number of 5000, difcomfited and put to flight, even by a few of their enemies. The morrow after, they yielded themselves, and received a garrison within the walls: and so soon as upon commandment to give up their armor, they had obeyed and so done: presently a signal was given unto the conquerors to sack and spoil the town, as if it had been forced by assault: where there was nothing rotten and omitted any calamity whatsoever, that might afford in such a case memorable matter & sufficient argument for writers to record. So pitiful examples were practised upon the poor silly wretches, of all loosefies and lust, cruelty, and inhuman pride and outrage. And there were the expeditions and enterprises of Annibal achieved for this winter time.

After this the souldiers took repose, but no longer then the intolerable cold lasted: For immediately upon the very first and doubtful tokens of spring; he departed from his wintering hold, and led his army into Tuscany, purposing to adjoin unto him (either by force or love) that nation also, as well as the Gauls and Ligurians. But as he passed over Ageninum, there arose so terrible storm and tempest, and surprised him, that he surmounted well-near the foul trouble and encumbrance endured in the Alps. For the wind and rain together did beat and drive upon their very faces. At the first for that either they were to lay away their armor, or else in striving and labouring to march on against the weather and by the whirl-puffs of wind turned round about, and ready to be born down, they stood still: but when as now the violence and fury of the storm stopped their breaths, suffered them not to take their wind at will; they were fain to turn their backs, and sit them down on the ground for a time. Then lee, the skie thundered again, and made an horrible noise, and amid those terrible cracks redoubled, it lightened thick. Whereupon, they lost their hearing and seeing; and for fear, all of them became astounded. At length it poured down, and thereby the wind and storm increased more forcibly upon them. Whereupon they were driven to this necessity, even to pitch their camp, even in that very place where they were so suddenly caught and overtaken by tempest. But that was to them the beginning of a new toil and travail: for neither could they spread and display ought, nor pitch any thing safely: neither would that which was pight down continue and abide the wind, which rent and tare, and broke every thing, and hurried it clean away. And within a while the water that fell, and by reason of the wind was raised aloft, being ogealed once upon the cold tops of the hills, turned into a kind of hail and snow together, and came upon them with such a force, that leaving all things else, the men were forced to lie along, groveling upon their faces, rather stifled and smothered, then covered with their billings. Hereupon ensued a frost, so violent and outrageous, that of that miserable and pitiful heap of men and beasts, that lay there along, there was not one for a good while could raise and lift up himself when he would, by reason, that for stark cold their sinews were benumbed, that they could hardly bend and bow their joints. Afterwards, at length, when with bestirring and chafing their limbs, they gat some heat, and came again to themselves, and that here and there in some places they began to make fires: every one that had no means for to do, ran and fled to the succor and help of others. Thus for two days they remained there pinned up as if they had been besieged. Many a man and beast, and seven Elephants also of them that remained after the battel at Trebin, were starved and perished.

By

By occasion hereof, Annibal departed from Ageninum, back again toward Placentia: and when he had marched ten miles on his way, he let him down and encamped. The morrow after he led against the enemy 12000 foot, and 5000, horse, Sempronius the Consul also, being now returned from Rome, refused not battel: and the same day, the enemies were distant but three miles asunder. The morrow after they fought on each side most fiercely and courageously, and with variable event and fortune. At the first-on let the Romans had the better hand, so far forth, as that not only in fight they overcame their enemies, but also after they had difcomfited them, and put them back, they chased them into their camp, and anon assailed the same. Annibal having ordained some few to defend the rampart and the gates, retired the rest thick and close together into the midst of the camp, and commanded them to give ear, and be inventive to the signal, when he would have them issue forth. Now was it the ninth hour of the day, when the Roman Consul having coiled and wearied his souldiers to no purpose, and seeing no hope to win the camp, founded the retreat. Which so soon as Annibal heard, and saw the fight withal to slack and wax cold, and the enemy retired back from the camp, presently sallied forth himself with the whole strength of his Infantry, for he had sent out his horsemen both on the right hand and the left after the enemies. There had not been lightly a more fierce and cruel battel strucken, and more memorable, for the final mischief of both parts, if the day would have given them time to have fought longer. But the night parted the fray, which was hotly begun with exceeding fustock and courage. Whereupon, the contending and charging one of another, was more eager, then the laughter bloody between them: and as the fight in manner was equal, they parted with loss alike. For of each side there died above six hundred footmen, and half as many horsemen. But the loss on the Romans side was greater than in proportion of the number, because certain of the degree and calling of Knights, and five Colonels, and three Captains of the Allies, were slain.

After this journey, Annibal went into the country of the Ligurians, and Sempronius to Luca. To welcome Annibal at his first coming into Liguria, there were delivered unto him two Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, Cn. Fulvius, and L. Lucretius, who were intercepted by the Ligurians, & taken in a train of ambush, with two Colonels, and five others besides, whose fathers by calling were as good as Senators fellows: and this was done, because he should assure himself the better, that the peace and amity contracted with them, would be faithfully kept and observed.

Whiles these things thus passed in It. I. Cn. Scipio who was sent into Spain with a fleet and army for sea and land; having set sail from the mouth of Rhodanus, and compassed the mountains Pyreni, arrived at a place called Emporia: where he disembarked and landed his forces, and reduced unto the Roman Empire all the country, beginning at the Lacetans, and so from thence all the sea coast as far as to the river Iberus, partly by renewing their ancient leagues, and partly by devising new contracts new. Whereupon, there arose a great name of him for his clemency; whereby he prevailed not only with the States by the sea side but also amongst the inlanders and mountaineers, even to the nations that were more fierce & savage: with whom he not only made peace, but also wrought them so, that they took arm in his quarrel: and there were levied from among them, certain strong cohorts and bands for to aid and succour him. Hanno, whom Annibal had left for defence of that province, was not ignorant hereof: and therefore, before all was gone, and the country alienated, he thought good to meet with this mischief: and having pitched his camp in sight of the enemies, let his men in ordinance or battel. The Roman Captain likewise resolved not to defer the fight; knowing that so, he might be forced to encounter both with Hanno and Adrubal. And rather yet he desired to deal with them one after the other single, than at once with both. But this battel was not so much dangerous, Six thousand enemies were left behind slain, and two thousand taken prisoners, together with those that were left for the guard of the camp. For both the camp was forced and won, and also the General himself with certain guards was taken prisoner. Moreover Stiffum, a town neer unto the camp, was won by assault: howbeit, the spoil and pillage of the town were matters of small worth and value; namely, the household stuff, and such petty and trumpery of barbarous people, and certain poor base slaves. It was the camp that enriched the souldiers: by reason that not only the army which was now vanquished, but that also which with Annibal served in Italy, and left behind them about Pyrenius, all good things to speak of, that they set store by, because they would go lightly, and not be encumbered with carriages. Before any certain report of this overthrow came to Adrubal, he had passed over Iberus with 8000, footmen, and 1000, horsemen, as purposing to make head against the Romans at their first coming: but when he heard how the field was lost, and the camp withal, he turned his journey to the sea. And not far from Tarracoon, he found the souldiers of the Armado, and the mariners besides, wandering and stragling over the fields (for usual it is, that happy success should breed careles negligence) whereupon he sent out his horsemen every way, and with great slaughter and flight he chased them to their ships: and not adventuring to make any longer stay thereabout, for fear to be surprised of Scipio, he retired back to the other side of Iberus. Scipio also upon the first report of these new enemies, having rallied his forces together in great haste, after he had slightly chastised a few Captains, and left behind him a small garrison at Tarracoon, returned with his fleet to Emporia. He had no sooner departed from thence, but Adrubal was there in his place; and having induced and incited the State of the Illegetes (who had given hostages to Scipio) for to revolt and rebel, even with their own youth, walled the territories of all those that continued faithful confederates to the Romans. Afterwards, when Scipio was routed verence he had of the Gods themselves: which rashness, as it cost him nought, but was ingrafted in him by nature, so fortune had nourished and maintained the same with prosperous success in his affairs at home, and wars abroad; so as it appeared evidently, that since he respected neither God nor man, and deigned not to take their counsel and advice, he would go rashly to work, and do all in haste, hand over hand, without discretion. And to the end he might be more forward to plunge himself headlong into these his infirmities and imperfections, Annibal devised to anger him; and to move his patience, leaving the enemy therefore on his left hand, he put himself into the way to Fejula to wait and spoil the country of Tuscany; and shewed to the Consul a far off, what foul work and havoc he possibly could make, with fire and sword. Then Flaminius, who of himself would not have rested and late still, in case Annibal had been quiet; seeing once the goods of his allies and friends, harried and driven away even before his eyes, and thinking it tended greatly to his shame and dishonor, that a Carthaginian should march thus at his pleasure, through the mids of Italy, and without any impeaching and controulement, to pass on forward, even to besiege and assault the walls of Rome; when all others about him sitting in council, gave advice for profit and safety, rather than for shew and bravery; namely, to pause awhile, and expect the coming of his Colleague, that they might with joint armies, with one heart, and with common accord of counsel, conduct and manage the war: and in the mean time, with the Cavalry, with Auxiliary or aid-fouldiers lightly armed, repress the enemy, and stay him from spoiling so licentiously at his pleasure; in a great chafe and choler he rose up, and departed out of the Council, and presently founded the march, and gave the signal of battail: and withal, "Nay we were best (quoth he) to remain and sit here till before the walls of Arretium: for this, 'be like, is our native country, and here is our place of habitation: as for Annibal, let him 'escape forth of our hands, and wait all Italy; let him spoil afore him, and over-run all with fire and sword, until he be as far as Rome walks: and let not us, in any case once stir from hence, before that the Senators send for C. Flaminius from Arretium, as sometimes they called Camilus 'from Vesii. With these and such like reproachful and taunting words, he commanded in all his standards and ensigns to be plucked up, and called for his Horse. He was not so soon mounted on his back, but the Horse fell presently, cast the Rider over and over with his head forward; and there lay Flaminius the Consul under foot. As they all, that attended about him, were affrighted and troubled in mind, at this unlucky preface and fore-token, in the very beginning of his enterprise: word moreover was brought unto him, that one of the port-ensigns was not able to pull up his ensign, do what he could, and putting his whole strength unto it. The Consul turning to the messenger. What? hast thou any letters besides (quoth he) from the Senat, to prohibit me for giving battail? go thy ways, and bid them dig up the ensign, with help of spade and mattock, if their hands be so benumbed for fear, that they can not pluck it up: and with that began the army to march. The principal Leaders and Captains, besides that they agreed not, but gained this course, were much dismayed and terrified with this twofold prodigious sign: but the common fouldiers rejoiced and took great pleasure, to see this forwardness and animosity of their General: having an eye rather to the end of their hope, than to the cause which they had to hope to. Now Annibal waited in all manner of hostility that he could devise, the territories between the Town Corone, and the lake Thrasymenus, and all to whet the edge of the Consuls stomach, to chafe his hot blood, and to provoke him for to be revenged, for the harms: not wrongs done to his good friends and allies. And come already they were to certain places, naturally made as it were for an ambush, whereas the lake Thrasymenus lieth hard at the foot of the Hills of Cortina: for there is between, but a very straight and narrow passage, as if there had been left so much space of ground, only for that purpose, and nothing else. For if a man go but a little further, the plain lieth more open, and groweth larger, and from thence the hills begin to arise aloft. Annibal in the open ground pitched his camp, for himself with his Africans only and the Spaniards to lodge in, and made abode. The Balearians, and the other light armed fouldiers, he led about behind the Mountains: the Horsemen he placed at the very gullet of the straight passage, where the little hills handomely covered and hid them close: to the end that, so soon as the Romans were entered in, when he had put forth his horsemen against the gullet of the straight, all might be enclosed within the lake and the Mountains. Flaminius being come to the lake the day before at the Sun setting; the morrow after, before it was full day light, without discovering and clearing the coasts by any scouts and espials sent out before, passed through the straight. After that his army began to be spread and displayed more at large, as the plain opened wider, he espied and perceived those enemies only which he had before his face: for the ambushes lay close hidden, both behind his back, and over his head. Annibal having once got the enemy (as he would) enclosed thus within the lake and the Mountains, and environed with his forces, gave the signal to them all for to charge: who came down every man the nearest way he could: and so much the more were the Romans affrighted and troubled with this sudden occurrent, by reason that the mist which arose out of the lake, was setled thicker in the plain, than upon the hills: whereby the Companies and Squadrons of their enemies coming out of many Vallies, were seen well enough one of another, and therefore more joyntly gave the charge all at once together. The Romans hearing the cry and shout which arose from all parts; before they could well discern and see, perceived themselves compassed all about and surprised, and were assailed both affront, and on their flanks, ere they could put themselves in battail-ray, as they ought, make

A their armour and weapons ready, and draw their swords. When all the rest were thus amazed, and at their wits end, the Consul alone, for all this imminent danger, shewed himself nothing daunted or afraid, but set in order the ranks and files which were thuffled and blended together, according as time and place would give him leave: and marshalled his fouldiers, (who turned every way as they heard the sundry and divers noises) and in the best manner he could devise, he comforted and encouraged them, willing them to stand to it, and fight like men, forth that there was now no means else to escape. "All the vows and invocations upon the Gods for their help, would not serve, but only it was mere force and mere manhood must do the deed; and they were "to make way by dint of sword, through the midst of their enemies battailions: and the less men "feared, the less danger commonly beideth them. Howbeit, by reason of the noise and hurly-burly, neither counsel nor command could be heard: and so far off were the fouldiers from knowing their own Ensigns, their ranks and places, that scarcely their heart would serve them to take arms, and to buckle them, as they should, fitly for fight: in such sort as some of them were surprised and born down, laden rather with their harness, then covered and defended there-with. And in so great a mist and darkness, more use they had of ears than eyes: for at the groines of their wounded fellows, at the blows and strokes upon the bodies and armour rebounding again, at the confused shouts and shrieks of hardy and fearful men one with another, they turned their faces, and cast their eyes every way. Some as they would have fled, light into the press of those that were fighting, and there were set fast: some again as they returned for to fight, were born backward by companies that ran away. Afterwards, when they had stayed in vain every way to get forth, and laid well, that on both sides and flanks the mountains and the lake: that afront and behind, the enemies battailions hemmed them in; then they knew evidently there was no hope of life but in their right hand and force of arms. Then every man became a Captain, and encouraged himself to fight manfully: so as the battail began afresh, not in order by the Principes, Hastati, and Triarii, nor according to the accustomed manner, whereby the vanguard should fight before the main battail and the standards, and behind them the rearguard, and that the fouldier should keep his own legion, his own cohort, band, and company: but at a venture, even as it happened, so they went to it and buckled, pell-mell: and as every mans heart served him, so he marshalled himself to fight, either before or behind. Their courage and animosity was so ardent, their spirits and minds so intentive to the battel, that being as there was, a terrible earthquake at the very instant, D which overthrow, turned upside down, a great part of many Cities in Italy, turned aside the courses of great rivers out of their channels, and drove their streams against the current, forced the Sea into fresh Rivers, yea, and overturned Mountains with mighty falls, and laid them flat; yet there was not a man who fought in that battail, that once heard or perceived it. The conflict lasted almost three hours. Sharp it was in every place, but about the Consul most cruel: and look in what part soever he saw his men distressed and in hazard, there courageously he aided them. By reason that the flower and bravest gallants followed him, and was himself for his own person goodly beleeen in his rich armour, he both assailed the enemy most furiously, and also defended his own citizens as valiantly: so long, until a certain Infubrian, a man of arms (Ducarius, was his name) one that knew his vilage well enough. This is (quoth he) to his country-men, the Consul that defeated our army; put to the sword our Legions, wasted our territories, and he that defeated and sacked our City. Now will I offer him as a sacrifice out of hand to the ghosts and spirits of those our fellow citizens, who by his means have been piteously slain: and therewith, letting spurs to his Horse, he rode through the thickest troop and press of his enemies: and when he had first slain his Elquier outright (who opposed his body between, and set himself against him, seeing him coming so furiously) he ran the Consul quite through the body with his lance. And when he would rather than his life have disarmed and rifled him, the Triarii led with their targets over his corps, and to keep him off. Hereupon from hence first many began to flee: but anon, neither deep lake nor high mountain, could impeach and stop their fearful flight: like blind men they ran and sought means to make escapes; 'we the last never so farrow, were the Hills never so steep and craggy, horse and man, man and armour, fell headlong one upon another. A number of them seeing no way else to escape, entered into the Lake by the first edges and shallow brims thereof, waded so far, and went up so high, that they left their heads and shoulders openly above the water. Some there were, who unadvisedly (such was their fear) sought to save themselves by swimming; which being an endless piece of work, and beyond all hope, their wind and breath failing them, they were either rifled and swallowed up of the gulle, or after that with too much haste, they had over-laboured and toiled on themselves, they did what they could to swim back again, and with much ado to recover the Land: and there, by the enemies Horsemen who had taken the water, were they killed every where, and cut in pieces. Six thousand or thereabout, of the vanguard, who lustily braked through the mist, smote the heads of their enemies, unwitting of all that was done behind, escaped safe out of the gullet: and having seized the top of a little hill, there they stood, and might hear only the outcries of men, the raising and rustling sound of their armor, but how the battel went on, neither could they know, nor yet discern for the thickness of the dark mist. But now when they were come to some edge, and one side went down and had the worse, by which time the heat of the sun had broken and dispached the mist, and the bright day appeared: then through the clear light the hills and dales showed evidently, the havoc & overthrow that was made, and how the Roman army was foully difcomfited and defeated. For fear therefore, that the enemy (having) defcried and feen them a far off) ſhould lead out againſt them the Cavalry, up they went with their Ensigns in all haſt, and got them away with all ſpeed poſſibly they could. The morrow after, when over and beſides all other calamities, they were in danger of extreame famine, and that Muharbal (who with all his power of Horie purſued them by night, and overtook them) had given his faithful word and promiſe, that if he delivered up their armour, he would ſuffer them to depart in their ſingle garments, they yielded themſelves. Which promiſe Anibal ſaw performed as truly, as all Carthaginians uſe to do, and ſafe Carthaginian as he was, he clapt them all into priſon, and hung irons upon them. This is that noble and famous battel fought at the Lake Therſymenus, and of thoſe few overthrowes that the Romans had, the moſt memorable of all others. 15000 Romans were there ſlain in fight: 10000 were ſcattered: and lying through ſundry parts of Tufcany, gat to Rome. 1500 of the enemies loſt their lives in the field. But many more of both ſides afterwards died of their wounds. Others there be that report much murder and slaughter on both ſides. For mine own part (beſides that, I love not to write vain untruths, nor any thing without good warrant, and yet the humour of writers for the moſt part is too much given that way) I have followed for mine Author Fabius eſpecially, who lived about the time of this war. Anibal having enlarged without ranſome as many of his priſoners as were Latins, and put the Romans in ſtreight ward, cuttled out from among the heaps of his enemies that lay one upon another, the dead bodies of his own men, and commanded they ſhould be buried: and having with great care and diligence made ſearch alſo, for the dead corps of Flaminius to inter it, he could never find it.

At the fiſt news in Rome of this overthrow, the people ran together in exceeding fear and trouble into the common place of Aſſemblies. The Wives and Dames of the City, went up and down to and fro in the ſtreets, and enquired of whomſoever they met, what ſuddain calamity this was, whereof the bruit went; and what was become of the army? And when as the multitude aſſembled thick (as it were) to a publick audience, turning to the Comitium and the Senat-Houſe, and called upon the Magiſtrats: at length ſomewhat before the ſun-ſet, Marcus Pomponius the Pretor came forth and ſaid, A great battel hath been fought, and we have loſt the field. And albeit they heard of him no more than this of certainty yet they filled one anothers ears with rumors, and caried home with them theſe news, to wit, that the Conſul was killed, and a great part of his army with him ſlain: that there were but a few left alive, and thoſe either fled and ſcattered up, and down in Tufcany, or elle taken priſoners by the enemy. And look how many casualties & miſfortunes follow the overthrow of an army, into ſo many cares and perplexities were the ſpirits and minds of all thoſe plunged, who had any kinſfolk that ſerved under Flaminius the Coſ, all the whiles they were ignorant, what was the fortune of their friends. And no man knew for certain, what he waſt to hope for, or to fear: he morrow and certain dayes following, there flood at the gates a ſort of people, and thoſe were women more than men, waiting to ſee their friends themſelves, or thoſe that could tell tidings of them: and ever as they met with any, they would ſtock-about them, and be very inquisitive: neither could they be plucked away from them of their acquaintance and knowledge, before they had questioned every particular circumſtance, from point to point in order. There might a man have ſeen an alphabet of faces, in thoſe that departed from the meſſengers, according as the tidings was joyfull or wofull: there might a man have ſeen a number coming about them to accompany them as they returned to their houſes, either rejoicing for their good hap, or comforting them for their miſfortune and calamity. The women eſpecially, as well in joy, as alſo in ſorrow, were in their extremities. One above the reſt (as it is reported) ſtanding at the gate, upon the ſuddain ſight of her ſon alive & ſafe, fell down dead at his very feet. Another, who had received an untrue report of her ſons death, as ſhe ſat mourning at home within her houſe in great ſorrow of heart, ſoon as ever ſhe ſaw him coming into the houſe, for exceeding joy yielded her laſt breath, and died. And for certain dayes the Pretors kept the Senators together in Conſult, from the ſun-riſing to the ſetting, conſulting under whoſe conduct, and with what forces they might be able to withſtand the puſſance of theſe victorious Carthaginians. But before they were thoughtly reſolved of any determinat purpoſe and counſels to be taken, ſuddainly there arrived other news of a ſecond loſſe, namely, that 4000 horſemen under the leading of C. Curius the Propreſtor, ſome from C. Scipio the Coſ, unto his Collegue, were incloſed by Anibal in Umbria. For thicker they had taken their way, upon the news they heard of the battail at Therſymenus. The brave and rumors hereof hammered diversly in mens heads. Some, whoſe minds were poſſeſſed already with grief of a greater calamity, thought the loſs of that Cavalry but ſmall, in compariſon of the former defeat: Others eſteemed that which hapned, not according to the importance of the thing it ſelf: but like as it falleth out in the natural body of man, that it ſeemeth to be crüe and weak every occaſion, but it ſeemeth ſmall and light: is more offenſive unto it and footeth off, than a greater ſaſe and obſect in it ſound and ſtrong conſtitution: even ſo, when any croſs or adverſity befall upon the politick body of a City, diſſealed (as it were) and ſickly, we are not ſo ſenſitive to the ſame by the greater force of the accidents, but according to the feeble and decayed ſtate thereof, able to endure and abide no new inſult, that it ſufferth ſhock and grieve it, whilſt as yet it ſeemeth to be ſound. The City of Rome took her loſſe to the ſovereign ſhock and approved remedy, which ſhe had long deſired, and yet not applied and uſed of late: namely, to the nomination of a Dictator. And becauſe the Conſul himſelf was abſent, by whom alone it was thought the

A might be named: and by reaſon that Italy was ſo overſpread and ſorlaied with the Punick forces, there might no courier be well diſpatched, nor letters ſafely ſent unto him: and for that the people had not authority of themſelves to create a Dictator, they therefore elected a Pro-dictator (a thing that was never ſeen and praſticed before that day) namely, Q. Fabius Maximus, and for his General of the Cavalry, M. Minucius Rufus. Theſe had commiſſion from the Senat, to fortify the walls and Towers of the City, to plant and beſtow guards thereon, where they thought meet, and to cut up and break down the bridges upon the great rivers: ſhewing hereby, that ſince they were not able to keep and defend Italy, they were now to fight for houſe and home and to guard the very City.

Anibal in this mean time waſt come directly by the way of Umbria, as far as to Spoleum. And after he had grievouſly waſted and ſpoiled the territory, he aſſaid to give aſſault to that City: but from thence he had the repulſe with the loſs of many of his men, And gueſſing by the ſtrength of that one Colony (where he ſped but badly in the attempt of it) how great and difficult the enterpriſe might be of aſſailing the City of Rome; he turned another way into the * Picene country, not only abounding in plenty of all kind of corn and grain, but alſo affording rich ſpoil and pillage: which the hungry and needy ſouldiers foraged and caried away as greedily, beyond all meaſure. And therefor certain dayes he kept a ſtanding camp, and reſreſhed his ſouldiers, toiled as well with winter journeys and boggy wayes as alſo in the late battel, which was more joyous and fortunate in the looſe and patting, than light and eaſy in the conſtand fighting. After he had reſted and reſreſhed his ſouldiers ſufficiently, who took more pleaſure in booties and prizes than in eaſe and repoſe, he diſlodged, and journeyed forward: waſting and ſpoiling fiſt the * Pretutian and Adrian territories, and then the Marians, Marrucins and * Pelignians: and all about Arpi and Luceria, being a region neſt adjoining unto * Apulia.

Cn. Jervilius the other Conſul, having had ſome light skirmiſhes with the Gauls, and won from them one mean Town of ſmall importance, after he waſt adviſed one of the death of his Collegue and the defeat of the army, ſearing even then what danger might beſide the walls of his native country, ſett peradventure he ſhould be abſent in the hazard of the main chance, put himſelf in his journey toward the City of Rome. Q. Fabius Max. the Pro-dictator aforeſaid the ſame day that he entered his office, aſſembled the Senat, and began fiſt with matters of religion, and concerning the Gods: and after he had laid open unto the LL. of the Senat, that the Conſul Flaminius had ſaulted more in the neglect and contempt of Divine ceremonies, and the Auspices, than D otherwise in raſhneſs and for want of ſkill in ſeats of war: and that the Gods themſelves were to be conſulted about the purging and expiation of ſins and offences, and what might appeaſe their wrath: gained and obtained this one point, That the Decenvirs were commanded to repair unto the books of Sibylla, (a thing not uſually decreed: but when ſtrange ſigns and prodigious wonders are reported) who having peruſed the books of deſtinies, made relation and informed the Senators, fiſt, That the vow made unto Mars for the good ſucces of that war, waſt not performed with due complements, and therefore ought to be accompliſhed anew, and in more ample manner: alſo, that the great Games and Plaies ſhould be vowed unto Jupiter, with Temple: likewiſe to Venus Erycina, and to * Mens. Moreover, that a ſolemn ſupplication and a Leſtiteri ſhould be celebrated, and a ſacred Spring vowed, if the Gods granted them an happy end of war, and the Common-wealth to remain in the ſame ſtate, wherein it flood before the war began. The Senat gave order, that ſo far as Fabius was to be employed in the wars, M. Anibal the Pretor, ſhould have in charge to ſee all the premiſes performed with all good ſpeed, according to the will and mind of the Collegue of the Biſhops or Prelats. Theſe Ordinances of the Senat being conſented, Lucius Cornelius Lentulus the Arch-prelate, with the advice of the whole Collegue of the Prelats, thought good and gave advice, that fiſt above all other things the opinion and pleaſure of the people (as touching the ſacred Spring) ſhould be known, for that without the voyces and conſent of the people it could not be vowed: And in this form of words waſt the bill propounded unto the people. Pleaſeth it you, that this grace may paſs, and the thing done with your aſſent in this wiſe? If the ſtate of the people of Rome and the Quirites for five years next enſuing, continue ſafely preferred in theſe wars, as I deſire it ſhould, then ſhall the people of Rome, and Quirites perform an oblation and gift vowed and promiſed: namely, in the war between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians: and in the war with the Gauls on this ſide the Alps: to wit, that the earneſts which the Spring ſhall yield, and aſſaid out of ſheep and ſwine, goat and kine, and all things that ſhall be prophane, be ſacrificed unto Jupiter, accounting from that day that the Senat and people ſhall ſo ordain: Item, that he which ſhall ſacrifice, may do it when he will, and in what manner he will: and in what ſort ſo ever he ſhall ſacrifice, that it may ſtand for good and rightſal. If haply it ſhall, that ſhould be ſacrificed, let it be counted prophane, & not diſliked: If any man lame or maimed, or ill the ſame unſuſtained, let it not be imputed unto him as criminal: If any perſon conceal away the ſame or hide it out of the way, let it not be imputed for wickedneſs unto the people, nor to him from whom it ſhall be ſo ſtolen or hidden. If once by chance ignorance to ſacrifice upon an unlucky & diſmal day, let it be accounted good and lawful whether by night or day, whether bond or free ſhall ſacrifice, let it be taken and hold good. If before it the Senat and people ſhall ordain theſe ſacrifices to be done, or ſhall ſacrifice, let the people be aſſiſſed and diſcharged freely therefore. And for the ſame purpoſe, were the great games (before vowed) performed with the expence of * 33333 Asles, and one third part of an Aſ: beſides the ſacrifice of 300 Oxen to Jupiter, & of white Oxen and other ſacrifices, unto many other ſaints. After theſe vows pronounced and made accordingly, the ſupplication waſt proclaimed & in proceſſion there went with their wives & children, children, not only the multitude of the City, but also of the country, so many as had their private estate, any way depending upon the publick. The Lectitern likewise was prepared and trimmed, and continued for three dayes; and the Decemvirs deputed for holy ceremonies had the ordering thereof. The sacred beds were openly to be seen. one for Jupiter and Juno, another for Neptune and Minerva; a third for Mars and Venus; a fourth for Apollo and Diana; a fifth for Vulcan and Vesta; and a sixth for Mercury and Ceres. Then were the Temples vowed: unto Venus Erigina, Q. Fabius Max. the Dictator, vowed one Temple. For, so it was delivered from out of the books of definitions, that he should vow it, who had the sovereignty in the City, and unto * Mens, Attilius the Pretor vowed another. Thus when Church matters touching Religion were finished, the Dictator propounded concerning war and the State; namely, with what Legions and how many, the Senat thought good to withstand the victorious enemy. And a decree passed, that he should receive the army at the hands of Cn. Servilius the Col, and enrol besides of the citizens and allies, as many horsemen & footmen as he thought convenient: and that he should do and order all things at his own discretion, for the good of the Common-weal. Fabius said, That he would adjoin unto the army of Servilius, two Legions more; which being levied by the General of the horsemen, he proclaimed, that they should meet together upon a certain day at Tybur; and when he had published a proclamation, That whosoever inhabited within any Towns or Castles unlicensed, should depart into places of safety; and that all should remove out of the villages of that country, through which Annibal was to go (but first to set on fire their houses, and spoil their corn, that he might find nothing there when he came) he went himself forward by the high way or cauley Flaminia, to meet with the Consul and the army. And when he discovered them marching about Otricoli, by the river Tyberis, and saw the Consul with his horsemen coming forward to him, he sent a Sergeant, to give warning to the Consul, for to come without his Lictors to the Dictator, who obeyed his commandment. And as their meeting together, represented an exceeding great show of the Dictatorship unto citizens and allies both, who by reason of discontinuance so long time, had welneer forgotten that government: behold, there came letters from the City importing news, that certain ships of burden transporting victuals from Hosia into Spain for the army there, were by the navy of the Carthaginians boarded and taken about the sound or haven of Cassia. Whereupon immediately the Consul was commanded to go to Hosia, to take up all shipping at Rome or at Hosia, to furnish them with saylers, and man them with souldiers, and so to pursue the Armado of the enemies, and to keep the coasts of Italy. A mighty number of men was levied at Rome, The Libertins also, who had children, and were of lawfull age to serve, swore allegiance unto him, to be his true souldiers. Out of this army of citizens, as many as were under 35. years of age, were shipped: the rest were left behind to guard the City. The Dictator having received the Consul's army at the hands of Fulvius Flaccus his Lieutenant, went through the Sabins Country, and arrived at Tybur, whither he had commanded the new souldiers to repair at a day. From thence by crofs wayes he returned into the high way or cauley Latina, even to Prenefte: from whence (having searched diligently by his espials, all the wayes) he led forward toward the enemy, purposing in no place to hazard the fortune of battail, but upon necessity. The very first day that he encamped not far from Arpi, within the sight of his enemies, there was no ho with Annibal, but without further delay, he came forth into the field in battail array, bad him battail, and offered fight. But seeing his enemies quiet, and no stirring in the camp, he fell to taunting and reviling them: saying, That now at length yet, the martial hearts of the Romans were daunted and tamed; and seeing they refused fight, they confessed plainly, and granted themselves inferior unto him in valor, prowess, and glory: which said, he retired into his camp. Howbeit, chafing and fretting secretly in his mind, for anger that he had to deal hereafter with a Captain, far unlike to Flamininus and Sempronius: and that the Romans now at last, being schooled and taught by their own harms, and to their great cost, had sought out and got a Captaine to match Annibal: he straightwayes he began to fear the wisdom of the Dictator, and not his force: but having had as yet no trial of his constant resolution, he fell to disquiet his mind, and to tempt him with often removing his own tents, and waisting the fields of his allies even under his nose: one while he seemed to march haway apace out of all sight, another while he would of a suddain stay, and lie close in one by-place and corner, out of the way, to spie when he could take him in some plain and even ground. But Fabius led his army, and marched above on the higher grounds, a pretty distance off from the enemy, so as neither he would let him go clean and abandon him, nor yet encounter with him. He kept his souldiers for the most part within the camp, save only when necessity otherwise constrained. For purveyance of forage and fewell, they went neither few in number, nor straggling afunder. The wards of Horsemen and those that were lightly armed, standing always in order of battail, and ready prepared and furnished for suddain impressions and tumults, yielded both security to his own souldiers, and also danger to his enemies, as they ranged all abroad and foraged the Country. In this manner never was the main chance put to the venture all at once of fortune: and the small trials of light scuffling and skirmishes (begun in safety and security by reason of the recourse of refuge so neer) injured and heartened the souldiers, frightened with former foils, and made them at length to distrust less either their own valour, or fortune. But Annibal was not more discontented and displeased, nor more ready, so grosse and thwart these to whom some policies and counsels of his, as his own General of horsemen: who wanted nothing else but sovereign command, to overturn headlong the Common-weal: a man in all his designments,

A meets violent and hasty, and of tongue intemperate. And first secretly among some few, but afterwards openly in the hearing of all men, he termed Fabius, in stead of a stayed and sober man, slow and dull: in stead of wary and heedfull, timorous and fearful: attributing unto verities the names of vices of meer semblance: and having a singular dexterity to debate his betters and superiours, exalted himself thereby: a cunning cast, of all others the worst, and yet hath mightily prevailed and sped too well in many that have used it. Annibal from Arpi passed into Sannium, wasteth the country of Beneventum, winneth the City Telefa, and still provoketh (of set purpose) the Roman Captain, if haply he should incense him by to many indignities and losses of his allies; and so draw him to fight on even hand.

B Amongst a great number of Italian confederats and allies, whom Annibal had taken prisoners at Therimachus and dismissed, there were three Campan horsemen, whom Annibal even then had tolled on, and allured with gifts and fair promises to win unto him the hearts of their country-men. These brought word unto him, that in case he would lead and bring his army into Campania, he should soon be Lord of Capua. And albeit the thing in it self seemed greater than the quality of the persons that counselled him thereto: and therefore stood in mammering, one while in good hope and assurance, another while in fear and distrust: yet they perswaded him at last to remove out of Sannium into Campania. After he had admonished them very often, to see that they made their word and promises good by deed, and commanded them withal to return unto him with some of their principal Citizens: and Country-men, he sent them away.

C Himself gave commandment to his guide, to conduct him into the territory of * Capuani: being advised by those that were skillful and acquainted with the coasts of those parts, that if he could gain beforehand that safe and sure, he might exclude the Romans from coming to rescue and succour their confederats. But the ambiguity of the name, and the Carthaginian language far differing from the Latine, caused the guide to mistake Capuani for Capuam: and so in mistaking his intended journey, he came down, through the Alfani, Calatine, and Calene Countries, into the plain champaign region of Stella. Where seeing all the coasts environed round about with Mountains and Rivers, he called the guide unto him, and demanded where he was: and when he answered, that he should that day lodge in Capuam, then and not before, the error was found; and he knew that he was far out of his way, for that Capuam was distant in another

D Country far off. And after he had beaten the guide with rods, and hanged him up by the head, for an example to terrifie all others, he fortified himself within camp, and sent out Mabinbal with the Horsemen into the Falern Country, to fetch in booties. So they wasted and spoiled as far as the waters of Sinuessæ. Much harm did these Numidians, but the slight and fright of the people was far greater. And yet notwithstanding that great fear, when all was on a light fire as it were, and nothing but war, the Roman allies continued still firm in their faithful allegiance: and the reason was, because they were ruled under a just and moderate government, and neither refused, nor thought much to be subject unto their betters, the only bond of loyal fidelity. But so soon as he had pitched his camp by the River * Vulturnus, and that the most goodly and pleasant Country of all Italy was on fire, and the Villages every where burned and smoked again: whiles

E Fabius led his power over the ridge of the Mountain Massicus, the sedition was like to have broken out again, and certain Captains of the mutiny began to be enkindled afresh. For there had been great quierness, and all was still for some few dayes; because seeing the army march faster than their usual manner was, they supposed verily, that they made more speed and hastened, to save Campania from being spoiled and wasted. But when they were come to the foremost edge and point of the Mountain Massicus, and that the enemies were within sight, burning the dwelling Houses of the Coloners and inhabitants of Sinuessæ, and likewise of the Falern Country, and all this while not one word of battail: And are we come hither indeed, quoth Mimnius, to behold only and to see, and feed our eyes with looking on our allies, consumed and wasted with fire and sword? and if we bask at nothing else, can we for shame abide to see the Calamity

F of these Citizens here, whom our fore-fathers planted in Sinuessæ as coloners there to inhabit, to the end that all this tract and coast should be safe from the invasion of the Samnites? But behold, it is not a neighbour enemy (the Samnite) that stretch it but a forrein and alien, even the Carthaginian who from the farthest and most remote parts of the world, (whiles we stand at a bay, till the off fill, and for laziness do nothing) is come forward even hither unto us. And are we so far degenerate (with sorrow of heart I speak it) from our progenitors and fathers, that along which coast they thought it dishonorable unto their empire, for the Carthaginian Armadoes and ships to stote, sail, and ride: we should see the same now pelted full of enemies, the Numidians and Moors? We, who ere while taking soul (corn and great disdain to see Saguntum besieged, called not only upon men, but also upon the faith of alliances and the Gods to wit-

G nesses; stand still gazing upon Annibal marching against the walls of a Roman Colony, and ready to assault it. The smoke of the villages and the fields now on fire, is ready to put out our eyes and to choke us up our ears round and ring again with the piteous cries of our allies that weep and lament, and call oftener unto us than unto the Gods for help. And we here lead our army as if they were a flock of sheep, over the shadowy forests, and hills out of the way, hid among the clouds and thick woods to keep them from the heat of Suo. If Furius Camillus had been of mind, by ranging and wandering over hills and forests in this manner, to win again the City out of the hands of the Gauls, as this our new Camillus forsooth (sought out of purpose to be our only Dictator

Mimnius.

"Dictator in this our distress and hard estate) goeth about to recover Italy from Annibal, Rome had been French at this day: which I fear me, if we go thus coldly to work, our ancestors have saved and reserved to us, for Annibal and the Carthaginians. But he, a brave man, and a Roman indeed, that very day when word was brought to Pœius, that he was chosen Dictator by the suffrages of the people, and approbation of the Senators, although Janiculum was high enough, where he might have let him down and beheld the enemy at ease, descended into the plain and even ground, and the same day in the very midst and heart of the City, where now Gaulbry or Bispa Gallica standeth, and the morrow after, between Rome and Gabæ, slew the Legions of the Gauls. And what should I say of that, which happened many years after, when at the sieges of Candium we were put under the yoke by the Samnites our enemies? Whether I pray you, did L. Pappus Cur for seek out the mountains of Samnium, or rather he hard upon Luceria and besieged it, provoking and challenging the victorious enemy; and thereby look off the yoke from the Romans neck, and laid it upon the proud Samnites? And what other thing else of late days but expedition, gave the victory to Comilius Lulianus? Who the morrow after that he discovered the enemy, set upon his fleet heavily fraught with victuals: and overcharged as it was with his own munition, furniture and provision, sunk, and destroyed the same. It is meer folly to believe and think by sitting still, by bare prayers and vows, to vanquish and subdue the enemy. Our forces must be put into arms, and brought down into the plain that man to man may cope and buckle together. By adventuring boldly, by action and execution, hath the Roman Empire grown to this height: and not by these conceits and devices, which fearful cowards term the wary policies of war. As Minutius spake these words in preaching wife, a number of Roman Colonels and Horsemen came flocking about him. Yea, and these lusty and rash speeches of his, came even unto the ears of the footmen: So as, if it had been in the voyces and election of the fouldiers, out of all question they seemed willing to prefer Minutius before their General Fabius. But Fabius again regarding always with good eye his own men, no less than his enemies, carrying a resolute mind, invincible ever before any other, albeit he was well ware, that not only within his own camp but also now at Rome, he heard ill for his temporizing and slow proceedings: yet drew he out the rest of the summer, and held on still the same course and purpose, never altered his former manner: until that Annibal being clean disappointed of long desired battle, besought himself anon and looked about for some places of winterabode considering, That the country where now he was, rather yielded plenty for the present, than store for long continuance: as standing upon Hortyards and Vineyards, and all things planted, rather for fruits of pleasure and delight, than for necessity and profit. Intelligence hereof being given to Fabius, by his espials, for that he knew well enough, that Annibal was to return through the same streights, by which he had entered the Falern country: he holdeth and keepeth the hill Calentia, with sufficient garrisons and likewise Capitulum, a City divided by the river Volturnus, and parteth the Falern and Campanian countries asunder. Himself bringeth back his power through the same hills, having sent out to discover and espie 400 Horsemen of confederates, under the conduct of L. Hostilius Mancinus, who being one of the crew of those lusty youths, that oftentimes heard the General of the Horsemen giving out abroad brave words and stout speeches, at first went forward in manner of an espial, to discover and espie the enemy from a place of safety and security: and when as he saw the Numidians ranging all about the villages, and flew from them of whom he took at a vantage, straight-ways his mind wholly possessed and set upon fight, and so forgot the charge and direction of the Dictator, who had commanded him to go forward as warily and as closely as he possibly could, and to retire himself again before he came within sight of the enemies. The Numidians charging and recharging him afront one while, and flying from him another while drew him almost unto their very camp: when as both horse and man were wearied. From whence Caralis, who then had the conduct and command of the Cavalry, set out against him lustily upon the spur, and before they came within dart short put the enemies to flight, and followed them continually in chase almost five miles. Mancinus seeing neither the enemy to give over pursuit, nor any hope to escape away, exhorted his men, and turned head upon them, overmatched as he was every way: where he himself and his choicest Horsemen were beset round and slain: the other taking themselves again to flight for life, first camero Cales, and after through by-lanes and difficult ways, to the Dictator. That day, as hap was, Minutius had joyned himself to Fabius having been afore sent to keep with a strong guard, the forest or pass, which above Terracina, groweth into a narrow gullet, and reacheth to the sea; for fear lest the adventue of the way Appia, were without defence, Annibal might enter and invade the country of Rome. When the Dictator and the General of Horsemen had joyned their forces together, they encamped upon the very high way, that Annibal was to passe with his army. Now were the enemies two miles off. The morrow after, the Carthaginians took up with their army all the way between the one camp and the other. When as the Romans were quartered even under their very trench and rampier, in a place not doubt of great advantage, yet for all that approached Annibal with his light Horsemen: and to provoke his enemies, fought by flarts and fits, charging upon them, and retiring back again with great humble silence. The Romans kept still their standing, embarrailed as they were. The fight was cold and lingering to the mind and liking of the Dictator, rather than of Annibal: and where there were of the Romans part 200 slain, there dyed 800 of the enemies. Then seemed Annibal after, to be enclosed and shut up as it were and besieged within Capitulum, seeing that Capua, Samnium,
